LE SOIR OUTLINES EC PROPOSALS ON PALESTINE ISSUE

LD311515 Brussels LE SOIR in French 28-29 Dec 80 pp 1, 3

[Michel Dubuisson report: "Israeli-Arab Conflict: The Content of the Nine's Confidential Document"]

[Text] In Luxembourg on 2 December the European heads of state and government adopted a document drawn up by the foreign ministers aimed at making progress along the path of an EEC initiative to promote an all-embracing settlement in the Near East. This document is a list of options which will, over the next few months, be submitted to the sides concerned and "tested." Meanwhile the document is to remain confidential. However, we have been able to obtain knowledge of the main ideas and practical suggestions expressed in it.

It should be recalled that this is not a settlement plan but various elements which might feature in such a plan, the conditions for its implementation, the methods of implementation, and guarantees which would, of course, be the subject of negotiation. The document hinges on four themes: the Israeli withdrawal from the occupied territories, Palestinian self-determination, security and Jerusalem.

For the Nine, the withdrawal of the Israeli Armed Forces for which Security Council Resolution 272 makes provision should be total and relate to all the territories occupied in June 1967: the West Bank, Gaza, east Jerusalem and Golan. This withdrawal should be carried out within a maximum period of 2 years. There would be a major withdrawal at the beginning and only temporary "security points" would remain.

A transitional authority would be installed for that period. It would be provided either by the United Nations or Jordan for the West Bank and Gaza, or by the mayors and officials combined to form a joint body or even by a joint Israeli-Jordianian-Palestinian commission supervised by the United Nations.

On the basis of the Israeli-Egyptian treaty the Nine also retain the idea of linking the withdrawal from the occupied terriories to the normalization of relations between Israel and the other sides.

Furthermore, the Israeli settlements, regarded as illegal, would have to be dismantled (there are some 30 such settlements on the Golan Heights, 6 in Gaza and 68 on the West Bank, not to mention east Jerusalem). The Europeans, however, envisage some exceptions: They mention the possibility of singling out from the mass of Jewish settlements those which existed on the West Bank before the May 1948 conflict which could be maintained, their inhabitants thenceforth residing with foreign status.

Self-Determination

Self-determination would offer the West Bank and Gaza three options:

An independent Palestinian state;
A federation with Jordan;
A federation with Jordan and Israel.

The referendum, organized during the transition period, would be supervised by an elected consultative assembly. All the Palestinians would have the right to vote but the vote would be weighted in favor of the inhabitants of the occupied territories (around 1.2 million out of some 4 million Palestinians) so as to ensure that their votes predominated.

Security and Guarantees

The Venice declaration stated that guarantees of the peace settlement should be supplied by the United Nations, on the Security Council's decision and, if necessary, on the bases of other mutually agreed procedures. The Nine said they were prepared to take part in a system of "specific and binding" international guarantees "including on the spot."

The document takes up these ideas and states that the guarantees should be extended to all sides. Thus there is talk of demilitarized zones on both sides of the borders without, however, demanding that those zones be of equal area (because of the small size of some territories). Zones with limited arms and troops are also envisaged.

A UN international force with European participation could carry out monitoring or observation missions in the demilitarized zones.

More generally, the Nine also suggest reducing the military forces (arms and troops).

These various guarantees do not of course exclude the pledges inherent in a peace treaty: end to all belligerent acts and statements, respect for the right to existence, recognition of the other side, abandoning the use of force and so forth.

Several Options for Jerusalem

As regards Jerusalem, the Nine are considering, in keeping with the UN resolution, everything which has been done since the 27 November 1947 plan for the partition of Palestine as illegal.

Hence they propose several solutions:

Return to the international status (?corpus separatum") provided for by the 1947 partition plan;
Division of the city, placing the holy places under religious authority;
Division of the city, making the Old City international.

If the city were divided it could be placed under joint administration.

The Return of the Refugees

Finally, as regards the Palestinian refugees, their return to the territories evacuated by Israel should be effected according to methods to be determined. In addition the UN General Assembly's resolution of 11 December 1947 is still applicable (refugees' right to return to their homes of compensation for their property) but the Europeans think that only a small number of Palestinians would wish to exercise the right to return to Israel and that the Israelis will oppose it.

As in the Venice declaration when they did not settle the question of the PLO's representative nature (talking of the sides concerned, they mentioned the "Palestinian people and the PLO which will have to be involved in the negotiation"), the Nine do not make their position clear in this document. They are apparently leaving the door open while awaiting the outcome of new elections.

It is therefore with this set of ideas that Netherlands Foreign Minister van der Klaauw--the Netherlands will fill the European president's post from 1 January--will undertake a new mission of contact with the sides concerned. The future of the European initiative will be determined by the results of this mission.

GISCARD PLEDGES SUPPORT FOR NEW SENEGALESE CHIEF

AB011228 Paris AFP in English 1204 GMT 1 Jan 81

[Text] Paris, 1 Jan (AFP)--President Valery Giscard d'Estaing today pledged France's friendship and unreserved support for Senegalese Premier Abdou Diouf, who today took over as president from Leopold Sedar Senghor.

France is anxious to retain the esteem and the confidence of a country and a people whose leading role in Africa and the world it recognizes, he said in a message marking Mr Diouf's appointment as president.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing, in a message to Mr Senghor himself, expressed the hope that he would continue to work to bring Europe and Africa closer together.

Mr Senghor, 74, who ruled Senegal since independence from France in 1960, was resigning with wisdom and dignity, he said.

LE MONDE COMMENTS ON TEHRAN HOSTAGES' PLIGHT

[Editorial: "Diplomacy and State Terrorism"]

[Text] There are probably many people in the world this Christmas 1980 who are in a more tragic situation than that of the 52 Americans held in Iran. The wars and violence continuing in Afghanistan, in Kampuchea, in El Salvador and in Iran itself cause even more gratuitous suffering, so to speak, to thousands of innocent people each day. The hundreds of thousands of political prisoners detained in a large majority of countries in the world, the 780 million people--including 300 million children--who, according to UNICEF, are living in "total poverty" are also sending up a silent cry against the injustice of a century which, although it claims to be more "moral" than others, has, through the aid technology, imparted a mass dimension to cruelty and cynicism.

Nonetheless the detention of the U.S. diplomats in Tehran for the second year running is particularly open to condemnation. Not content with violating the rule of diplomatic immunity, which is almost as old as human history, the Tehran revolutionary government has used the hostages for 2 equally cynical ends for almost 14 months now: initially to provide a handy theme for mobilizing its population, justly revolted by the shah's dictatorship and the support which the United States gave him for almost 30 years; as one Algerian diplomat noted, it also tried to use this affair as a rather derisory substitute for the liberation war or Valmy war necessary to the consolidation of any revolution. The result was less conclusive when the real test came with the Iraqi invasion.

Later, this state terrorism was replaced by the even more vulgar methods of common crime. In fact Tehran has merely asked for ransom for the prisoners' release, raising the stakes to the level of "state gangsterism" practiced in this way. No doubt Iran is pointing out that it is not directly demanding the $24 billion demanded as a "guarantee." Nonetheless this amount--three times the U.S. overseas aid for 1980--is rather large. . . . Even if Tehran is entitled to do all it can to recover its assets and the shah's fortune, no U.S. president is in a position, legally or politically, to meet such a demand made in this form.

Mr Reagan is perhaps making a diplomatic mistake--if the word diplomatic can still be used in this affair--by describing his adversaries and future interlocutors in advance as "criminals and kidnappers." Is he, in so doing, preparing to justify one or several attempts to use force after he takes office or, on the other hand, to record the whole affair in profits and losses, classifying the hostages among the outgoing government's "war victims"? The near future will tell.

As for Mr Carter, he is not in a position to give any advice to his successor since he has tried everything, including force, to settle the longest crisis of his presidency. Will he have to leave the White House with this final failure?

MARCHAIS CABLES CONDOLENCES ON KOSYGIN DEMISE

LD301217 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 22 Dec 80 p 8

[Text] Georges Marchais sent the following telegram to Leonid Brezhnev: "Deeply saddened by the death of Comrade Aleksey Kosygin, I send you my fraternal condolences on behalf of the PCF and on my own account.

"Aleksey Kosygin, a respected statesman and communist leader, played a leading role in the Soviet Union's development and in its international authority in the struggle for peace and peaceful coexistence.

"In these painful circumstances I would like to express to you, to the CPSU and to the Soviet people, my greatest sympathy for your loss."

PCF POLITBURO STATEMENT ON PS ELECTORAL TACTICS

LD311629 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 19 Dec 80 p 5

[PCF Politburo statement: "Shedding Light on a Fraudulent Campaign"]

[Text] The following declaration was adopted by the PCF Politburo yesterday:

A campaign is now being waged by various Trotskivist organizations--including the internationalist communist organization, which is closely linked to the PS--as well as by a group erroneously named the "Union in Struggles," in favor of an immediate PCF-PS accord, with a view to the second round of presidential elections, and even with a view to the nomination of a single candidate.

Playing on the legitimate aspirations of millions of French men and women for union, this campaign, which is openly supported and directly organized by the Socialist leaders, in fact has the aim of deceiving the workers and ignoring the real interests of union and change which they expect.

Its main feature is in effect that it both completely glosses over the responsibility of Francois Mitterrand and other Socialist leaders for the breakup of the union and the 1978 defeat, as well as maintaining silence as to their present policy.

To speak of immediate accord without saying a word about the PS abandonment of the defense of workers' demands, about its justification of austerity and of the closing down of businesses in the name of the crisis, oil and Europe, its approval for the expansion of the Common Market, its appeal for the strengthening of the Atlantic alliance under the aegis of America, its support for an acceleration of the nuclear arms race--all this is simply a desire to subordinate the workers to a policy of crisis management in the interests of capital.

To speak of union in struggles without observing that Francis Mitterrand condemns struggles, declares them to be outdated and harmful, and that the Socialist leaders, including those who head certain central trade unions, are doing everything to cure them, is to use fine words to camouflage the call for a vote-catching grouping devoid of content or principle.

To speak of a sole candidate, without having the courage to say clearly that this candidate must be the one who has already been nominated and defeated twice, is to attempt to deceive the workers and to deprive them of change.

To speak of defeating the right and its policy without mentioning either the popular demands which must be satisfied, or the anticapitalist reforms without which change is impossible, is in fact to pave the way for the victory of the right and its policy, thanks to the establishment of a new pseudopolitical grouping which organizes cooperation between the PS and the right.

A vast operation is currently underway toward this end, part of it being the campaign by small groups, instigated by Socialist leaders, together with their moves, aimed at rapprochement with the Chirac's PPR or the contacts between leftwing radicals and those of the right, or even the Giscardian appeals for collaboration among all those who are not "collectivists and Marxists." Both of these groupings are coming together to attack the PCF and to block what is the decisive trump card for change: the collection of the maximum number of votes for the Communist candidate George Marchais, as of the first ballot.

The PCF Politburo thus calls on party organizations and Communists to shed light whereever necessary on the true objectives of this fradulent campaign.

PERTINI ADDRESSES NEW YEAR MESSAGE TO NATION

LD310334 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 31 Dec 80

[Text] Speaking tonight on radio and television, the president of the republic addressed a New Year's message to the Italian people, a message, he said, marked by sorrow due to the grave events, especially the earthquake, which afflicted the nation this year. Pertini said that it is necessary, not with words but with deeds, to help the survivors and to work for reconstruction.

The head of state then recalled the victims of terrorism and once again asked who it is who wants to destabilize the democratic regime. Pertini then asserted that there is a ray of hope--the attitude of the Italian people who have faced all misfortunes with determination and dignity. The overwhelming majority of Italians intend to erect a barrier against terrorism. To this end it is necessary to isolate the corrupt and the dishonest who are unworthy of the sacrifices of millions of Italians.

Confirming his confidence in the nation's youth, Pertini expressed the conviction that it is necessary to make every effort to divert the immense resources being expended on armaments to peaceful ends in favor of those in the world who are still struggling against hunger and poverty.

REACTIONS TO CARABINIERI GENERAL'S ASSASSINATION

Pertini To Attend Funeral

AU020902 Rome ANSA in English 0820 GMT 2 Jan 81

[Text] Rome, 2 Jan (ANSA)--President Sandro Pertini will be cutting short his holiday in Nice today to return to Italy for the funeral of General Enrico Galvaligi, the Carabinieri officer slain by urban guerrillas in Rome Wednesday.

Galvaligi, who was in charge of prison security in Italy, was the last and 115th victim of political violence in 1980. He was shot to death in am ambush at the entrance to his building when he returned home from mass with his wife Wednesday afternoon.

Premier Arnaldo Forlani was among the authorities to attend his wake at the Carabinieri Student Academy in the capital yesterday.

Pertini, who said no more than "I have to devote myself to extremely serious reflections" to reporters in Nice seeking a reaction to the Galvaligi slaying, dispatched the following wire to Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio yesterday:

"This tough year ended with another horrible event of bloodshed, which once again saw the Carabinieri Branch of the Armed Forces pay a life for its loyal commitment to protect democracy. The cowardly [words indistinct] of General Enrico Galvaligi is a bereavement for the entire nation, which knows how much it owes to the worthy Carabinieri Branch for the protection of democratic order and civilian co-existence."

Pertini ended the telegram with the following thought: "No concession can be yielded to these bloodthirsty murderers, whose criminal madness willfind its path blocked by the condemnation of all of the Italian people. Please, Mr Minister, convey my heartfelt condolences to the victim's family."

Eighty-five of the 115 victims of the politically-motivated violence in Italy last year were killed in the August 2 neofascist bomb massacre at Bologna's main railway station. The thirty victims of individual attacks included business executives, officials in state-run and private businesses, judges, police officers, Carabinieri servicemen and officers, politicians, journalists and physicians.

Forlani Vows Government Response

[Text] Rome, 2 Jan (ANSA)--Italian Premier Arnaldo Forlani vowed that his government will provide an "adequate" response to terrorism in an interview appearing in today's issue of the LA STAMPA daily.

"I don't know how long terrorism's blackmail will last or how much blood will still be shed," he remarked. "But I do know that it will always find an adequate response," he told the interviewer from the Turin-based daily.

"Instead of slowing down the commitment," he added, "We must strengthen it in every direction."

Forlani, whose toughly-worded remarks about terrorism came in the wake of the December 31 slaying of Carabinieri General Enrico Galvaligi in Rome, stated in part: "Everyone has to learn one thing. The defeat of terrorism and violence is linked....to a higher degree of national unity and greater seriousness on the part of all forces which guide and influence public opinion."

The premier went on to say that the tough line taken in qeulling the Trani prison revolt was not a novelty in government method.

"In these past two months," he asserted, "we have had to deal with very serious business and we have achieved a lot without ever diverting from what has come to be called 'the path of toughness'...."

Red Brigades Claim Responsibility

[Text] Rome, 2 Jan (ANSA)--The Red Brigades urban guerrilla organization claimed responsibility for the December 31 slaying of Carabinieri General Enrico Galvaligi in a typewritten document picked up by two dailies in Rome last night.

It was the seventh communique issued by the Red Brigades [since] the December 12 abduction of Rome magistrate Giovanni D'Urso, who is still in his kidnappers hands. The document announced that an "armed nucleus" of the urban guerrilla organization "executed" General Galvaligi, who headed the Carabinieri's Prison Security Department.

The Red Brigades, who have launched an offensive against special security systems in many Italian jails, scorned the operation effected Monday by a Carabinieri anti-terrorist task force to quell a prison revolt at the Trani jail in southeast Italy. "The bourgeoisie, shaken by fighting between its factions and by a state which is falling apart, was unable to provide a political response to proletarian prisoners in Trani," the document charged.

Only marginal mention was made of D'Urso, said to have been a close acquaintance of Galvaligi's, whose kidnapping was described as "the start of a battle which will continue".

The Red Brigades communique, dated January 1, also contained an attack against the Carabinieri police force, a branch of the armed forces. "[The Carabinieri force) has become a regular antiproletariat army," the document charged, adding "and its leadership is the chief-of-staff of a civil war apparatus." According to the organization, the Carabinieri police is in control of an umbrella anti-guerrilla structure with specially-picked full-time soldiers and magistrates.

KEKKONEN'S NEW YEAR ADDRESS TO NATION

LD011450 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1000 GMT 1 Jan 81

[President Urho Kekkonen's New Year Address to the Nation--live or recorded]

[Text] Citizens: A year ago I described international prospects for beginning the 1980's in dark colors. The process of detente had stopped and relations between the big powers had deteriorated in the 6 months following the Vienna summit. Unfortunately developments the past year do not give rise to a brighter appraisal, either.

The international situation is marked by general uncertainty and concern over tomorrow. The mutual mistrust and suspicion between the big powers seem to continue while the arms race is accelerating. Such a situation is, of course, nothing new or unprecedented. But today it is made serious by the development of military technology, the scope of which appears difficult for present-day man to realize fully. Although we have been able to avoid a world war for 35 years, big power relations have on several occasions deteriorated and international tension has broken out in over 100 regional conflicts. In the past decade, for instance, there was not a single day without war in some part of the world.

As the states of war have most often been areas remote from Finland, it has been easy for us to adopt an attitude of a self-satisfied outsider and imagine that we are safe. But I fear that such thinking may be a bad kind of self-deception. For instance, the crises of the past few months in the Middle East are of such a nature that they extend their influence all over the world.

In World War I over 5 million people lost their lives. World War II, which began only two decades later, claimed ten times that number. According to some estimates, in regional conflicts which have occurred since then, almost an equal number of people lost their lives. One can only imagine what a world war now would mean, even if nuclear weapons were not used. However, nuclear weapons mean a threat to the entire mankind through their mere existence. At present there are in the world's arsenals over 600,000 nuclear weapons, and their destructive power and accuracy continue to increase. Their total explosive power corresponds to about 4,000 kg of conventional explosives per every inhabitant of the globe.

We must also remember the fact that with technical and industrial development the number of states which in practice could manufacture nuclear weapons will increase. Now there ar only five actual nuclear powers. So far it has been possible to limit the increase in their number with the Nonproliferation Treaty concluded in 1968. But upholding this treaty system and its further strengthening have caused growing difficulties. It is a worrying sign of the times that the second review conference of the Nonproliferation Treaty, held in Geneva a few months ago, ended without reaching agreement on the final documents.

Discussion of the dangers of nuclear weapons has become very lively during the past year, particularly in Europe. Even on a limited scale such a war would cause immense destruction on our continent in particular. For this reason interest in nuclear-free zones has revived. In the Nordic countries, too, these questions are now being examined from a new viewpoint, which we Finns have noted with interest.

A year ago, I appealed strongly for the continuation of detente in Europe. In this respect my stand is unchanged. All possibilities for strengthening cooperation and for permanently reducing the danger of war should be used. This is the goal of Finland's initiative for drawing up a European disarmament program, which we have proposed for discussion at the Second CSCE review conference in Madrid. A similar effect would be derived through extending confidence-building in countries. In our view the first steps should be taken in Madrid for convening a European disarmament conference, despite the differences between the big powers.

Dear listeners: Here I have presented many gloomy views on the phenomena of the times. It is not, however, my intention to frighten anyone. I only want to arouse everyone of us to realize how important detente and the limitation of armaments are. The responsibility for peace extends also to individuals. I know that in our country there are several civic organizations and also many private individuals who have made a significant contribution for the benefit of peace and international mutual understanding. Last summer I noted with pleasure that in a short time the Nordic Women's Peace Address collected over half a million signatures. The appeal was simple and clear; it expressed a protest against war and the arms race in a way which everyone understands. I hope that women in particular will increasingly work towards the goal that our everyday work will more than before be marked by human warmth and respect for each other. In this way we can surely reduce the trend towards violence and its idealization, expressed in our society in different ways.

Citizens, at the beginning of the new year it is again pleasant to note that Finland's position in the world is good and stable. Despite international uncertainty we need not guess at our place. Our relations with other states are in order. During my recent visit to the Soviet Union I was able to note clearly how greatly our foreign policy is respected there and how strong our mutual trust is. Our economic cooperation is advancing in big steps for the benefit of both nations.

We Finns must work together in order to safeguard our future international position. This will guarantee us the prerequisites also for the internal development of our society in such a way that it will be a better place to live in for every citizen. We have a good country for which it is worth making efforts. I want to thank every citizen for the contribution made for the common good the past year and I wish you all happiness, success and peace in the new year.

KIPRIANOU DELIVERS MESSAGE FOR NEW YEAR

NC311510 [Editorial Report]--A press release by the Nicosia Public Information Office in Greek on 31 December carries Cypriot President Kiprianou's New Year message in which he says that the Cypriots view the coming days full of expectations, dreams and hopes. He adds that the main issue on our minds is that of the missing persons and stressed: "Great efforts have been exerted and are still being exerted in every direction and at all levels to persuade Turkey to cooperate on this purely humanitarian question. However, I cannot conceal my disappointment over the fact that mankind is being shaken--quite rightly of course--because in some country 50 hostages are being held, while in the case of Cyprus the same mankind has been watching indifferently for years the drama of thousands of relatives of missing persons." Kiprianou expresses admiration for the attitude of the relatives of missing persons.

The president of the republic also addresses greetings to the "heroic enclaved people," to the "uprooted refugees" and to all the Cypriot people, wishing them and their families happiness and voicing the hope that "1981 will be the beginning of the end of the Cyprus drama." He also addresses a "special message of friendship to the masses of Turkish Cypriots who are under foreign occupation" and adds that the Cypriot Government is struggling for the rights of all Cypriots--Turkish Cypriots, Armenians, Latins and Maronites--who are all equal citizens of the same state.

Referring to the forthcoming new round of the inter-Cypriot talks, Kiprianou says that "every effort has already been exerted and will be exerted, with all good will, in order to find common ground. However, this does not solely depend on us. This basically depends on whether or not the other side will abandon its partitionist intentions." He then stresses the need for the implementation of the UN resolutions which "include all the necessary elements for a viable and fair Cyprus solution. And mankind must point out to Turkey its obligations and must persuade it to implement these resolutions."

Concerning the internal organization of the Cyprus state, he says that "we have accepted biregional federation, and the dialogue is based on the UN resolutions and the summit agreements. However, when we talk about federation we mean true federation and not confederation or any other form of divisive solution."

He reiterates his desire to seek an "honorable Cyprus solution that will safeguard absolute freedom, independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity, unity and the nonalignment of the Cypriot state" and adds that this solution must "safeguard the Cypriot people's inalienable rights, including the most basic right of the refugees to return to their ancestral homes."

Kiprianou pays tribute to the assistance from the Greek Government and all the Greek political parties and points out the need for "unity in our internal front, because when the people are divided they can easily be conquered."

Concluding, the president says that during 1981 the government will intensify its efforts in all fields in order to achieve the highest possible degree of economic stability and social justice, pledges to favorably consider the problems of all the classes of the people, and calls all the people to support the state in its difficult task.

PASOK: GOVERNMENT APPROVES AEGEAN DEMILITARIZATION

AT311325 Athens NEWS in English 31 Dec 80 pp 1,4

[Text] Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK) leader Andreas Papandreou yesterday said he has reliable information that the government has accepted the gradual demilitarization of eastern Aegean islands as part of the deal allowing Greece's re-integration in the military structure of NATO. "It is our duty to warn the government," the main opposition leader said, "that demilitarization of the islands, which are under the immediate threat of the Turkish Armed Forces, would be a nationally unacceptable act."

He said he wanted to believe the government had no such intention, and called on Prime Minister Rallis to supply the necessary explanations to the Greek public.

Responding to Mr Papandreou's statement, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis said Mr Papandreou's information was "totally baseless."

Mitsotakis' statement prompted Mr Papandreou to respond by pointing out he had posed his question not to the foreign minister, but to the prime minister, and expected an answer only from him.

"We shall not accept subterfuges on the government's part" Papandreou said. "The matter is of immense national importance, and the prime minister must make a commitment, before the Greek people, that there will be no demilitarization as part of reintegration in NATO or the excellent relations the government is trying to establish with Turkey's military regime."

On a related subject, Defense Minister Averof yesterday denied there is any disagreement between him and Mr Mitsotakis concerning demilitarization of the Aegean islands. Reports to that effect were carried in a front-page article by yesterday's issue of the opposition evening daily TA NEA.

Mr Averof also stressed the need to normalize relations between Greece and Turkey and said choosing the right process toachieve this was the responsibility of the prime minister, the government, and ultimately, the Parliament.

Commenting on the issue raised in Mr Papandreou's second statement, government circles remarked later last night that Mr Mitsotakis' statement was made on behalf of the whole government. No further response to Mr Papandreou was called for, the same circles said.

Rallis Denies Papandreou's Charges

AT311341 Athens PRESS AND INFORMATION SECRETARIAT in Greek 31 Dec 80

[Text] Prime Minister Rallis has made the following statement: "I publicly reiterate the assurance which I have personally given to the leader of the official opposition, Andreas Papandreou, that the issue of the demilitarization of the [Aegean] islands was never put forth within the framework of our return to the alliance's military wing or otherwise. Consequently, the continuation of the discussion around this nonexistent issue does not serve the national interest."

TURKMEN COMMENTS ON GREEK ACCESSION TO EEC

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that the partnership relations between Turkey and the EEC will not be affected by Greece's full membership in the Community. Turkmen was replying to questions by the national press agency on Greece's full membership in the EEC as of today. He said the Community has thus far not been involved in the Turkish-Greek conflicts. He added: The Community has assured Turkey that it will not change its attitude as of 1 January 1981. Turkey has officially been informed that the Turkish-EEC partnership relations will not be affected by Greece's membership in the Community. Through joining the EEC, Greece has agreed to fulfill all that the community has undertaken vis-a-vis Turkey. Therefore, full membership, which is the basic goal of our partnership relations, has been accepted by Greece.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER OZAL LEAVES FOR CYPRUS

[Text] State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal has expressed the hope that 1981 will be a year when Turkey will progress and improve in all fields. Ozal went to Cyprus today as the guest of the president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas. In a statement to our correspondent at Esenboga Airport before his departure, Ozal said that he was going to Cyprus to rest but that he would have certain contacts with Turkish Cypriot officials. He said that he would then convey the results of these contacts to the Cyprus coordination council whose chairman is State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Zeyyat Baykara.

Ozal pointed out that on the eve of 1981 there were no longer any shortages of goods and that the transfer payments were being made in an orderly way. He expressed the belief that the growth of exports would continue and increase in the coming months.

VOTCP Assails Ozal Visit

[Station commentary: "An Economic Intervention in Cyprus"]

[Excerpts] Attention dear listeners: Turgut Ozal has arrived in Cyprus and this might spell disaster. Ozal arrived in Cyprus as the guest of Rauf Denktas with the intention of changing the economic structure [in the Turkish side] of Cyprus which is based on Public Economic Interprises [KIT]. The excuse for such a move is that these enterprises are incurring great losses each year and that the inflation rate has reached 128 percent. All this is happening in the so-called Turkish Federated State of Cyprus.

The truth is clear: Those who militarily intervened and occupied part of the island--under the excuse of saving the island and delivering the Turkish Cypriots from oppression--are preparing a new step to realize the plans of transforming the island into a springboard of imperialism and NATO for their own benefit. Ozal's Cyprus visit, which will last until 7 January, is only the beginning of an economic intervention of the Turkish big bouregoisie on behalf of imperialism, constituting a new and significant stage in this direction. The Turkish military intervention in Cyprus has inevitably brought its economic consequences with it.

If the inflation rate in that part of Cyprus ruled by Denktas has reached such a high rate, one of the main reasons is that the Turkish lira has been imposed there as the monetary unit.

The real aim of the economic intervention being implemented under the guise of solving the financial problems of the state enterprises and of restructuring the economy is to strengthen and confirm the economic alliance and conspiracy between the reactionary Denktas administration and the military junta and government in our country.

This economic intervention in Cyprus by Ozal--who has exacerbated our country's economic problems--and his team, is made worse by the fact that such a step was taken at a time when the intercommunal talks are being held in Cyprus. This is only proof that the reactionary Denktas administration and the junta are opposed to a lasting and peaceful solution to be attained in talks being held under the auspices of the UN special representative in Cyprus. The ruling bourgeoisie in Turkey has sent Ozal to visit Denktas and his men in a bid to prepare the ground to realize its colonialist aim of dividing the island.

The demands of our people and other peoples are final: All foreign troops should be withdrawn from Cyprus and all foreign and military bases of aggression should be removed. Let plans aimed at dividing the island and using it as a tool for imperialist adventures be foiled. The Cypriot people will find a solution to their problems under the auspices of the United Nations and the progressive world public without any foreign intervention.

MILLIYET ARMENIAN TERRORISM MAY BRING REACTIONS

NC021042 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 30 Dec 80 p 1,10

["Telex" column by Teoman Erel: "If Disorderly Reactions Break Out"]

[Excerpts] A young businessman was angrily saying: "A mere condemnation [of Armenian terrorism] is not enough. As long as we play it down, they are encouraged. From now on we must retaliate." The young son of a murdered Turkish diplomat stated: "I am going to join the National Intelligence Organization (MIT). I have devoted myself to retaliation. If necessary, I will take militant action by myself."

The passive and ineffective attitude of our state toward Armenian terrorism, which has been pursued mercilessly against our diplomats over the years, not only puts us to shame, but it also nourishes the seeds of aggressive reactions. If these crimes are allowed to go on unchecked and this tension continues to mount, uncontrollable and disorderly militancy may break out. Such a development would not only embarrass our state but it would also preoccupy some countries which were aroused to anger when the American hostages were captured but which maintained a taciturn attitude when the Turkish diplomats were murdered one after another.

We earnestly hope that the latest incident in Switzerland is not the first indication of what we feared might happen. An unknown person in Geneva badly manhandled a solicitor for undertaking to defend the two Armenian terrorists who were arrested following a bomb explosion. This was such a ferocious attack, with a chained stick, that solicitor Gerald Benoit's legs were fractured in three places and his face was badly bruised. The attacker managed to escape and the Swiss police has so far been unable to uncover anything about him.

Switzerland is an interesting country from the standpoint of Armenian terrorism. Several attacks have been directed at our diplomats, at their premises and in their cars, in this country. And yet, some Swiss papers did not fail to carry comments in support of Armenian terrorists.

We hope that the unknown person who attacked the solicitor in Geneva does not turn out to be a Turk who acted in a fit of terrible anger. And yet this is possible.

Who knows, perhaps the Armenians are trying to provoke our state and nation in order to drive us into committing fresh offenses so that they can resort to more effective propaganda in their efforts to explain their case to the world in a more striking manner. Whether such offenses are committed by our state or by our individual compatriots makes no difference.

If we explode, and if we react unjustly and unreasonably, we will give the Armenians an opportunity to revive their case. The Jews who were massacred by Hitler had secured the sympathy of the entire world, but we all know how unsympathetic they became following Israel's military attacks. We, therefore, have to be very cautious and take serious steps. Our state can indeed take effective measures. It can resort to serious "sanctions" in international relations against the states which support the Armenian terrorists.

Trade boycotts and similar actions "may bring to their senses" even the rich Armenians in Europe and the United States who are the greatest supporters of Armenian terrorism.

Let me refer to a letter which I have just received: A two-page copy of the text. The letter is signed by "fighters" and it is addressed to the "dear Turkish nation."

This letter maintains that some idealists and revolutionary youths got together and swore to plunge into acts of militancy against the Armenians in revenge. They sent a letter to the authorities asking for passports and financial help.... They pledged to kill 50 Armenians for every murdered Turk and another 50 nationals of the country where Armenian militancy is supported.

This is either a frenzied attempt resulting from terrible anger or else a new intrigue on the part of the Armenian propaganda to drive the Turks into a guilty position.

We advise all our indignant fellow countrymen to exercise patience and calmness. On the other hand, our state must take dignified but truly effective measures. The only way to counter disorderly, harmful actions is through the adoption of serious measures which would satisfy public opinion.

KREISKY INTERVIEWED ON CANDIDACY, FOREIGN POLICY

AU312115 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 31 Dec 80 pp 3, 5

[Manfred Scheuch and Josef Riedler interview with Austrian Federal Chancellor Kreisky on 29 December in Bad Hofgastein]

Kreisky: I can only say one thing. I accepted the assignment with pleasure in 1970, 1971, 1975 and 1979. But even in 1979 it was an exception, and I repeat with all emphasis: For my part I do not desire another nomination. On the contrary, properly speaking I hope that my activity is concluded with this. I would be glad if, on the strength of this, certain reflections were made. There is still much time left. After all, there is all of 1981 and there is also 1982.

Question: In 1980, the hotbeds of crisis in the world were not eliminated, and a few new ones have emerged and even though they are not burning at full blast, they smoulder dangerously. How do you see developments in 1981?

Kreisky: The year 1981 will be a difficult one because, concurrently with world economic problems, world policy problems remain unsolved as well. This is the great difference from the 1973-74 crisis. At that time, detente policy had reached a climax. Helsinki was a symptom of this. This is no longer possible today.

Thus 1981 is also filled with world policy problems. Europe is occupied above all by the question: How will things continue in Poland? The fact, that there was no military intervention must be evaluated positively. This is not only due to the justified assumption on the part of the Soviet Union that such intervention could not take place without resistance, but also to the awareness that it would mean an end to detente policy for many, many years to come.

The Afghanistan problem, which not only constitutes a burden on detente policy but also a tremendous burden on the Soviet Union, must be viewed at a certain distance from the former problem. When this war was started 1 year ago, people were certain that it would be concluded in the foreseeable future. However, an end cannot now be foreseen. I do not know whether solutions can be found or not. Much depends on the statesmen of the region. Great responsibility rests there with Indira Gandhi.

The strange war between Iraq and Iran has caused a further schism in the Islamic world. Iraq finds some support among the Arab states, Iran among some other Islamic states. In addition, there is the permanently unsolved problem of Lebanon. Nobody can say when civil war will flare up there again. There is also the Palestinian problem, where all one can do is hope that a new government in Israel next year will seek new avenues. Nobody knows whether this will be successful.

Here I would make a little remark: How much did the opposition fight the solution that I upheld? And now, if the newspapers are to be believed, the EEC points out rather similar proposals for a solution.

Question: Shimon Peres, the chief of the Israeli Labor Party, recently maintained in a interview that you have given a blank check to the PLO, which it does not intend to cash because it continues to insist on its program objective of destroying Israel.

Kreisky: I did not write a blank check. I only keep saying the same thing: As long as Israel is not willing to implement the second portion of the UN resolution by which Israel was founded--and only Israel can implement it--that there should also exist a Palestinian state next to the Israeli, one must not be surprised that movements exist ready to fight with all possible means, no matter how detestable. As long as the PLO cannot come to the negotiating table, it will be an organization which approves terror or organizes it itself. Since Irael stubbornly refuses to negotiate with the PLO, the PLO cannot be asked to put things to the test. I also believe that all the attempts to add to Camp David another "camp," perhaps with Jordan, will be abortive as long as Israel does not want to negotiate with the PLO. The PLO must be deprived of the reason for waging its struggle with all means, by Israel's accepting the human rights of the Palestinians to live in a state of their own.

Question: If you were to wish for something on Reagan's assumption of the U.S. Presidency, what would that be?

Kreisky: I believe that much understanding of European problems can be expected from the new president, because the new men he has handpicked, particularly Secretary of State Haig, are very well versed in this respect. I assume that as a secretary of state he will not insist on his former title of general--though we have not had any bad experiences with ex-generals, thinking of Marshall and Eisenhower.

I am more fearful about Latin America, where a policy will possibly be promoted that ultimately, even after an initial stability, can only degenerate into bloody civil war. I can only repeat one warning here: Just think how stable the West at one time considered the shah's regime. The finest army of the region, the most brutal police, and yet, when the day came, there was an uprising under the weight of which the shah's power collapsed like a shaky edifice in an earthquake. It is absolutely absurd, in my opinion, to believe that constant unrest in a democracy is something more insecure than the permanent insecurity that is ultimately provoked by a dictatorship. It is a delusion to believe that stable regimes can be set up in Latin America with guns, bayonets and secret police. This must end with a catastrophe some day. Persia is a warning of the past decade. He who fails to perceive this will live to see entirely different warnings in the coming decade.

GENSCHER URGES RESPONSIBLE FRG-GDR RELATIONS

[Text] Bonn, 2 Jan (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Genscher, chairman of the FDP, has called upon those holding positions of responsibility in the GDR to put into effect, together with the Federal Government, "a policy of responsibility" to reduce the tensions between the two German states.

Speaking in Bonn today, Genscher cited three "realistic aims," which would not have to be pursued jointly and in agreement with the partners in the European Community and the Western alliance, in fashioning the relations between the Federal Republic and The GDR:

1. No additional strains on East-West relations must emanate from the relations between the Federal Republic and the GDR. This must be taken into account by the policy of both states in any individual decision affecting the other.

2. The Federal Republic and the GDR "should endeavor also in their mutual relations to seek the greatest degree of fulfillment in the implementation of all parts of the Helsinki Final Act."

3. Both states should search for ways of cooperation in all sectors and not cordon themselves off from each other.

The policy of the Federal Government, Genscher stressed, fully accords with "this sober and realistic program of responsibility." This policy is expected by people in Germany and Europe; it corresponds to "the requirement of our time which demands cooperation and not confrontation."

Referring to statements by Federal Chancellor Schmidt and GDR State Council Chairman Honecker that no war must ever again emanate from German soil, Genscher said that in the Federal Republic's view the joint responsibility of the two German states must go even further than this important commitment. Likewise, additional tensions and strains on East-West relations must not emanate from German soil. "Yet bearing in mind that the latest measures taken by the GDR and some statements made there, this is what has happened." the FDP chairman said.

FDP BUNDESTAG OFFICIAL ON CITIZENSHIP ISSUE

[Excerpt] Munich/Hamburg, 3 Jan (DPA)--Uwe Ronneburger (FDP), the chairman of the Bundestag Committee on Inter-German Affairs, does not regard the problem of citizenship at issue between the Federal Republic and the GDR as "a problem of practical importance in terms of international law." In a Bavarian radio interview on Saturday night he said that a GDR citizenship has existed since the conclusion of the basic treaty in 1972. In this treaty Bonn recognized the GDR as a separate state with borders. In reply to a DPA question, Ronneburger explained: "If a state called the GDR exists, then there exists a GDR citizenship."

But Ronneburger, who is chairman of the Schleswig-Holstein SPD, left no doubt that the Federal Government adheres to its fundamental view and still denies the existence on German soil of two nations with separate citizenships. Nor can Bonn's attitude be changed by a GDR attempt at blackmail. The GDR's scope for further cordoning-off measures is circumscribed by the GDR's economic interests.

FRG DECIDES TO REJECT 1980 EC SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET

LD312044 Hamburg DPA in German 1906 GMT 31 Dec 80

[Excerpts] Bonn, 31 Dec (DPA)--The Federal Government has joined France and Belgium in rejecting the 1980 European Community supplementary budget. The supplementary budget, set by the European Community Commission at 100 million units of account--approximately DM250 million--had been raised to about DM900 million by the European Parliament. France, Belgium and the FRG consider this figure too high.

The Finance Ministry in Bonn confirmed that a meeting of the departments concerned yesterday decided to reject the budget and informed Brussels.

Gaston Thorn, the new EC Commission president, has only the option of suing the three countries before the European Court of Justice.

FDP OFFICIAL CALLS FOR JOINT EC DEFENSE POLICY

[Text] Bonn, 2 Jan (DPA)--Juergen Moellemann, foreign and defense policy spokesman of the FDP Bundestag group, has demanded a joint defense policy by the European Community within the framework of NATO. In an interview for WESTFAELISCHE RUNDSCHAU (Saturday edition) Moellemann said that "going-it-alone and parallel development in the arms and planning sector" would have to stop. Above all the constantly more expensive arms programs demanded cooperation and further standardization within the framework of a common European Community defense policy.

Moellemann "specifically" proposes "that the Europeans concentrate on conventional defense, leaving the nuclear umbrella to the United States." This would also help to raise the nuclear threshold, the use of nuclear arms in case of war. The FDP defense expert "specifically" rejects a European nuclear armed force. According to Moellemann, France's special role within the NATO alliance would be no obstacle to the Europeanization of defense policy. He could well imagine "that France was again on its way back into NATO." An edited version of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

SPD OFFICIAL ON SALT II TREATY, MILITARY BALANCE

DW021055 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0549 GMT 31 Dec 80

[Excerpts from reporter Lenz interview with Karsten Voigt, SPD Bundestag deputy; date and place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] A year ago the SPD feeling was that if SALT II were not ratified in the near future, if arms control negotiations did not begin, the party would reassess this issue and reach other conclusions on missile armament. Why does the party no longer discuss this issue?

[Answer] Now that it has become clear that the United States will not ratify the SALT II treaty, at least not in its present form, a discussion has begun by peace-oriented circles in the SPD and outside it on NATO's decision to close the arms gap, if it can be called that.

If the SALT process as a whole--a process which is the basis of nuclear parity between both big powers, one which has taken place and has been continued--if this process is called into question by the American side, which I hope will not happen, it really would create a new situation, also with regard to NATO's decision of December 1979. Since the whole arms control problem will be thought through again following the U.S. elections, this discussion will play a new role among the Western allies. It is important in this respect, for example, that some of the important parts of the NATO decision of December 1979 cannot be brought into harmony with the SPD congress decision of that same December 1979.

It is obvious that the concept of military balance naturally must be the basis for the SPD, and that a concept of military superiority could not be accepted by the SPD. The Social Democrats give political priority to arms control measures and arms control negotiations when it comes to defense policy decisions, and actually no compromises are possible on this issue.

[Question] Do you consider it feasible that the SPD might start a discussion on leaving the alliance if the Europeans are unsuccessful in calling attention to their aims in the alliance?

[Answer] No, I do not consider that very likely, actually I would rule it out from the very beginning. I believe that a reasonable American president, and I consider Republican President Reagan as such, must adhere to a concept of military balance and that he will continue the SALT process.

If a discussion arises in America, and that is legitimate, on changes in emphasis in American foreign and security policies under a Republican administration, it is absolutely clear that a discussion must begin again pointing out European interests in the Western alliance.

One must soberly state that the security policy situation in Western Europe has not deteriorated so dramatically in past years that there needs to be a frantic discussion on additional defense policy efforts. If we learn anything from the Polish events it is that after these events a Soviet military intervention or an attack on Western Europe has become even more unlikely than before. Therefore, we can calmly and unhurriedly think about expenditure policy, the priority of defense policy over other budget policy expenditures as well as on arms control policy concepts.

CITIZENS SEE GLOOMY ECONOMIC PROSPECTS FOR 1981

DW021323 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1200 GMT 31 Dec 80

[Excerpts from talk by Prof Elisabeth Noelle-Neumann, head of the Allensbach Public Opinion Poll Institute--live or recorded]

[Text] Two-thirds of the people are more or less worried. The people are afraid that an economic decline is looming ahead, a very clear decline, a strong decline like never before. We measure this with a question on whether the economic trend in the next 12 months will be upward or downward. Our replies to this question are: the economic trend will be downward, 51 percent and it will be upward, 9 percent. Looking over the figures for the last 15 years, I find that I have never had such a result before.

Some of our results show that political anxiety contributes to this result and that, subsequently, the anxieties of the people exert influence on ensuing economic developments.

It is true that the people have grown somewhat accustomed to the unemployment rate of the past few years. But now the people are obviously afraid that it will be much higher. In 1976, 13 percent of the people said that unemployment would increase, while 50 percent said it would go down. Now they are saying: increase, 73 percent, decrease, 4 percent. Thus you can see that the whole climate of opinion is changing.

But let me turn to another result which comes as a surprise to me: so far the people are not in a mood to tighten their belts. We asked them whether they had any austerity plans and were thus prepared for a potentially difficult future. In this area too, we have results of earlier years, and thus we found that actually no special austerity intentions are discernible to date. You could interpret this to mean that the mood of the people at the moment does not seem to be manifesting itself in a drastic restraint on consumption.

SAUDI ARABIA INTERESTED IN BUYING LEOPARD II TANKS

[Text] Hamburg, 3 Jan (DPA)--According to DER SPIEGEL, Saudi Arabia wishes to buy German Leopard II main battle tanks and other weapons. The report adds that Chancellor Schmidt is ready to conclude the deal. Should it come about, the report says, the Saudis have declared their readiness for "comprehensive economic-financial cooperation." However, DER SPIEGEL says the chancellor runs the risk of causing an international stir and new trouble with his own party. The export deal would be contrary to Bonn's principle of not supplying weapons to areas of tension.

According to the report, the desire to purchase German arms was expressed by King Khalid of Saudi Arabia during his visit to Bonn last June. Schmidt had replied that he would like to postpone the transaction until after the federal elections (on 5 October) but that he was in favor of arms aid for Saudi Arabia, because keeping the oil wells from the grasp of the Soviets was of paramount importance to the West. In pursuance of an even handed Middle East policy, the Federal Republic has not until now delivered weapons to Arab states maintaining a latent state of war with Israel.

According to DER SPIEGEL, among the offers made by Saudi Arabia in exchange for arms deliveries were long term credits at low interest rates and direct financial participation in German industrial firms. The Saudis also promised to buy installations for their chemical and steel industry to compensate for the cost of oil which would otherwise have to be paid for in foreign currency.

Government Refuses Comment

[Summary] Hamburg, 4 Jan (DPA)--DER SPIEGEL magazine reports that Saudi Arabia is interested in buying German Leopard II main battle tanks and other weapons.

"The Federal Government refused today to comment on the report. A spokesman said the Federal Government had no cause to comment. Nor could he confirm that the Saudi wishes, mentioned by DER SPIEGEL, had been put to the Federal Government in the form of 'concrete proposals.'"

SCHMIDT TO MAKE 'FRIENDSHIP VISIT' TO MOROCCO 6 JAN

[Text] Bonn, 4 Jan (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will on Tuesday end a 10-day holiday on the Spanish island of Gran Canaria in the Atlantic and pay a brief official visit to Morocco. He will fly from Gran Canaria to Marrakech where he will meet King Hassan II. Schmidt is to fly back to Germany on Wednesday.

In Bonn, the chancellor's visit is seen as a friendship visit to a pro-Western Third World country with which the Federal Republic has markedly good relations. Apart from bilateral relations, the conflict surrounding the Western Sahara, in which Morocco has for 5 years been involved with Algeria, Libya and the Polisario Liberation Front, is likely to be a topic in Schmidt's talks in Marrakech.

Bonn favors a nonviolent settlement of the Sahara conflict by the parties concerned and is seeking good relations with all Maghreb states. In this connection it is pointed out in Bonn that Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher is visiting Algeria from 11-13 January and last week met Libyan Foreign Affairs Secretary Ahmad ash-Shahati in Bonn.

GISCARD COMMENTS ON SECURITY FOR AFRICAN STATES

[Text] Paris, 3 Jan (AFP)--President Valery Giscard d'Estaing has promised that France would respond to appeals from any state for help to maintain its security. He was replying to new year's greetings from those countries, mainly in French-speaking Africa, which have special agreements with France.

"France is convinced that only free, prosperous and interdependent states are capable of assuming their destiny," the French president said. France also has a "natural inclination to support states which ask for help towards their security," President Giscard d'Estaing added.

"The strengthening of the independence of each of your states is, for France, a duty and a guarantee. Our peoples can jointly preserve themselves from unacceptable interference and effectively serve the community of man," he said. "There is no more serious offence to Africa than to compromise its security," the president said.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing stressed that France had not intefered in the internal situation in Chad. It "has fulfilled and will always fulfill the engagement it has underwritten." He added that "no effort must be spared to restore a peaceful climate in Chad and to avoid the intrusion of new hegemonies there."

The French president spoke also of the economic situation in France's allied states, stressing the danger of population movement from rural areas to towns and calling upon them to concentrate efforts on rural development. France wished to exercise economic cooperation, he added.

"France proposes but never imposes its cooperation, it seeks and will constantly seek to improve its methods. France will pursue and increase this effort. The French-speaking countries of Africa can and must, by their cohesion, play a decisive role."

MITTERRAND EDGES GISCARD IN ELECTION POLL

[Text] Paris, 5 Jan (AFP)--Socialist leader Francois Mitterrand has for the first time nudged his way ahead of French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing by 51-49 percent in a public opinion poll published today on how people will vote in the presidential election next April.

In the 1974 presidential election Mr Mitterrand was the candidate for the Socialist-Communist "Union of the Left" and in the second round runoff he lost by a mere 344,000 votes, or less than one-half of one percent of the electorate.

The poll was taken by the "Indice-Opinion" firm between last December 18-24 which queried 1,014 people as a representative cross section of the French population of just over 52 million.

No candidate is likely to get the necessary 50 percent plus one vote in the first round, so the question was asked: "In the event of a Mitterrand-Giscard runoff who would you vote for?"

The answer: Mitterrand - 51 percent, Giscard - 49 percent.

The poll was commissioned for the independent daily QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS, which commented: "for the first time in a poll, Mitterrand beats Giscard."

"Serious things are happening, and Giscard is in the through of the wave," the paper added.

HELSINKI VIEWS NORWEGIAN STAND ON NUCLEAR-FREE ZONE

LD031108 Helsinki International Service in English 0930 GMT 3 Jan 81

[Text] Norway has expressed interest in strengthening the nuclear-free character of the north. Norwegian Prime Minister Odvar Nordli specified in his New Year's address his country's views on creating a nuclear weapons-free zone in northern Europe.

Finnish television news analyst Knud Moeller noted on Friday that the statement by Prime Minister Nordli indicates that changes have taken place over the years. At the time of the original suggestion by President Kekkonen in 1963 for a nuclear weapons-free north, Norway and Denmark noted that the north already was a nuclear weapons-free area since these countries had refused to accept nuclear weapons on their territories in peacetime. In his statement on Thursday Mr Nordli noted that a nuclear weapons-free north could be achieved as part of a wider arrangement. Our news analyst Knud Moeller said that Mr Nordli apparently meant the same as Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg in December. Mr Stoltenberg said then that if the north were to be made nuclear weapons-free the Soviet Union should remove (?tactical) nuclear weapons that could be directed at Norway.

Soviet reactions to these (?statements) are negative. This was reflected, for instance, in a comment released by the news agency APN before the end of the year. In a commentary Igor Pavlov noted that in a discussion on a nuclear weapons-free north a number of unrelated and unrealistic things had been put forward. Mr Pavlov pointed out that the Soviet Union is a nuclear power, while the Nordic countries are not. If the Soviet weapons in the Kola Peninsula, for instance, were to form the subject of discussion, U.S. weapons in the corresponding areas should also be discussed. In Pavlov's opinion, the main issue is to obtain guarantees that the United States would give up directing nuclear weapons against the Soviet Union from Danish and Norwegian territory.

The Norwegian prime minister said in his speech that he favored solving the problem in a wider framework. Radio Finland's news analyst said that Mr Nordli perhaps meant that the zone should also cover the Kola Peninsula and the Baltic region. If this is the case, Radio Finland's news announcer noted, Mr Nordli's statement will certainly not be the last in this discussion that has continued over the years. Mr Nordli's comments have, of course, a local political background in Norway as well. His statement was apparently aimed at reducing the criticism also from within his own Labor Party resulting from the projected U.S. weapons storage. There (?is) currently a popular movement in Norway for a nuclear weapons-free zone. This movement also includes Labor Party members.

SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC CHAIRMAN ENDORSES SWEDISH SUMMIT

LD021041 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 27 Dec 80 p 6

[TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA interview with Finnish Social Democratic leader Kalevi Sorsa: "Disarmament Meeting Should be Held in Stockholm in 1982"]

[Text] Helsinki--"An international summit on disarmament should be held in Stockholm in 1982. The participating countries should be those which took part in the 1975 CSCE conference in Helsinki."

So said Finnish Diet member Kalevi Sorsa, chairman of the Finnish Social Democratic Party and former prime minister, in an interview with TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA.

Sorsa has headed a working group with the Socialist International which recently put forward its proposals on disarmament, peace and progress in a world where the arms race is accelerating the whole time.

The Swedish Government announced as early as this spring that it was prepared to host just such a European disarmament conference. The proposal has been put forward at the CSCE meeting in Madrid this fall, the second follow-up conference since the Helsinki meeting.

"The Madrid conference will resume after a long Christmas break," Sorsa said. "The second phase begins at the end of January, when the representatives of the new U.S. administration will be present. In my opinion it then ought to be possible to reach a decision in principle for a disarmament conference."

The nations will then need time to plan the conference in detail, but things should be ready by 1982, Sorsa thinks.

Thirty-five states took part in the CSCE conference in Helsinki, including the Soviet Union, West Germany and the United States.

"Our party gives its total support to the proposals for a disarmament conference and would be pleased to see the conference take place in Sweden, a neutral country which would be well suited to the purpose. The Finnish initiative could be united with the Swedish proposal," Sorsa said.

Sorsa pointed out that detente and disarmament have become even more urgent goals for Scandinavia following the NATO decision on the deployment in Europe of nuclear-armed cruise missiles. They are a response to the Soviet Union's SS-20's, which are missiles armed with nuclear warheads. These so-called Eurostrategic arms could violate Scandinavian airspace to reach their targets.

"Scandinavia is at a crossroads," Sorsa said. "Especially because NATO's strategic targets are situated on the Kola Peninsula, Scandinavia cannot isolate itself from what is happening in Europe."

[Question] Can small states like those in Scandinavia play a role in this context?

[Answer] Experience shows that small states have a good chance of influencing developments when superpower relations are tense. It is then that they have the chance to take initiatives. Part of the detente that emerged in the seventies has not been lost, but I believe that the superpowers are still willing to listen to us.

[Question] What is your view of the contingency stockpiling of U.S. arms and ammunition in Norway?

[Answer] Neither I nor the party have adopted any position on this. We only hold the view in principle that every measure which increases tension in Scandinavia is to be regretted from the Finnish viewpoint. It is impossible to say definitely whether contingency stockpiling will lead to increased tension. But it has caused a lively debate about security policy as a whole in Norway, a discussion which has lead to new ideas.

Sorsa believes Kekkonen's old proposal for a nuclear-free zone in Scandinavia has gained renewed interest recently, especially since the call for nuclear-free Scandinavia came from leading Social Democrats in Norway.

"When Kekkonen first put forward his proposal, opinion in Norway and Denmark was negative, especially in Norway," Sorsa pointed out. "Now the proposal is being discussed with much less prejudice."

CARRINGTON: USSR SEES AFGHAN ROLE AS 'GREAT ERROR'

LD051010 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0912 GMT 5 Jan 81

[Text] [no dateline as received] Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington claims in a BBC-TV Panorama interview tonight that the invasion of Afghanistan would now be viewed in the Kremlin as "a great error" and "a great misjudgement."

"I would hazard a guess that one of the reasons why so far at any rate the Soviet Union has not intervened militarily in Poland is their knowledge that there would be a very sharp reaction--sharper reaction, indeed, from the West than there was in Afghaistan," he tells David Dimbleby in a filmed interview recorded on Friday.

Lord Carrington said that the invasion of Afghanistan just over a year ago had set Third World opinion against the Soviet Union and had been very damaging to East-West relations and "enormously damaging" in terms of arms limitation and the SALT II treaty.

While the Afghan rebels had no chance of defeating the Soviet Army, Lord Carrington said: "I think they have a chance of making things so unpleasant for the Soviet Union that it is more likely that there will be a negotiated settlement that everyone can live with."

The interview with Lord Carrington tonight will be shown the same evening as the three Labour MPS set off on their controversial fact-finding tour of Afghanistan.

The mission at the invitation of the Soviet-backed government in Kabul is understood to have earned Mr Ron Brown (Leith), Mr Allen Roberts (Bootle) and Mr Robert Litherland (Manchester Central) the disapproval of some Labour colleagues at Westminster. Conservative backbenchers have denounced it openly.

The mission, which will be the first by British parliamentarians since the Soviet invasion, has the support of the friends of Afghanistan society in Britain. The society supports the Afghanistan administration, and its secretary, Mr Mohammed Arif, will be accompanying the MPS.

Yesterday about 300 people demonstrated in central London against the invasion. The march, organized jointly by the Afghan Voice Committee and the Moslem Solidarity Committee ended with a delegation of six delivering a letter to the Russian Embassy condemning the Soviet invasion.

UN SPECIAL REPRESENTATIVE RETURNS TO RESUME TALKS

[Text] Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, returned to Cyprus this afternoon. In a statement on his arrival, Gobbi said that during the new round of talks, the same procedure would be followed as in the previous rounds because it had proved to be the most realistic approach. Gobbi said he was very optimistic that progress would gradually be made and expressed the hope that both sides would continue to show the same commonsense they had been demonstrating thus far. Answering a question, Gobbi said there were not any specific proposals by UN Secretary General Waldheim for the time being. Asked if he was conveying any message from Waldheim, Gobbi said the secretary general's message was that he was following the problem with particular attention, not only for political but also for sentimental reasons.

Gobbi left the island on 9 December and attended the UN Security Council meeting that approved the extension of UNFICYP's mandate in Cyprus. He also took part in recent meetings in New York between UN Secretary General Waldheim and Foreign Minister Rolandhis, during which they conducted a review of the Cypriot issue.

RAUF DENKTAS ISSUES STATEMENT FOR NEW YEAR

TA311953 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 31 Dec 80

[Text] The President of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, has said that the Turkish Cypriots would continue to act with good will in the intercommunal talks in the new year. In a statement he issued on occasion of the new year, Denktas pointed out that the talks had not yet brought the two communities closer together in the basics. He said: An agreement will be signed which will be worthy of the struggle waged by our people, which will ensure the security our people deserve, which will not turn out people--who became refugees three times during the past 20 years--into refugees once again, and which will never allow the past to recur. That agreement will then be submitted to the votes of the people. That is why we are starting 1981 with confidence. We are determined and we have faith in God in connection with every aspect of the problem.

DENKTAS CRITICIZES KIPRIANOU'S NEW YEAR MESSAGE

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that if the statement made by the leader of the Greek Cypriot community, Kiprianou, to the effect that the Turkish Cypriot community, which is the cofounder of the Cyprus Republic will be granted equal rights--thus status--with the 2,000-member Armenian and the 5,000-member Maronite communities reflects Kiprianou's true policy, then he has sabotaged the basis of the intercommunal talks. Noting that this statement shows how difficult it is to achieve a federation based on full equality, with a person of such a mentality, Denktas added: Mr Kiprianou has a sick imagination and crippled view because he imagines himself to possess the authority to grant rights and status to the Turkish Cypriot community which has partnership rights in the independence of Cyprus, because he is unable to realize the basic rights and status of the Turkish Cypriot community which the savage Greek Cypriot masses tried to usurp through the force of arms, and because he refuses to see that the Turkish Cypriot community has established in the north an administration as responsible and authorized as the Greek Cypriot one.

Denktas said that as soon as the UN special representative, Gobbi, arrives in the island, he will ask for an explanation in connection with Kiprianou's statement and that [words indistinct] with a regrettable situation. He concluded by saying that the Turkish Cypriot side could not be held responsible for it.

KARAMANLIS STATEMENT ON 1 JAN ACCESSION TO EC

AT021354 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 1 Jan 81

[Statement by President of the Republic Konstandinos Karamanlis to Eurovision on 1 January]

[Text] As of today Greece has become the 10th member of the EC. This is a historic day for my country because, through its accession, a new chapter has begun in its long history. Greece is recovering its position in the family of European people with which it is linked by historical and cultural ties and common political and economic interests.

Personally, I believe in the potential and future of Europe. Its population, economy and technology permit it not only to successfully solve its problems but to decisively influence the course of humanity. However, it cannot utilize this potential except through its unification. I appreciate the difficulties but I consider them a motivation, not an obstacle to European unification. I believe that under the pressure of precisely these difficulties, sooner or later, Europe will be united.

Greece is entitled and wants to contribute to this great effort which will constitute the most significant event in our continent's history. I am fully aware of the efforts we must make to meet the obligations which accession has created for us: I am also aware of the opportunities it offers to us for developing our activities within the very broad area of the EC.

I am sure that the Greek people will successfully meet this historic challenge and will vindicate the trust with which their future partners are welcoming them. And I feel deep personal satisfaction because the constant vision and firm faith in the European fate of my country are being vindicated today. I take this opportunity to wish all of you progress and peace in the new year.

NEWSPAPERS TAKE POSITIONS ON ACCESSION TO EC

MESIMVRINI 2 Jan Column

["Positions" column]

[Text] Regardless of how much many people want (some deliberately, some unwittingly) to underestimate it, regardless of how much some people (all of them deliberately) try to slander it, regardless of the fact that there are some people who (truly) fear it... our country's accession on New Year's Day--yesterday--became a reality and perhaps is the most important event in 20th century Greek history since the Balkan wars.

As then, when the victories of the Greek Army brought the Greek flag--that is, freedom and national independence--to territories that had been enslaved until that time, the Greek flag, which flutters among the flags of the other nine advanced European countries, now extends that freedom and consolidates our country's national independence. More simply: As of yesterday, Greece became a greater nation.

ELEVTHEROTIPIA 2 Jan Column

AT021419 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 2 Jan 81 p 1

[The "Opinions" column: "We and the EC"]

[Text] Yesterday Greece became the 10th member of the EC with all the rights and obligations, burdens and facilities, profits and losses, pros and cons which this revolutionary development for our country entails.

What is this community, the EC, of which today we are an organic part? Is it Jesus who with the five loaves "satiated the 5000", as some responsible people have presented our accession? Or is it Dracula who sucks the blood of the poor and the defenseless, as some of the EC's enemies want to present it?

It is neither one nor the other. As usually happens with such extreme positions, the truth lies somewhere in the middle. The EC is a giant--a complex mechanism inside which all the issues concerning the 10 partners constantly arise and are under constant intracommunal negotiation.

The outcome of each issue, that is whether the outcome will be beneficial or deleterious for one or the other partner, depends on this negotiation process because the EC's influence--which is taken for granted from the outset--on economic, cultural and commercial affairs and even on laws and the foreign policies of every member-state, through skillful maneuvers, can be "channeled" in accordance with the wishes of the interested party and finally be utilized to its benefit.

Therefore, herein lies a new, terrible challenge for Greece. By participating in all Community organs, not as an observer--anymore that is, as a poor relative--but as an equal and dynamic partner who can voice an opinion about the course of the entire community, Greece should utilize every iota of the possibilities for negotiation that are offered to it by the internal EC regulations, taking positions that are nationally beneficial.

However, in order to implement this important and difficult goal, first a clear and organized Greek "community policy" must be charted; at the same time, our entire state machine should be set in motion in order to coordinate its tempo with the dizzying orbit which the Community follows.

If we add to these two elements the necessary continuous briefing of the country's productive forces on the great competition which awaits them and which they will encounter with each step, we have the triad of success in this historic adventure which our people entered yesterday without even having to be asked.

I KATHIMERINI 3 Jan Editorial

AT031455 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 3 Jan 81 p 5

[Editorial: "Historic Turn"]

[Text] Greece became a complete, equal member of the EC the day before yesterday. It is an organic part of a broad political, economic and cultural entity with worldwide prestige.

This is an event of historical dimensions and it will seal the fate of modern Hellenism. For this reason it was the central and basic subject of the New Year messages that were addressed to the Greek people by both the president of the republic and the country's prime minister.

Greece's accession to the EC has been a fundamental political choice. The agents of the policy have been chosen by the majority of Greek people, a majority that extends well beyond the ruling party and the government majority in Parliament. In addition to the ruling party which has the majority in the Chamber of Deputies, other political alignments, even among the left, have supported our country's accession to the EC.

In two elections, these political alignments--the first of which was the ruling party--presented this political choice to the Greek people as one of the basic elements of their political programs. Thus they did not merely have the right but also the obligation to implement it.

We sincerely believe that the choice was the best--or rather the only one possible--within the given historical-political situation which, in addition to other things, is characterized by great complex political, economic and state entities of worldwide prestige; the EC is the only such great entity in which Greece could and should accede, and the obvious reasons have repeatedly been analyzed by us and others. These reasons are political and economic--and interconnected. As the president of the republic stressed--for the umpteenth time--in his message the day before yesterday, through its accession to this broader entity of free and advanced European people, Greece rids itself of the need to seek "protectors" and "guardians" and of the drifting into those exclusive dependencies of the past that have cost us so much.

At the same time, the road has been opened toward economic and social progress and prosperity within the measures and levels that are in force in the Community--if and when we make the necessary adjustments and exert the required efforts.

Those people who deny or dispute this choice as such speak of "regionality" of "loss of identity" and so forth. That Greece is a regional country constitutes an objective fact that is not the result of participation in the Community. On the contrary, our non-participation would make us even more "regional." By staying outside the European Community Greece would have all the disadvantages of "regionality" without any of the many advantages of accession among which is particpation in the unifying processes and in the decisionmaking centers for formulating Community policy.

Of course it is an unfortunate coincidence that accession is taking place at a time when the whole world, especially Europe, is facing a deep multilateral crisis, economic and otherwise. But, as the president of the republic observed in his New Year message, our country's situation would be much worse if it had remained alone within the maelstrom.

Greece's accession to the EC creates both obligations and great opportunities and possibilities. If we successfully meet the challenge--we can if we want--a broad avenue will open up to us. The final outcome is up to all of us--state, individuals, aggregates, the public and private sectors. It depends on the utilization of all possibilities. Things, institutions and situations become what people make them.

It is up to all of us to utilize the fundamental choice we have made through the kinds and quality of our positions, behavior and deeds....

COMMERCE MINISTER ANNOUNCES 1981 IMPORT GOALS

[Excerpts] Commerce Minister Kemal Canturk has said that imports in 1981 are expected to reach $9 billion. In a news conference in Ankara today the minister announced the details of the 1981 import program. Canturk said that imports in 1981 will be comprised of $2 billion in capital goods, $6.750 billion in semimanufactured goods and raw materials, and $250 million in consumer goods.

Canturk said that imports have been programmed in a way that will result in an increased production in the industrial sector, thus serving to stabilize the prices of manufactured goods in the local markets as well as to boost the export of industrial goods.

Canturk said the import of oil and other oil products in 1981 was programmed to reach $4.2 billion. This, he said, represented the largest item in the import program. He added that $700 million in fertilizers was also to be imported in 1981.

Canturk said that according to a change in the import regulations, import quota lists were abolished and replaced by liberation lists [that require no import license]. Canturk said that 94 goods in the quota lists have been included in the existing first liberation list and the remaining 206 goods were added to the existing second liberation list. With this change, the minister said, import formalities have been greatly reduced. The deposits to the Central Bank of 15 percent or 30 percent of the amount of goods to be imported from the existing first liberation list have been reduced to 10 percent for industrialists and to 20 percent for importers. Canturk said that several other changes were effected in an effort to simplify import procedures. Import licenses will now be valid for 4 months and the time required for the import to be effected has been increased to 12 months.

Canturk said that the new import regulations would prevent the shortage of any goods in the market. He added that these (?measures) and improvements would be successful only if accompanied by the stabilization of the economy and by labor peace.

Referring to exports, Canturk pointed out that exports in November 1980 reached $321.5 million, an amount 54 percent greater than during the same month in 1979. Recalling that this figure was the biggest monthly export figure ever reached, Canturk said that exports during the first 11 months of 1980 had reached $2.338 billion, which equalled the amount of exports during the whole of 1979.

HURRIYET STRESSES GOVERNMENT SUPPORT OF DENKTAS

[Ziya Akcapar report]

[Text] Nicosia, (HURRIYET)--The identity of views reached and the principles established in Ankara between TFSC President Rauf Denktas and the authorities of the Turkish Republic on the Cyprus issue compel the Greek Cypriot administration "either to discontinue intercommunal negotiations or to recognize the Turkish Cypriot administration."

Principles governing the opening of Varosha and other aspects of the issue have been "unofficially" communicated to the Greek Cypriot administration. Kiprianou held an extraordinary meeting of the Council of Ministers and evaluated the situation in the light of the information communicated to him.

According to information received, the principles on which agreement is reported to have been reached in Ankara constitute, in effect, a written form of the call made in 1978 "for the opening of Varosha" and of the conditions which this cable contained.

According to this call, "the area" to be opened to the return of the Greek Cypriots in Varosha begins from the south of the Sandy Beach hotel so that the security of the Famagusta harbor is not jeopardized. Those who return to this area will be entitled to run the tourist facilities freely provided a prior inquiry is held about them. According to the provisional status, those Greek Cypriots who will be allowed to return to Varosha must not have taken an active part in the criminal networks of EOKA or shed Turkish blood.

As suggested by UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim, the opening of Varosha to settlement under the "provisional status" depends on the implementation of the practical measures envisaged in article 6 of Denktas-Kiprianou agreement which stipulate the creation of mutual confidence and cooperation between the two communities.

The most important points on which the Turkish Cypriot side insists regarding practical measures envisage the immediage lifting of the economic embargo imposed on the Turkish Cypriot community and the economic siege around Famagusta harbor and Ercan Airport, granting to the Turkish Cypriot side their full share of all aid extended to the Cyprus Republic and the recognition of all the financial rights of the Turkish Cypriots which have been usurped by the Greek Cypriot administration since 1963.

When these conditions are fulfilled, the opening of Varosha to settlement under a provisional status will depend on the acceptance by the Greek Cypriot side of these prerequisites:

A. The laws to be enacted in the legislative assembly of the TFSC shall be valid in the region to be opened to settlement.
B. Entry and exit to the area will be under the control of the TFSC.
C. The administration of the town will run by a three-member committee. This committee will be composed of a Turkish Cypriot, a Greek Cypriot and a representative of the United Nations.

VOTCP DENOUNCES TURGUT OZAL'S ECONOMIC POLICIES

[Station commentary: "The Bankruptcy of the 25 January Decisions"]

[Text] An IMF delegation, which has been in Turkey for a long time, is now drawing up a new report. It has been pointed out that this report will deal extensively with the country's economic, political and financial situation. It seems that the third slice of credits the IMF will extend to Turkey will depend upon this report to be submitted to the IMF administrative board. It is already being said, however, that the report will be approved by the board. The reason is that Turkish economic program, or the 25 January decisions, which were prepared in line with the IMF's recommendations, have been and are still being implemented. That is exactly why the economic crisis in Turkey has reached its present impasse.

The day the 25 January decisions were implemented, the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] stressed that this antiworker policy, prepared under IMF pressure and aimed at solving the crisis in the country in the interest of the monopolies and imperialism, would drag the country to the brink of collapse. A year has passed and the present situation proves the TCP's prediction. The 25 January decisions made the life of the people intolerable, reinforced Turkey's dependence on imperialism, increased the monopolies' profiteering and increased the country's domestic and foreign debts.

For example, the Turkish lira was devalued 14 times during 1 year as a result of the 25 January decisions. One U.S. dollar was 70 Turkish liras at the beginning of 1979; now it is almost 90 liras. On the other hand, the inflation rate is higher than 100 percent. The State Planning Organization says that this rate will soon reach 150 percent. During this year, unprecedented price hikes were made on basic foodstuffs, on clothing, coal, and so forth. Our people entered the new year with price hikes. The latest hike was on Sumerbank [State Economic Enterprise of Textiles] products, which rose by 5 to 10 percent. Earlier, great price hikes were made on sugar, electricity, coal and medicine. Officials have said that the price of wheat will also be raised soon. The price of bread rises steadily, anyway. The foreign trade deficit rose in 1 year from $2.8 billion to $4.1 billion. Foreign debts, including the interest increase, amounted to $25 billion. The budget deficit was more than 105 billion liras. The growth rate regressed to minus 2.2 percent in 1 year.

All these clearly show that the program of Turgut Ozal [state minister and deputy prime minister] went bankrupt. In fact, we are not the only ones who are saying it. Certain circles that supported the 25 January decisions at the beginning are now criticizing them. They are taking a position against Turgut Ozal's economic policies. For example, even the Sabanci group [Sabanci Holding Company] openly announced the failure of the 25 January decisions. A report by the Turkish industrialists' and businessmen's association also talk about the failure of this policy.

In its recent programs, the Turkish Radio and Television Corporation [TRT] has been refraining from broadcasting news items that show the failure of the 25 January decisions. For example, it announced that with an inflation rate of more than 130 percent, Israel was the leading country in the world, but failed to mention the situation in Turkey. This is a deliberate policy. The TRT is trying to conceal the facts from the people. It is trying to conceal the fact that Turgut Ozal's 25 January decisions placed the greatest burden of the economic crisis on the shoulders of the workers.

Dissatisfaction is growing among the working masses who see upon their shoulders the frighteningly high cost of living, the unemployment, which has reached great dimensions, and the lack of confidence in the future. This dissatisfaction will constitute the basis of the powerful actions of the future.

VOTCP CONSIDERS TCP PROSPECTS FOR NEW YEAR

[Station commentary]

[Excerpts] Were the possibilities for struggle of the Turkish working class and the democratic forces completely eliminated when the military dictators seized power in Turkey? Has the sovereign bourgeoisie fully attained its goals? It would be useful for the democratic struggle to answer these questions as we are entering 1981. The Turkish Communist Party [TCP], which views and assesses the developments in the country in the light of Marxism-Leninism--the most progressive science of our era--looks at the future with optimism.

It is true that a military dictatorship rules the country today. A series of gains made by the working class and the progressive and democratic forces following harsh struggles were eliminated under this atmosphere. The Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] and other mass unions were closed down and so were labor parties. All the organizations that defend the rights of the working class, the peasants, the small manufacturers, the civil servants, the youth, the teachers and female workers and that act in favor of national independence and democratic rights and freedoms were banned. Investigations were begun of the leaders of DISK, the Turkish Teachers' Unity and Solidarity Association [TOB-DER] and the Union of Cooperatives for Village Development and other Agricultural Goals [KOY-KOOP] for violating article 141 of the penal code. Trials began of patriots within the Kurdish democratic movement and their democratic organizations on the grounds that they engaged in secessionism. A series of pressure laws were passed in a more severe form. The new tax law is aimed at dividing the workers and turning them against each other. Bills were prepared that almost eliminate the rights to strike, sign collective wage contracts and hold meetings or demonstrations.

Despite the ban on the TCP, during the period prior to the military coup, labor parties, unions and democratic organizations had extensive possibilities for legal activity. The massive struggles waged by the working class and the toilers had further increased these possibilities.

Currently, under the dictatorship of the junta, these gains are lost and the possibilities eliminated. However, has the sovereign bourgeoisie fully attained its goal? The current complex structure of the country demonstrates that the collaborationist and monopolistic bourgeoisie has not fully attained its goal, because the struggle possibilities of the democratic forces have not been eliminated completely despite all the obstacles, bans and difficulties. Above all, the TCP is standing upright. The TCP as well as a series of democratic organizations and the enlightened sections of these organizations are continuing their struggles illegally despite the difficult conditions.

Furthermore, the class union movement has not been eliminated. The grass roots of the Turkish Confederation of Labor [Turk-Is] constitutes a great potential for the organized struggle of the working class. If lessons are learned from past experiences and unity of action is established among the TCP, the labor parties and Kurdish democrats, then this could affect the other forces as well and draw them into the area of action. It could further increase the possibilities for struggle, since a large democratic sector that is not affected by the pressures is currently supporting the junta in one way or another. This situation can be reversed with the establishment of such unity of action.

Moreover, the existence of the military dictatorship has created an atmosphere conducive to the emergence of conflicts within the army. Despite all the efforts by the junta to unite the different tendencies, the objective reasons exacerbating the conflicts between these tendencies are still present.

As long as the junta continues to pursue the same economic policy, both internal conflicts and social conflicts will be further aggravated and the people will be further impoverished. Under the present conditions created by the junta, the existence of these conflicts create wide possibilities for the democratic forces. The democratic forces will attain more suitable conditions for struggle when these conflicts are further exacerbated and sharpened by adopting a flexible attitude. The large toiling masses will thus see more clearly that the junta is not able to solve any of the problems it faces. When all this is considered in the long range, it shows that the conditions for struggle have been complicated. However, the possibilities for struggle have not been eliminated and they will be increased.

It is true that there has been a split among democratic forces under the junta. However, this is a temporary phenomenon. A section of the democratic forces is currently supporting the junta for not openly complying with all imperialist pressures and for adopting a front against fascist terrorist organizations as well. Consistent democratic forces, on the other hand, grasp the threat more easily than projunta forces and adopt a firm stand against the junta. They realize that the junta cannot solve any of the country's problems and that it will, on the contrary, exacerbate the crisis. They know that the conditions for the unity of the democratic forces will mature even under the junta.

The world balance of power is still changing in favor of socialism. The struggle between the two systems will influence the developments in Turkey as well. The greatest possibility for the struggles of the working class rests with its Marxist-Leninist party. It is now a more pressing duty for communists to strengthen the TCP and wage a consistent struggle to further consolidate its ties with the masses.

The main duties included in the 1981 struggle agenda consist of protecting with revolutionary fervor the employment, land, freedom and independence wishes of the masses, organizing them and drawing them into organized actions against imperialist pressures, monopolistic exploitation and the proimperialist and promonopolistic policy of the junta. As noted in the December issue of ATILIM, this period emerges as one of preparation for a more final and open clash between reactionaries and progressive forces; between those in favor of perpetuating the military dictatorship and establishing a fascist system and those in favor of a transition to democracy; between imperialists and the decisive majority of the nation; between the collaborationist and monopolistic bourgeoisie and the people; and between the bourgeoisie and the proletariat. No class or political force has yet stated its stand openly.

FINANCE MINISTER VIEWS 1981 ECONOMIC POLICY

[Article by Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer]

[Text] Duesseldorf, 30 Dec--Now that the election campaign is over, an objective line increasingly has been gaining ground in economic policy discussion during the past several weeks. The economic research institutes and the council of experts have contributed to that development. However, the Bundestag debate on the chancellor's governmentment statement made it clear that the assessment of our present situation indeed is not always unanimous but that the recommendations derived from it for finance policy remain controversial.

The German economy has recognized the challenges which we are facing in the form of changed energy prices. The decrease in oil consumption in absolute terms shows that farsighted demands in the fields of energy saving processes and heat preserving construction technologies, and an increasingly responsible use of the available energy, have had their effect. But the fact that the price which we must pay for our quantitatively decreasing oil imports has doubled since 1978 goes to show how important it is to score even more progress in this sector.

What is particularly important in traveling the road ahead is the realization that we are not up against a "classical" cyclic decline which might primarily be attributable to a decrease in overall economic demand. We must not lose sight of this fact--rather it must be reflected by what we plan to start doing in finance policy in order to safeguard a high employment level, attain an appropriate economic growth rate and achieve a foreign trade balance, thus doing what critical observers might reasonably expect.

In 1979, for the first time in many years, we incurred a deficit in our overall trade balance, a deficit which increased considerably in 1980. This development in particular is what makes our present situation different from that of past years. Oil price hikes are the essential cause of the negative development of our overall trade balance, with other factors playing a role as well, such as clearly increased tourist spending abroad and a growth in transfers to the European Community.

Despite the continuing lead in the stability of the German mark, the decrease in the Federal Republic's traditional surplus position exerts influence on exchange rates. Problems of financing the balance of payments have an effect on interest rate developments and on the monetary and credit policy of the Federal Bank. The fact that we have to pay more money to foreign countries for less important energy also means a corresponding lower internal demand.

The Federal Government is aware of the difficulties inherent in such a development. It does not dodge responsibility for overall economic developments, and by its decisions on budget and tax policy on 16 and 17 December has made allowances for the diversified requirements of the problems in economic policy.

Today, earlier decisions of the government coalition prove helpful: the tax reductions which will take effect on new years have been properly timed. Under the tax-reduction bill to take effect in 1981, the Federal Government, the laender and the communities next year will draw DM12 billion less from the private sector, of which DM10 billion will remain as extra purchasing power after reduction of the increases in the consumption taxes.

The remainder to be financed of DM27.5 billion for the 1981 budget will be about the same as it was last year. Even the experts believe that such an amount reflects a remarkable cyclic impulse. It is in line with the requirements of economic development policy.

It would be wrong to believe, however, that in the present situation the decisive economic policy instruments commanding the foreground should consist of as great a budgetary deficit as possible on the part of the different governmental levels, or additional economic development programs. Above everything else it must be important for us to try, also through use of funds from the public budgets, to have the German national economy adapt to the changed energy situation on the basis of brisk investment activities; to have the requirements for important energy limited as closely as possible; and to further improve the German economy's competitive capability through a high technological performance level. Thus we can and must contribute toward the gradual reduction of the present deficit in the overall trade balance. Then the foreign trade preconditions affecting the interest rate policy will again change and the forces governing the internal value of the German mark will again prevail with respect to the exchange rate.

No Subsidies for Energy Consumption

Subsidies which impede rather than promote structural change must be cut down. This holds true particularly for measures which even subsidize energy consumption. In this field the Federal Government has submitted proposals in the form of the bill on reducing subsidies. The increase in the oil tax must be viewed in this context as well.

For a finance policy in our federal state adapted to the overall economic requirements, it is highly significant that the Federal Government, the laender and the communities pull on the same rope, in the same direction and jointly live up to their responsibility for the overall economy.

The question arises quite often whether the public budgets are flexible enough for such a task. Criticism has been voiced, accusing the public budgets of having displayed even a pro-cyclic attitude rather than acting duly in line with overall economic requirements. A glance at the development of the public budgets of the past several years refutes such charges against the financial policy of the Federal Government. Since the end of 1978, the Federal Government, the laender and the communities agreed in the financial planning council on restraint in spending, for reasons of economic development and financial policies.

In the years since 1978, the Federal Government has consistenly abided by this agreement: it cut its growth in expenditures from 10 percent in 1978, to 7.2 percent in 1979, to an estimated 6 percent this year and 4.3 percent next year. In contrast the increase in expenditures by the laender was 8.6 percent in 1978, remained unchanged at 8.6 percent in 1979, and while a decrease in the growth rate to 7.1 percent was planned in the laender budgets for 1980, the growth rate of spending by the laender as a whole will come to about 9.5 percent. The communities increased their expenditure growth from 8.4 percent in 1978 to 9.2 percent in 1979, and in 1980 they will probably be above the laender growth rate in spending.

Thus, the efforts of the other territorial units to abide by the accords reached in the financial planning council were less successful on the whole than the efforts of the Federal Government. The Federal Government continues to adhere to this line. For the 1981 budgets we agreed with the laender and the communities in the financial planning council that the increase in 1981 spending should not exceed the target figure by 4 percent to prevent new borrowing from exceeding the amount of 1980.

This is why, under the 1981 draft budget, decreases in tax revenues essentially will be balanced by savings in expenditures so that the planned net borrowing will remain unchanged. The increase in the consumption tax for oil and spirits, which had been announced by the Federal Government already in connection with the European Community finance compromise of 4 June 1980, are inevitable indeed because of the enormous increase in the external burdens on the budget.

Despite all protests by the pressure groups, the increase in oil taxation is sensible indeed, also as related to energy policy. Energy saving consumption and production structures can be stimulated only via price hikes. If we manage to create a situation where our industry leads in the manufacture of automobiles with lower fuel consumption, this will benefit not only the motorists but also our exports.

In keeping with the recommendations of the financial planning council for the 1981 budgets, the laender, too, made an effort to limit the growth of spending: under present plans, expenditures by the laender as a whole will increase just about 5 percent over the target figure, the financing deficit being DM21 billion. In this connection, it is necessary, however, to keep in mind that in 1980 the planned amount was exceeded by about DM5 billion, and the 1980 financing deficit, amounting to DM23.5 billion, probably will be greater than planned. On this, considerably increased basis the growth in spending by the laender by their own estimates will amount to a mere 2 percent in 1981.

Financing Deficit of the Communities Grows

After the extraordinary increases this year, we anticipate a clear decrease in the growth rate of expenditure for the communities in 1981, especially with respect to investment spending. Nevertheless, the financing deficit will increase from DM4 billion this year to about DM7.5 billion in 1981. Since in all probability part of it will be covered by the reserves accumulated in the past several years, the net borrowing by the communities in 1981 will exceed the past year's amount by DM1 to DM1.5 billion. With such a budget policy the laender and communities tend to act in line with the recommendations of the financial planning council.

On the whole, the public budgets appear to be in keeping with foreseeable overall economic requirements in 1981. By a steady development of spending, the public budgets contribute to the support of economic development. Foresighted, well-timed tax reductions produce necessary economic development impulses. Changes in the structure of public spending contribute to overall economic structural changes. The coordination of the credit requirements with the overall economic requirements leaves the required leeway on the capital markets for private investment requirements. The Federal Government will limit its budget deficit to the same as last year's. On the whole, it seems to me quite realistic indeed that next year, too, private investments can play their significant role for economic growth and for coping with structural change.

PRESS COMMENTS ON BONN COALITION PROBLEMS

[Press review on FRG Government coalition problems]

[Text] KIELER NACHRICHTEN comments on the so-called strategy paper of the Social Democrats which expresses discontent with coalition agreements negotiated with the Free Democrats: Basically, it does not matter at all whether this is a secret paper or a staff paper because the discontent reportedly mentioned in that "nonexistent paper" has not been contested for a long time. The Social Democrats, as members of the largest government party, feel themselves largely overruled by the smaller coalition partner. How else could it be understood that Willy Brandt was hailed by his faction in the discussion on the government statement by the chancellor a few weeks ago because he had strongly worked out the Social Democratic position. Herbert Wehner's remark was full of irritation when the mentioned that the coalition talks as a whole does not constitute a dogma. Moreover, did not FDP Chairman Genscher take up this point when he more or less warned against constantly nagging about the social-liberal agreements?

ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG of Mainz points out: One ought to rule and not lament, said FDP Chief Genscher to his coalition partners in Bonn on the eve of the new year. He must have had good reason to give the SPD such advice in entering the difficult year of 1981.

The liberal vice chancellor thought he ought to add that an end must be made to the attempts to correct the election decision in favor of the center, correct it without asking the voters. Even if this ominous strategy paper, whose alleged authors are said to be Matthoefer and Wischnewski is really nothing but an aide's theoretical elaboration, it still clearly indicates the irritation of the SPD Bundestag faction over the chancellor and his coalition compromises.

The Duesseldorf RHEINISCHE POST stresses: What is important is that such a paper--or two of them--exists at all and that it is authored by Social Democrats. And what makes it even more important politically is that everybody considers the SPD's irritation comprehensible and, therefore, is not surprised by correspondingly phrased displeasure. This reflects the climate which may well develop into an immensely strong force of its own. The SPD and the FDP are not yet looking for a cause giving them the opportunity to separate. They will rather endeavor to have the coalition survive throughout the term. But it seems that they will have to muster considerable strength to make this effort successful.

MANNHEIMER MOREGEN declares: Actually, it is inconceivable that Hans Matthoefer, the finance minister with ambitions for the chancellorship, would criticize in a strategy paper the very field of the coalition agreements with the FDP in which he responsibly shared. To this extent, the SPD denial of the existence of such a paper seems to be credible. Yet this does not rule out the possibility that the assessments contained in that paper do prevail in the SPD. It is an open secret that notably the leftwing of the Bundestag faction cannot really cotton to the Schmidt-Genscher government program.

LUDWIGSHAFEN RHEINPFALZ notes: The SPD floor leader predicted even prior to the adoption of the 1981 budget by the cabinet that some obscure, additional amendments [to the coalition agreements] were probable. By his resignation from the post of chairman of the SPD commission, which has now become known, Wehner's hint at that time about potential corrections in social affairs policy gains particular weight.

Bielefeld's WESTFALENBLATT states: If a fighter like Wehner hands back the party's mandate for the preparation of a program of sociopolitical principles, then this allows the conclusion that there is more than just serious differences with the chancellor. Quite obviously the coalition agreements with the Free Democrats harbor an explosive charge in matters of social policy which is much more dangerous than was originally assumed. To Wehner who, like Brandt, liked to talk about the SPD's reform policy, stagnation and resignation in this question are bound to be doubly painful.

SCHMIDT REPORTEDLY PLANS ARMS SUPPLY TO SAUDIS

DW051305 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 5 Jan 81 pp 19-22

[Unattributed article]

[Excerpt] Helmut Schmidt wants to sell German arms to Saudi Arabia. What the Arabs most urgently want is the Leopard II battle tank. The chancellor is running the risk of a scandal in foreign policy and renewed trouble with his own party. The export violates the Bonn principle of not supplying arms to areas of tension.

The king from the east showed understanding for the German chancellor. When Saudi Arabian ruler Khalid ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz paid an official visit to Bonn last June, Helmut Schmidt asked the guest in a private talk to be patient in his desire for German arms--until after 5 October, the date of the Bundestag elections.

King Khalid indeed appreciated his host's suggestion since he realized what an explosive force the topic of arms exports harbored for the German. Actually, the request for a little patience was more than he had expected.

Until then, the Bonn people flatly had turned down the desire of the oil billionaires from the gulf for the worldwide renown products of the German arms industry, a desire which had been advanced quite often. The justification was that it is incompatible with a balanced Middle East policy if the Federal Republic delivers arms to any Arab country in a latent state of war with Israel. Such a deal would be tantamount to insulting Israel.

The Saudis called on the chancellor's office again soon after 5 October and drew attention to the discussion with the king. Without delay, in mid-November, Foreign Minister Sau'd al-Faysal was granted an audience with the German head of government, who was inundated with appointments, a day before the latter's trip to the United States.

Schmidt at first joked about the export topics in which the Saudis were so keenly interested: He said he found that Riyadh has a weakness for France, especially for French arms.

Al-Faysal gladly took up the subject. He would like only too well to buy German arms immediately, he had the greatest respect for West German quality work. The Saudi asked: "Can you deliver?"

The chancellor: But in that case the French and British would be quite jealous.

Then Helmut Schmidt became serious. There are, he said, strong political forces in the government parties as well as in the opposition who take a dim view of arms deliveries by the Federal Republic to areas of tension.

Al-Faysal countered with an argument that had impressed the chancellor during King Khalid's visit: The security of Saudi Arabian oil wells is most important, not only for his own country but also, and to the same degree, for Europe. These resources, which are vital to the industrial states, have been threatened, however, since the invastion of Afghanistan by the Soviets. The invasion drastically has changed the situation in the gulf. It is time to stop looking only at the Israeli-Arab conflict. That front becomes secondary in view of the new danger.

Al-Faysal mapped out a dark picture of the Soviet encirclement strategy in the Middle East. They settled down years ago in Ethiopia and South Yemen; the Kremlin recently signed a treaty with Syria, he said.

All this clearly indicates that Saudi Arabia needs arms urgently to be able to defend itself effectively against encirclement. The Federal Republic, which enjoys the direct use of Saudi oil, must help.

The chancellor realized what Al-Faysal meant: His country wants to have all kinds of West German arms, small and heavy arms, Heckler and Koch submachine guns and, most of all, the Leopard II combat tank equipped with a 120 mm smooth-bore gun.

The Saudis offer in return "far-reaching economic and financial cooperation." They offer long-term credits at low interest rates. They promise to buy chemical and steel industry installations to offset the oil bills which otherwise would have to be paid for with foreign currency. And they offer direct financial partnership to German industrial firms.

The Arab noted with satisfaction that he had convinced the chancellor with his report on the situation. The arguments are obvious, said Schmidt. But he pointed out difficulties which still have to be overcome.

Regardless of how much the chancellor foresees the domestic and foreign policy storm that would be caused by Bonn's arms exports to the notorious crisis area of the Middle East and regardless of how much he himself has shared the political and moral reservations against such deals, it seems inevitable that current policy be reexamined.

The last government spokesman, Klaus Boelling, always said: "In matters of arms exports, Helmut Schmidt thinks like a Juso [young socialist]." But now he knows that "the matter is being reconsidered."

The final decision about the business with the Saudis must be made by the Federal Security Council in the new year. The council consists, in addition to the chancellor, of the most important cabinet members.

After the meeting with Khalid, Schmidt informed SPD Chairman Willy Brandt and faction chairman Herbert Wehner about the results of his thinking. Both warned against it, predicting resistance in the party and in parliament.

FDP partner Hans-Dietrich Genscher was careful not to announce any opinion when the government chief acquainted him with his thoughts when telling him about the discussion with the Saudi king. High Foreign Ministry officials know that the liberal politician was puzzled by Schmidt's having already become so involved with the Saudis. A Genscher aide said that "the chancellor has committed himself"--which is a most risky enterprise for the more than careful foreign minister who is not so easily tied down, an enterprise he believes to be hardly workable.

Genscher fears that either there will be an enormous quarrel among the Social Democrats, as was the case when the planned export of submarines to Chile leaked out, because the chancellor had once again ignored the resistance in his own party, or Schmidt will be forced by the SPD into a retraction. But then he would thoroughly irritate the Arabs; they would see him as a man whose word cannot be trusted.

The Saudis want to intensify the development of their own defenses following the Afghanistan invasion, in particular because they do not assess very highly the American guarantees for the Gulf. The chancellor's friend, Boelling, said: "They consider us very important discussion partners, rating us higher than the United States," adding that "they want to be shown evidence of love."

Genscher believes that Schmidt ought to get out of his awkward situation by himself. Genscher aides say that the foreign minister is not prepared to "pull the chestnuts out of the fire for him"--last but not least because the FDP chairman is not certain whether his own people will cooperate in the arms deal.

Official Comments on Arms Sales

[Excerpts] Bonn, 5 Jan (DPA)--According to Federal Government Spokesman Kurt Becker there are no "concrete" wishes on the part of Saudi Arabia for supplies of the German Leopard II battle tank and other weapons. He told a federal press conference today, however, that the Saudis are interested in supplies of German weapons. "Feelers" had been put out. However, the Saudi interest in German weapons is nothing new and has existed for a long time.

Becker refused to comment "in detail" on a relevant report in DER SPIEGEL.

Becker also refused to give details of Chancellor Schmidt's meeting with Saudi representatives. "I cannot do that," he said. He said that since there have been no specific inquiries from the Saudis, and since there are no agreements, there is no cause to introduce the checking procedure in accordance with the law on the control of foreign trade and military weapons, the sale of which must be approved by the Federal Security Council. This procedure would be required for a possible sale of Leopard tanks to the Saudis. It only makes sense to make a political decision with regard to concrete inquires, Becker said.

He also stressed that the Cabinet decision of 1971, according to which the export of German arms outside NATO is to be "basically discouraged," and which bans their export into "areas of tension," still applies.

COMMENTARY ON ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH SAUDI ARABIA

DW061041 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 6 Jan 81 p 5

[Commentary signed JK: "Considerable Advance Contributions"]

[Text] SPIEGEL reports in its recent issue that the chancellor promised to supply Saudi Arabia with the combat tank Leopard II. The Arabs offered in return "far-reaching economic-financial cooperation."

This formulation--aside from the political explosiveness of this alleged deal--must confuse the economic observer because it creates the impression that economic relations between both countries are not too great at the moment. A glance at unerring statistics, however, nourished the assumption that the Saudis have made contributions in advance rather than having to or being able to offer something in return for German arms.

Since the spring of 1980, their oil supplies suddenly have increased. The share of Saudi oil in German supplies jumped from some 17 percent to 25 and in November, it even reached 29 percent. According to all available material, this quota is likely to continue in the next months, amounting to a monthly supply of more than 2 million tons of crude oil of a total import of about 8 million tons from all countries.

It is agreed that in this field Saudi Arabia is in a position to determine at any time the final consumer of its raw material, so that Riyadh must be politically interested in the mentioned increase of shipments to the Federal Republic. The assumption that considerable advance contributions have been made by the Saudis is supported by the fact that a large part of about DM15 billion foreign credits to offset the German foreign trade balance last year have come from the almost inexhaustible financial resources at the Persian Gulf.

The economic background of the disclosed arms deal must be viewed in the aspect as to whether Saudi Arabia will continue to be such a willing oil supplier and financier. A further increase of oil imports from this country seems inopportune due to the distribution of risks, aside from the fact that technical necessities prevent the unlimited use of this oil in German refineries.

Regarding the other direction of economic cooperation, namely exports to the Middle East, the German side can hardly hope for any spectacular increase rates because of the strong expansion in the past. Since 1975--since the time when the oil dollar-soaked order boom swept into the country--German exports to Saudi Arabia have increased more than threefold. Last year, they amounted to clearly more than DM4 billion. Measured by that volume, the export gains for "Leo" look modest. It is rather puzzling how this tank should touch off even more Saudi orders for a market whose ability to handle them could hardly be extended.

IMPLEMENTATION OF MISSILE DECISION DISCUSSED

["Excerpts" from reporter Gruendler commentary]

[Text] That Genscher now insists so clearly on adherence to NATO's decision to close the arms gap is probably because he wants to prepare the public for the fact that the Federal Government may have to risk taking independent action if need be. The foreign minister is in accord with the chancellor here. Schmidt's international credibility has depended for a long time now on the implementation of the missile decision. His party will eventually follow him, although reluctantly. However, the chancellor will have to face tough domestic political discussions.

GISCARD: NO CABINET CHANGES BEFORE ELECTIONS

[Text] The government will remain without any alterations in its composition until the presidential elections, the president clearly stated just now when receiving the members of the government for the traditional new year ceremony. In the 4 months left, Valery Giscard d'Estaing said, I ask you to make it a point of honor to fulfill the promises made. The president of the republic congratualted his ministers for their mutual understanding.

For his part, Mr Barre, speaking about the presidential elections, expressed the wish that the work which started at the beginning of the 7-year [presidential] term will continue in 1981.

GISCARD COMMENTS ON WORLD SCENE, AFRICA POLICY

LD060937 Paris LE MONDE in French 4-5 Jan 81 p 4

[Excerpts] The Elysee new year greetings ceremony ended on Friday, 2 January with the presentation of the diplomatic corps' greetings.

The president of the republic stated in particular:

"During the past year there have been few regions in the world in which conflicts have been settled, threats dissipated, rivalries reduced, aspirations to greater justice and well-being met and in which peoples have not been anxious about their future. In addition to this there have been new reasons for anxiety.

"These situations and these anxieties jeopardize the progress made in previous years toward mutual understanding and confidence. It can be observed that this had the result, which we predicted, of bringing security concerns to the fore, with the fear of an extension of the conflicts and the threat of the resumption of the arms race.

"Thus, as this new year begins, the question facing our governments is the following:

"After a period of international relations characterized by the search for dialogue and cooperation which the policy of detente illustrated, are we going to enter a new phase in which relations among states will be more bitter and in which ambitions, egotistical interests, distrust or fear will eventually prevail?

"Will we, in the coming year and the following ones, resign ourselves to this fate, morose and resigned as if it were historical fate, as always finding good reasons for describing as inevitable what, after all, depends on the ability and will of the world leaders?

"No, that will not be our attitude! We will not allow ourselves to be drawn onto that slippery slope. France will tirelessly continue its action for peace and security."

According to the head of state this presupposes "that the deterioration in the international climate be eliminated and avoided by appropriate gestures and initiatives." "Consultations must be started quickly," he continued, "to eliminate the causes of the economic chaos which is engendering unemployment in the industrialized countries and plunging most of the developing countries into poverty:

"The repeated oil price increase, whatever the effort to reduce consumption effectively made by the consumer countries;

"The aberrant changes in interest rates which lead to abrupt and unjustified changes in currency values and divert competition from its normal search for economic efficiency."

The president of the republic ended by naming three objectives which the international community should, in his view, have for 1981:

"Ending conflict and restoring the balance and peace to which the peoples of the Near East, Southwest and Southeast Asia and Southern Africa aspire;

"Promoting arms limitation paving the way for a fairer balance and greater security;

"Ensuring respect for man's freedom which is all too often flouted."

France and French-Speaking Africa

Previously the head of state had received the representatives of the countries which have concluded special agreements with France and which are, essentially, the French-speaking African countries. "There is no more serious crime against Africa than to undermine its security," he said. "France, which has fulfilled and will always continue to fulfill its pledges, withdrew the forces it had sent and maintained in Chad at the request of that country's government when the Lagos agreement demanded the withdrawal of all foreign forces. France is therefore in a good position to assert that no effort must be spared to restore a peaceful climate to that country and prevent the intrusion of new hegemonisms.

"France, which is not interfering in that country's internal affairs, welcomes the patient and persistent contribution being made by some countries to establishing peace in Chad. France, like you, wants the Chadian people's friendship." Our country, Mr Giscard d'Estaing added, "has a natural vocation to support states which seek such support in order to contribute to their security."

CFDT DELEGATE REPORTS ON VISIT TO POLAND

[Joanine Roy report: "Mr Walesa To Visit France In March"]

[Text] A CGT delegation--former WFTU Secretary General Pierre Gensous, Joannes Galland and Gerard Gaume, all three of whom are confederation secretaries--will visit Poland on Monday, 5 January at the invitation of the Solidarity trade unions and the Sector Trade Unions Liaison Committee, the CGT announced on 31 December just as the CFDT delegation was returning from Warsaw.

The CFDT's announcement of Mr Walesa's visit to Paris in March has been favorably welcomed by the French trade union movement. The CGT will give its decision on a possible meeting with the Polish trade union leader in France when its delegation returns from Warsaw.

Solidarity has become the third biggest force in Poland after the state and the church. There is no doubt that it is even more a mass movement than an organization which has so far been unable to establish its structure. Mr Walesa and his friends are certainly not haunted by the threat of a Soviet intervention. They talk ironically about the concern shown by the fraternal heighbors but rule out any possibility of failure. They are very confident in their ability to ensure that the path laid down is pursued without hitches other than Poland's internal economic and social difficulties. These are the convictions which the CFDT delegation (Edmond Maire, Jacques Chereque and Raymond Juin) have brought back from a 48-hour visit to Warsaw and Gdansk (note 1: the CFDT delegation had talks with Solidarity leaders Mr Walesa and also Bogdan Lis, Andrzej Gwiazda and Bronislaw Geremek).

As he left the aircraft at Orly on 31 December Mr Maire expressed satisfaction to the press at the success of a meeting "which was intended to contribute to psychological detente and to the consolidation of Solidarity and the processes which show that it is possible for an independent trade union to exist and play a very positive role in the people's democracies. There is a common inspiration," Mr Maire said, "behind the emergence of Solidarity and the CFDT's approach to rebuilding trade unionism to counter the deviations it has experienced."

The communique expressed these convergences: "common desire to see the workers take responsibility for their individual and collective future in a self-managing approach; attachment to the trade union movement's independence; and conditions for implementing economic reforms which serve the greatest number aimed at a society which respects basic [illegible]." "Those common desires are a strong incentive for opening up new prospects for [illegible] union relations between workers in different countries," Mr Maire said.

International Aid

After expressing satisfaction at the welcome he was given by Mr Walesa and the Solidarity trade unions, Mr Maire stressed that he had finally been granted an entry visa without conditions. It was granted after Solidarity approached the Polish authorities (note 2: nonetheless it was at their request that the leaders of the two old sector trade unions had talks with Mr Chereque and Mr Juin). Mr Walesa is, therefore, now free to invite anybody he wishes and he has no doubts that he can move around as he wishes. He was therefore anxious to fix the date for his visit to France at the CFDT's invitation. It will take place in the last third of March 1981.

The confidence in the future which characterizes Solidarity is accompanied by a grassroots mobilization which has not been reduced, Mr Maire noted. For instance he cited the discussions which are continuing on the "4 Saturdays." In other words having Saturday as a holiday each week, a provision which was included in the fall agreements and which the government decided not to implement owing to economic problems. This proves, Mr Walesa said in this connection, that the authorities "have not yet fully accepted the existence of an independent trade union," to whom it is also refusing to communicate economic figures. The trade unions, the Polish leader also pointed out, have not yet awaken to their new strength because when a government decision displeases them, there is immediate talks of a general strike whereas suitable procedures ought to be found.

One result of the CFDT's visit is agreement on the aid to be given to Solidarity "while fully respecting its options." The CFDT will continue to give it equipment (the 3.5 ton truck sent by the CFDT reached its destination on 24 December). "We will also demonstrate the running of a democratic trade union, the mechanism of collective agreements and so forth. We will also train training officers [formateurs] for the members."

Links will be established between the CFDT, Sohyo, the main Japanese trade union, and the three united Italian trade union confederations so that they do not duplicate their efforts but make an effective contribution to Solidarity's consolidation.

Solidarity has so far been unable to establish its structures owing to the urgency of the problems to be solved, Mr Maire said, and is being assailed by the demands of workers who hitherto had nobody to turn to about problems related to housing, health, food and so forth.

[Question] Are there still political prisoners whose situation is worrying?

Mr Maire answered cautiously: "There are urgent problems connected with the question of freedom. However for the sake of efficacy, Solidarity must carry out its action in the way it intends."

PINTO BALSEMAO PRESENTS CABINET LIST TO EANES

LD052204 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 5 Jan 81

[Excerpts] At Belem Palace this morning Prime Minister-designate Francisco Pinto Balsemao had a meeting with the president of the republic, during which he presented the list of his ministerial team.

Afterwards the prime minister-designate told reporters:

[Begin recording] The president of the republic is now in possession of the cabinet list. Unless he raises any objections to the ministerial nominations, and I do not think he will, the government will be sworn in before the end of the week, in principle this coming Friday morning. The swearing in of the secretaries of state will follow next week. After this, the government will begin functioning normally and will submit its program to the Assembly of the Republic within the constitutionally established deadline. [end recording]

President Ramalho Eanes, who was going through the cabinet list presented by Pinto Balsemao, was expected to call the prime minister-designate to Belem Palace again tonight to tell him whether the president of the republic accepts the cabinet nominations.

The program of the seventh constitutional government is still in the process of being compiled and, as Pinto Balsemao himself said, will be based on the program of the Democratic Alliance. He said the main aims of his government will be:

[Begin recording] To release the civilian society from the bonds of the state and to boost Portugal's production. [end recording]

Pinto Balsemao described the new internal administration minister as very competent, and confirmed that Henriques Granadeiro, the former head of Ramalho Eanes' civil household, is to be his private secretary.

So far only one secretary of state has been publicly confirmed. He is Luis Fontoura, of the Social Democratic Republic Party, who is to be the new secretary of state for social communication. However, the ANOP news agency said tonight that Antonio Bras Teixeira, secretary of state of the presidency of Council of Ministers in the outgoing government, would be the new secretary of state for culture. Bras Teixeira is an independent.

Thus, I can now confirm that the new government, including possibly the secretaries of state in the office of the prime minister, will be sworn in at noon this Friday. [end recording]

GOVERNMENT SIGNS TRANSPORT AGREEMENT WITH IRAQ

[Text] A highway transportation agreement between Turkey and Iraq, aimed at encouraging transportation of passengers and goods between the two countries, which had been ratified by the Council of Ministers, went into effect today after it was published in the Official Gazette. The agreement envisages the right of free passage for transportation on specified highways, except in some cases. No taxes or fees will be necessary in most cases for direct or transit transportation. No licenses will be necessary for package tours to both countries. The agreement is valid for 1 year. The agreement will be extended for an extra year if neither party objects.

NEW REGULATIONS ISSUED FOR WEAPONS PERMITS

[Text] A new directive concerning the guidelines for weapons permits to be issued by governors was published in the Official Gazette and went into effect today. According to the directive, a permit for carrying a weapon will be valid for 3 years.

The directive states that retired officers, noncommissioned officers, specialist gendarme sergeants, retired governors, deputy governors, district and subdistrict officials, security services personnel, night watchmen, judges, public prosecutors and their assistants and National Intelligence Organization members will be able to receive, upon request, from governors, a permit to carry arms. Persons who were forced to retire will not be eligible for permits.

Farmers who own land outside settlement areas and employ over 25 persons and contractors who are supervising over 25 employees in remote places will also be eligible for weapon permits. Owners of large herds of cattle who travel to distant fields throughout the year and their shepards will be able to receive permits.

Petroleum stations located on highways and their workers will be allowed to carry arms with a permit. The night watchmen, cashiers, security officials, money couriers and transportation officials employed by private banks and factories or organizations which employ at least 100 insured workers will also be granted weapon permits.

The authorized captains of ships sailing on open seas will be allowed to carry weapons.

According to the directive, persons who are eligible for weapons permits following the approval of the Interior Ministry are as follows: persons with diplomatic immunity and embassy and consulate officials who do not have diplomatic immunity but who have been proposed by the Foreign Ministry and approved by the Interior Ministry and foreign persons employed at airline companies that conduct scheduled flights to Turkey who have been proposed by the Foreign Ministry and approved by the Interior Ministry.

The new directive stipulates that weapons permits be renewed every 3 years during the first month of the fiscal year as long as the permit holders are still eligible for carrying weapons.

VOTCP DISCUSSES ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH USSR

[Station commentary: "New Developments in Turkish-Soviet Relations"]

[Excerpt] Dear listeners: The joint Turkish-Soviet economic committee has begun its meetings in Moscow. The Turkish side is participating in the meetings with a delegation headed by Industry and Technology Minister Kocatopcu. Experts from the state planning organization and administrators from the machine and chemical industries are also included in this delegation.

The joint Turkish-Soviet economic committee is discussing the further development of cooperation between the two neighboring countries. New economic, technical and financial projects are being discussed. Among the projects are the doubling of the production capacity of the Iskenderun iron and steel works, which were built through the economic, technical and financial assistance of the Soviet Union, the construction of new blast furnaces, the enlargement of the Aliaga oil refinery, the construction of new special quality steel installations in conjunction with the machine and chemical industries and the increasing of the production capacity of the Seydisehir aluminum installations. The projects for the new thermoelectric power stations to be built in Turkey by the Soviet Union are also being taken up during these meetings.

A significant development is noted in Turkish-Soviet cooperation. During meetings held with the Soviet heavy industry delegation, which visited our country in December 1980, it was stressed that the two neighboring countries are in favor of developing cooperation based on mutual confidence. Another proof of this positive development consists of the trade protocol signed between Turkey and the Soviet Union. According to this protocol, the volume of trade between the two countries has doubled, reaching $635 million.

The Turkish-Soviet cooperation constitutes a concrete example of the possibility and actual development of relations based on mutual interests and trust between countries with different social and political orders. The Soviet Union plays a big role in this. Our neighbor, the Soviet Union, does not establish its relations in accordance with political expendiency. The Soviet Union's relations with countries of different social and political systems are based on Lenin's principle of peaceful coexistance. This policy is one of helping the peoples of the countries greatly exploited by imperialism and assisting in the national development of these countries.

History has demonstrated that the genuine aid extended to our country by the Soviet Union, without any political conditions or vested interest, serves the interests of our people and our national interests. The binding conditions set for every dollar of credit extended, on the other hand, by imperialist organizations like the World Bank and the IMF have led our country into the present state. Our country has been dragged into crisis because Turgut Ozal's 24 January 1980 economic decisions are based on IMF formulas.

FOREIGN MINISTER GENSCHER ON EAST-WEST COOPERATION

[Text] Stutgart, 6 Jan (DPA)--The FDP chairman, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, has appealed to the Soviet Union to recognize the earnestness ofthe will of the Western countries for cooperation and disarmament. At the traditional Epiphany meeting of the southwest German liberals in Stuttgart today, he called upon the CPSU leadership to examine at the party congress in February the advantages of such a policy of cooperation and to see the worldwide reaction to the invasion of Afghanistan as "cause for a rethink." Genscher stressed: "The policy of supremacy has no future."

Genscher also stressed the necessity of the European Community and the alliance with the United States. He emphasized that Europe mst do "everything required for its security" and criticized the fact that this was not seen everywhere to be clearly the case. He added: "Europe must not see itself as living at the expense of American defense readiness."

Genscher strongly urged the observance of NATO's dual decision in its totality and warned against quibbling about the "counterarming part" of this agreement. He said that whoever did so must realize that this is removing the basis for negotiations on medium-range weapons. The result of this attitude "would be permanent Soviet superiority, instability and insecurity instead of arms limitation" and disarmament. In this matter, "the substance of overall Western security and disarmament policy" is at stake.

Genscher also reaffirmed the "three-point program" for relations with the GDR. He said that relations between the two German states must not be the cause of any additional strains on East-West relations. The Helsinki Final Act has to be taken into account and the two states must not insulate themselves from one another but must seek ways to cooperate. It is "pure illusion" to think that German-German relations can be kept separate from a "worsening of the atmosphere" between East and West.

Genscher also raised the question of whether it finally was time for a treaty on the European union, through which the foundations for joint foreign policy action would be consolidated and the weight of the Community as a partner of the United States and with the United States in international politics would be increased. The aims of this union--including development of a common European foreign policy, coordination of security policy, closer cooperation in the cultural sphere and a harmonizing of legislation--were certainly not all new, "but the time is ripe to turn them into reality."

NEWSPAPERS VIEW FDP EPIPHANY MEETING IN STUTTGART

DW060934 Cologne Duetschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 6 Jan 81

[Press review on the traditional Epiphany meeting of the FDP in Stuttgart]

[Text] BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG writes: The Stuttgart Epiphany meeting showed once again that the FDP talks in lively terms. Secretary General Verheugen said that his party could well become the party of all enlightened citizens. It goes without saying that this is a word which invites trouble. For which party would not want to rally enlightened citizens around itself? The leap over the 10-percent margin in the 5 October elections has made the Free Democrats more sure of themselves, a development which repeatedly has entailed critical remarks by the coalition partner.

The Duesseldorf RHEINISCHE POST comments: The Epiphany meeting of the Free Democrats of Baden-Wuerttemberg once was an important occasion. For a few years now, it has become part of the many FDP land conventions which are held in keeping with the statutes, routine, nothing more. In the evening of 5 October, the Free Democrats had reason to be proud of the election result. But what followed showed confusion and insecurity rather than clear objectives. It is obvious that something of the sort is bound to affect the quality of the governmental alliance, being intensified even by tensions within the SPD.

The editorial of Bonn's GENERAL-ANZEIGER reads in part: The Stuttgart Epiphany meeting, the traditional party convention of the southwest German liberals, in the past often produced programmatic predications for the FDP's policy. In view of the compulsions now confronting the Federal Government, the leeway for such predications has been extremely narrowed. Hence, no surprises may be anticipated. They will have to confine themselves to underscoring the role of the liberal component of the reform party in the government coalition.

In this connection, the Bielefeld WESTFALENBLATT writes: On the occasion of the Epiphany meeting, the liberals of Baden-Wuerttemberg stress the independence of the FDP from the Bonn government partner. In 1981, they will want to maintain that independence to a far greater degree than would be to the liking of even Chancellor Helmut Schmidt who very much likes to keep the leftwing of his party in check by referring to the liberal partner in Bonn governmental power.

The Mainz ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG sums up its view: Hardly a day passes in Bonn without speculations concerning the coalition and the chancellor. Since the laboriously achieved agreements of the two government parties, dissatisfaction on both sides has not abated and nervousness has been spreading. And from the outside, interested quarters do not let any opportunity pass to cook up their own concoctions. The coalition government as yet is not solidly in step. It is too much bothered by stumbling blocks even though both sides made it absolutely clear that the coalition has been devised for a term of 4 years. The FDP must be the least interested in seeing the rug being pulled from under the feet of the coalition, for, if the structure collapses, the debris would hit the FDP the hardest.

Essen's WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE states: It is impossible to tell today whether the coalition by 1984 will be exposed to a wear and tear process which will take it to the verge of ruin. It will depend on many external circumstances, for instance, on the world situation and the economic situation, on which direction the FDP will take and on which trends in the SPD will gain followers. Likewise, it will be essential whether the old helmsmen will be still available at the decisive moment and whether they still will be followed.

DPA REPORTS ON NEW CREDIT TERMS FOR POLAND

[Excerpts] Paris/Bonn, 6 Jan (DPA)--Poland's major Western creditors are likely to meet once again in Paris this month to discuss the credit requirements of that crisis-rocked country. This was learned today in Paris from usually well-informed circles close to the French Government. The meeting is not yet officially confirmed.

According to information from Bonn government circles, the Federal Republic's new credit lines for Poland have been fixed. The Federal Government will guarantee credits totaling DM300 million for German deliveries of semifinished goods and foodstuffs to Polish customers. Foodstuffs will account for DM70 million. The credit guarantees are considerably below the DM700 million sought by the Polish side. The credits are said to run for periods ranging from 2 to 5 years. Polish debts to the FRG, maturing in the first half of 1981, are put at about DM500 million. Further Polish credit requirements in this connection are noted with reserve in Bonn.

DIE WELT PUBLISHES ALLEGED SPD 'SECRET PAPERS'

[DIE WELT's document of the day: "The Imbalance Irritates Our Voters"]

[Text] Bonn, DDP--The alleged "secret papers" of the SPD read:

Problems of finance policy by the end of 1980

1. The election-campaign discussion on state indebtedness showed that the voters have a "consolidation desire" for the state finances (less taxation, fewer credits, dampening of state activities). This desire is not compulsory from a pure economic point of view, for surely the tax burden quota could still be increased. Definitely, we could do some more borrowing even though the interest payments increasingly burden the budget. The forthcoming consolidation of the state finances primarily involves a problem to be classified as belonging to the psychological sphere. The course of consolidation is intended to prove the state's capability of taking unpopular measures as well. This proof of its capability of action alone will create the confidence among investors and consumers required to restore steady economic and finance policies. From this follows that the effects of the course of consolidation will be all the more tangible as the expenditure cuts grow greater.

2. Viewed from this angle, the result of the coalition agreements and of the government statement were disappointing. It is the nearly unanimous reaction of the public that the cuts were too inadequate and too imbalanced. The relatively small volume of the cuts does not convey the impression of any capability of action but that of halfheartedness. Hence, it lacks inner logic. The imbalance irritates our voters and comrades who feel cheated out of the election victory.

3. The next frontline takes shape in employment policy. Even though the problem is not so urgent at the moment despite 1 million unemployed people, the trade unions face increasing unemployment figures and energetically demand state rectification. In doing so, they refer to a finance policy tending to create jobs, a finance policy which, using a slight modification of the Keynes concepts, will finance itself. Yet, in terms of time, they are at odds with the goal of consolidation. Expansion can only come after restriction. For this purpose, however, it already is necessary to set the switches during the process of preparing the budget. This would then constitute a signal to the trade unions that their concern has not been forgotten.

4. Finally, it is necessary to tackle the problem of the overall trade balance deficit. As a result of the well-known interconnection, favorable effects on the labor market must be expected in that respect as well. It will be impossible, however, to close the trade balance gap with the measures announced.

5. The 1981 budget discussions--and particularly the discussion on the orientation data--will provide an opportunity for exerting influence on the development cited above.

Specifically, concerning 2: It is necessary to demand a visible sacrifice from the FDP clientele, meaning burdens on farmers, public servants and self-supporting professionals. The latter two groups especially came off too well. The original 100-point list with which the Federal Finance Ministry entered into the coalition negotiations must be put on the table once again. This is the only way to document our will for austerity.

Concerning 3: Budget cuts can be made appealing to trade unions only if it is clear that this will produce room for measures to create jobs. Preparations must be made by the Federal Ministry of Economics and the Federal Labor Ministry and they must be in line with the new realizations regarding specific labor problems.

At the proper time, economy must be stepped up in a differentiated way, involving special branches, regions and structures. The necessary instruments must be prepared as well as the possible necessary specific measures. One must deal with the DGB demand to extend the public services personnel to create new jobs.

Concerning 4: Energy saving measures cannot be limited solely to gasoline. They must be part of an energy concept. It must be far-reaching, logical and understandable for the public so that the sacrifices connected with such a program will be accepted and the changes exploited.

6. Further problems will come up in the following fields:

A) Despite preparation of the PV [not otherwise identified] Commission for the reorganization of the agriculture, it is unclear how the decisions made there should be implemented in practice. The 1 percent goal therefore is still endangered.

B) Complete confusion exists in the field of defense with regard to the 3 percent goal. It does not help any to continue juggling with figures. Statements must be made with regard to defense policy.

Cost increases for arms call for public explanation and a statement on the handling of the problem. The remark that tanks on wheels will be built instead of on tracks is probably not the last word in the matter. The press reports enormous gaps in the finance planning of the MPI 14 [not otherwise explained]. A public statement is necessary in this respect as well.

C) The housing construction policy does not assure the public (is apartment building a matter of the laender?). Housing construction is not merely of social political importance; it is much more an important economic factor that could solve more labor market problems than many other programs.

D) No priorities have been set with regard to transport policy. The development of public close-distance transportation would be economically reasonable, as well as investments in the German railway. If highway construction simultaneously will be continued, it would be too much for the economy in view of the current energy problems.

E) The transfer of DM3.5 billion from the pension insurance fund to the Federal Labor Office is economically correct. The irregular surpluses and deficits of the Federal Labor Ministry, necessitating the respective "money transfers," however, are unclear to the public. This also must be clarified.

F) The risks of financing the European Community's budget must be discussed.

G) There is no concept for the further development of relations between the Federal Government and the laender in the field of finance policy.

COMMENTATOR DISCUSSES ARMS SALES TO SAUDI ARABIA

DW061504 Baden-Baden Suedwestfunk Network in German 1700 GMT 5 Jan 81

[Commentary by correspondent W. Steull]

[Excerpt] If the wishes of Saudi Arabia are met, it will be hard to refuse arms requests from its neighbors. Once you violate your self-imposed abstinence with regard to arms, this signals a turn away from foreign policy principles observed to date. And yet, in the event an inquiry from Saudi Arabia arrives officially as well, the reasons for a delivery, it would seem to me, are predominant. Saudi Arabia can be supplied with what the Bundeswehr has ordered but will not procure. There will not be any expansion of the arms industry. What will be decisive, however, is the situation in the field of foreign affairs. Granted, the gulf states do not seek full association with the West, yet they underscore the community of interests. A Saudi Arabia strengthened in its defense readiness, however, means enhanced security for the Western industrial states as well.

MALTA'S MINTOFF COMMENTS ON NEUTRALITY PACT

[Text] Rome, 6 Jan (ANSA)--Malta's neutrality agreement with Italy will be joined by "many" other Mediterranean countries as part of a region-wide peace policy, according to Maltese Prime Minister Dom Mintoff.

The agreement by which Italy will guarantee the island-nation's neutrality is well on its way toward ratification in Rome and was discussed here Monday in Mintoff's talks with Italian Government officials. The Valletta government leader had separate talks in Rome with Italian Premier Arnaldo Forlani, Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and Industry Minister Filippo Maria Pandolfi.

By agreeing to the September 15 neutrality pact, Malta promised not to authorize foreign military bases or installations on its territory or to "indiscriminately" let foreign fleets secure repairs in its shipyards. In exchange for this, Italy will provide substantial economic and financial aid to the island--to the tune of twelve million dollars a year for five years, plus five more million in the form of an easy-term loan for development and another four million a year to back bilateral economic, social and cultural cooperation agreements.

Another sign of the two countries' good relations came recently with the signing of an agreement by which Italy will provide Malta with 8,000 tons of durum wheat free of charge.

Mintoff disclosed that he had discussed the progress being made in ratification procedures for the neutrality agreement with Italian Government officials before taking off for Morocco yesterday afternoon.

"....This agreement will not remain a two-way deal between Italy and Malta," Mintoff said in a departure statement. "....It will be joined by other Mediterranean states," he said, adding, "and I don't mean just one or two, but many countries".

"We discussed the situation in the Mediterranean," he reported, "and both countries are aware that our agreement is a first step toward a Mediterranean policy of peace, and not war." The agreement, which the Italian side too has taken pains to describe as "open" to other Mediterranean partners, has already gone through the scrutiny of the Senate and lower house foreign relations commissions in Rome.

POLAND'S WALESA TO MEET POPE TWICE NEXT WEEK

[Text] Rome, 6 Jan (DPA)--Lech Walesa, leader of the new Polish Solidarity trade union, will meet Pope John Paul II twice in Rome next week. On the day of his arrival, 1 January, the pope will welcome him "privately." The next day the pope will "officially" receive the 13-man delegation from his native Poland in private audience.

An Italian trade union spokesman told DPA in Rome today that the first 2 days of the Solidarity delegation's visit to Italy will be taken up entirely with a "church program." Afterwards Walesa and his party will be guests of the Italian trade union federation until their visit ends on 19 January. The federation has arranged several events for them. On 17 January there is to be a press conference in Rome.

According to information available in Rome, Walesa's wife will accompany him on his Italian tour. Other delegation members are Solidarity Vice Chairman Andrzej Gwiazda, delegates from various Polish cities, three trade union experts, a Gdansk woman worker and the abbot of a Gdansk parish (Pfarreisic).

PCI'S BUFALINI TAKES YEAREND LOOK AT WORLD SCENE

LD070915 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 28 Dec 80 pp 1, 15

[Renzo Foa interview with PCI Directorate member Paolo Bufalini: "Work To Be Done After a Year Without Detente"]

[Text] We are coming to the end of 1980--a difficult year for the world, which has experienced an overall acceleration of its crises and which has seen its major unresolved problems added to by further problems, both along its East-West and North-South axes and in all the local points of friction and tension. There have been many shouts of alarm at the growth of the dangers and at the untenability of such a difficult situation. We discussed this with PCI Directorate member Comrade Paolo Bufalini, to see what a Western people's and democratic force such as the PCI can do.

"Unfortunately," Bufalini said, "the picture of difficulties and fears which you have briefly outlined is correct. Allow me, however, to point to what now seems to be a positive element, the sign of an improvement, namely the possibility that the Polish crisis can be resolved by peaceful political means, thus not only avoiding tragic and dangerous lacerations but indeed moving, within peace and order, toward a democratic development of socialism. Of course we are not unaware--we repeat--that the difficulties are still great and that dangers remain. Nevertheless, the capacity for recovery, staying power and regeneration demonstrated by the Polish United Workers Party and the sense of national responsibility demonstrated by the other protagonists in the affair, with Solidarity on the one hand and the Catholic Church on the other--within the framework of an attitude which has eventually proved to be prudent and to help relax tension on the part of the principal international powers and forces--enable us to look forward more confidently, albeit with necessary prudence, to a positive outcome that will constitute progress for Poland, and not for Poland alone.

"But," Bufalini said, returning to the initial question, "you are right: the picture is very worrying because of the multiplication of conflicts, the failure to resolve old conflicts, such as the gangrenous one in the Middle East, and the frightening arms race, in a climate of tension and mistrust reminiscent of the cold war.

"You asked me what we Italian Communists believe we can do. It is not easy to give a sufficiently thorough and complete answer. I will limit myself to a few initial pointers. First, we must impart a new, vigorous and large-scale thrust to a campaign to block and reduce weapons, starting with nuclear weapons, and therefore to safeguard civilization and life itself on earth--a campaign which, taking innovations into account, will have the same ideological motivation and vigor as the campaigns which Togliatti launched against the nuclear bomb."

[Answer] The decisive issue of development is at stake here, since weapons now cost over $1 billion a day. It can be stated, as Willy Brandt said recently, that "weapons certainly make mankind no more secure, but definitely make it poorer."

Here we come to another decisive aspect of the crisis of the contemporary world--the growing imbalance between the industrially most developed and wealthiest countries and the poorer countries, which constitute the majority of the human race and which are rightly rebelling and struggling for emancipation and equality, by means of an inexorable movement and with gains beyond which we cannot return.

[Question] It is economic, but also political, problems which closely link economic underdevelopment to the North of the world, creating new forms of interdependence...

[Answer] I would like to make an observation in this connection, namely that behind the very grave conflicts and threats there is now undoubtedly a general--economic, social and political--crisis which is afflicting the capitalist countries for various reasons and in various ways, but which is also affecting the socialist countries, principally because of the interdependence between the two economies. There is the crisis of capitalism and of imperialism, which we regard in what is in our theory the classic sense of power politics as being aimed at the economic exploitation of other peoples. On the other hand, there is also a crisis--in different forms and to different extents--in countries where socialist and anti-imperialist revolutions have been carried out. We acknowledge this and try to understand it.

I believe, however, that those of our adversaries who proclaim the failure of socialism are mistaken. In fact, socialism has characterized and still characterizes our century, if regarded in its real essence as a revolutionary and liberation movement of broad masses which has achieved--albeit via obscure and harsh paths, errors, dramas and tragedies--irreversible gains. I have in mind the building of the first socialist society in the USSR and the victory against Nazism and fascism, which changed the structure and future of the world; I have in mind the Chinese Revolution, the collapse of the colonialist system. I am referring to the gains--again irreversible--of the working class in the capitalist countries, and to the rebellion and struggle against alienating work. I am referring to the vast and victorious women's liberation movement. These liberation movements do exert pressure, and the world crisis stems primarily from the desire to oppose them and the inability to satisfy these thrusts and to provide them with a historical outcome.

[Question] Some people who talk about the failure of socialism find an argument in linking the idea of imperialism to the foreign policy of the USSR or other socialist countries.

[Answer] Power politics can be conducted by a socialist country and by the USSR, and I believe that this has happened in particular periods and situations. But I would never call it imperialist, because in fact the Soviet Union, because of its economic structure and its socialist and internationalist ideals, is not inclined to exploit other peoples economically. If anything, the opposite is true, namely, that the support which the USSR and other socialist countries have given and are giving to liberation movements and to countries where an anti-imperialist revolution has been carried out and socialist building has been started costs a great deal. This does not alter the fact that even the USSR and other socialist countries can pursue power politics, albeit with the aim of struggling against capitalism and imperialism and in the belief that it will help revolutionary movements. This leads to conflicts and threats to peace and above all creates a climate of mutual mistrust which greatly hinders action aimed at achieving arms reduction agreements and measures.

I am convinced that every initiative and every step forward on the road to detente constitutes a necessary and powerful factor of detente; but at the same time I am convinced that the struggle and action for disarmament must go hand in hand with action to restore a climate of trust, observance of basic rules of international coexistence--observance of peoples' and states' sovereignty and independence, noninterference and observance of mutual autonomy--and specific and effective contributions aimed at establishing a new international economic order that will beat underdevelopment and help resolve mankind's most serious and vast problems.

[Question] In a few days' time it will be the first anniversary of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. What lesson is to be drawn from it? What is the solution to it?

[Answer] My opinion concerning Afghanistan is that it is a sad and tragic instance of a failed revolution attempt. The fact that there was an objective need for a revolutionary transformation in a country such as Afghanistan cannot be doubted: production relations there were largely feudal, millions of herdsmen were oppressed and exploited, there was 95 percent illiteracy; and the women's masses suffered conditions of semi-enslavement and a climate of deep obscurantism. But Lenin taught not only that to carry out a revolution there must be a vanguard revolutionary force but also that it must be closely linked with the masses which will benefit from, which understand and which want the reforms, since only they can implement them. If a vanguard does not have the masses behind it and gains power by a coup d'etat, and subsequently splits into factions which fight and destroy each other; and if a smaller and smaller section of it wants to impose--from above and by force--reforms not understood or accepted by the masses, then one can no longer talk in terms of a revolution. I understand the anomalies, difficulties and dramatic alternatives which faced the USSR in Afghanistan: but in no way can a foreign army's intervention and occupation be justified, above all from a revolutionary viewpoint. At the same time, it must be noted that this action has introduced a new factor of international tension.

In the present situation, I believe that the only realistic solution is a commmitment from everyone to seek a political solution through an agreement among the countries involved which will guarantee at the same time the withdrawal of Soviet troops, nonintervention by other countries and Afghanistan's return--within a climate of domestic peace and national concord--to the status of a fully nonaligned and independent country friendly with the USSR and all its neighboring countries.

[Question] Another particularly pressing issue concerns missiles in Europe--one of the factors in the deterioration of East-West relations. What can we Europeans still do to seek a military balance on our continent with the lowest possible number of "Euromissiles?"

[Answer] It is our firm resolve to encourage the development of initiatives and to cooperate in them, from a broad movement in Italy for an international agreement to block the deployment of new "theater" weapons in Europe and to impose their balanced reduction to the lowest possible level. I believe it important also to study other proposals which have been put forward by other European political forces for creating a denuclearized belt in Europe. Following initiatives on the part of socialist Poland, the starting point was last summer's meeting in Moscow between Brezhnev and Schmidt, from which emerged the important innovation of the declared desire to begin negotiations while removing all preconditions. The ngeotiations have now begun in Geneva.

There has been a special commitment to this battle on the part of many different peace-loving forces in Europe--especially in the Netherlands and Belgium, whose governments have postponed the decision to accept the missiles on national soil. Initiatives and demonstrations have also been organized by the British Laborites and groups within the SPD and by Catholic and Protestant churchmen. I believe that in Italy too there is a broad range of different forces--political, religious, trade union and cultural--which can cooperate in launching a renewed campaign to this end.

[Question] Reagan's inauguration as president takes place in just over 3 weeks' time. On the day after his election you spoke of "a day to be marked with a black circle." Do you confirm that verdict? What uncertainties do you see?

[Answer] Yes, it is true: But I added then that I was not referring to Reagan personally or to what his foreign policy might be (since statements made during the election campaign are not decisive in this regard.) I was referring to the failure of the attempt made by Carter, who presented himself with the ambition to pursue a policy motivated by the requirements of democracy and detente--a failure which led to a conservative shift in the U.S. electorate, within the framework of a situation which has seen other conservative shifts in certain European countries. I hope that now, even with the Reagan administration--which some people are portraying as characterized by realism and pragmatism--the struggle for world detente and peace will successfully lead to disarmament agreements. This, in our belief both that dialogue and the quest for agreements between the two major powers are an essential and fundamental element, and that these alone are now insufficient to guarantee the solution of conflicts, detente and peace, inasmuch as other countries, peoples and their groupings must participate in building a new international order. Therefore, it is not the stiffening of the blocs and the world's division into spheres of influence that are needed to guarantee peace. On the contrary, it is the progress of detente which facilitates the various countries' initiative to contribute to detente, peace and justice among the peoples and which can gradually lead to the elimination of the blocs.

Within such an outlook, we allocate a necessary and effective role to West European detente and peace initiatives.

I SIMERINI: MOSCOW CANCELS KIPRIANOU VISIT PLANS

NC070708 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 7 Jan 81 p 1

[Excerpts] According to reports from diplomatic sources reaching I SIMERINI, efforts by the Cyprus Government at the ambassadorial level to secure Moscow's approval for President Kiprianou's visit have failed.

Specifically we are informed that Moscow's position on the question of Mr Kiprianou's visit continues to be negative.

Mr Kiprianou's visit to Moscow was to take place--following an official invitation--during April 1979, but it was unilaterally cancelled at the last minute by the Soviet side, which did not furnish any explanations.

In October 1979, a few months after the cancellation of Mr Kiprianou's visit, Soviet Ambassador to Cyprus Astavin, in his address on the October Revolution anniversary in Nicosia, referred to the Cypriot president's visit to the Soviet Union and said that it was to take place, probably during 1980.

However, the visit to which Astavin referred did not take place in 1980 either.

According to diplomatic sources, it is Moscow that does not want Mr Kiprianou's visit in order not to provoke Turkey.

According to the same sources, it appears that Mr Kiprianou's visit to Moscow has been definitely canceled and no change in the Soviet stand should be expected.

IOANNIDHIS COMMENTS ON DIALOGUE RESUMPTION

[Text] Mr Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriot side's representative at the intercommunal talks, answering a question by the Athens News Agency in view of the new phase of the inter-Cypriot dialogue on Wednesday, stressed the desire of the Greek Cypriot side to continue its efforts for a substantive and constructive dialogue that would lead to a viable and peaceful Cyprus solution. Mr Ioannidhis added: Serious difficulties in the way of this effort still exist, and for this reason persistent work and patience are needed, but above all there must be determination and resoluteness. He said: However, the entire issue depends primarily on the conciliatory attitude and the approach to be displayed by the Turkish Cypriot side, because this is the side that has the key which will open the way to conciliation and peace.

GUNAYDIN COMMENTS ON FOREIGN POLICY, NATO

NC070850 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 5 Jan 81 pp 1, -

[Text] Ankara (special)--Diplomatic circles are of the opinion that because of the political changes in the world, Turkish foreign policy may experience critical days and may suffer various difficulties in 1981. These circles believe that tangible changes will occur in international relations soon after Ronald Reagan assumes office as President of the United States. As is known, Reagan considers the policy pursued by the United States in recent years as soft. It is the general conviction of the observers that Reagan, who finds the attitude of the Carter administration soft, will harden his stand toward the same issues.

The new attitude of the United States is important from the viewpoint of Turkey, who is a member of NATO and who has American bases on its territory. It is being argued that the United States may compel Turkey to alter its policy of neutrality and nonintervention in the area. As will be remembered, NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns stated some time ago that in the event of an American intervention in the Middle East, Turkey might be asked to provide transit facilities. Again, it is the common conviction of the observers that if the United States pursues a more "interventionist" policy in the Middle East, Turkey will be pressed hard.

Meanwhile, Greece's reintegration into the military wing of NATO in 1980 and its full membership in the EEC as of 1 January 1981, may lead to some headaches in Turkey's foreign policy. It is possible that Greece will try to use the EEC for its own interests, in the same way it has used its NATO membership. Observers say that Turkey has to exercise vigilance because Greece may usher in bad feelings between Turkey and the EEC and that, depending on its organization, it may stiffen its attitude toward Turkey.

In the meantime, Turkey's position will be discussed at the meeting of the Council of Europe, due to be held in Strasbourg at the end of January. A delegation headed by Austrian parliamentarian Steiner was arriving in Turkey today, and it is expected to prepare a report favoring Turkey. Nevertheless, some members may force Europe to antagonize Turkey. It is equally possible that Greece too will participate in these kinds of efforts.

Observers believe that Turkey must pursue an extremely dexterous foreign policy in view of all these developments if it wishes to protect its security.

The following are some of the problems which may give us a headache in 1981:

1. Ronald Reagan, who will assume office as President of the United States on 20 January, will pursue a policy of "responding with force" instead of maintaining a soft attitude toward various international disputes. Because of its current alliances, Turkey may be compelled to participate in this policy.
2. When the United States decides to intervene in the Middle East, it may ask Turkey to provide it with transit facilities. This was personally admitted by NATO Secretary General Luns. Such a situation may cast a shadow on Turkey's neutrality.
3. As the Iranian-Iraqi conflict is going on, Iraq is taking certain initiatives in order to attract Turkey to its side.
4. Turkey's relations with the EEC are already handicapped. These relations may deteriorate further with Greece's intervention.
5. Greece may harden its stand against Turkey by taking advantage of its membership in NATO and the EEC.
6. On 26 January the Council of Europe will debate the situation in Turkey. Some members at this meeting may force Europe to turn against Turkey.

PRESS REACTIONS TO GREECE'S EEC MEMBERSHIP

NC070937 [Editorial report] Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish on 1 January carries on page 5 an unattributed commentary entitled: "They Have Become Europeans and We Have Stayed Asians," in which the commentator refers to Greece's integration into the EEC. After stating that Greece and Turkey had applied for EEC membership more or less at the same time, the commentator added: "Greece competed with time well and used the years well. It has thus become a 'full member' in a much shorter time than envisaged by the Athens agreement. As of today, our Western neighbor will have a say in the Common Market.

"We, on the other hand, are getting farther and farther from the date we had expected to achieve membership. Although our workers had won the right to move about freely in Europe, today, on the contrary, we cannot set foot on the Common Market countries without a visa. The Western powers themselves admit that the West is trying to sever us from Europe and to turn us into a Middle Eastern country.

"Is it our interests to achieve full EEC membership? Such a discussion is now losing its significance. From now on, we may feel the embarrassing pressures of a Common Market with Greece as a full member."

The commentary concludes: "If we can avoid repeating the blunders we have committed in the past, this will be our only gain."

Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish on 1 January carries an article on page 2 by Sami Kohen entitled: "Them and Us." After describing Greece's full membership as a turning point both for Greece and the EEC, Kohen says that this closely concerns Turkey since Greece is Turkey's next door neighbor with which we have many common interests as well as several disputes. "We have, therefore, to start thinking right now about how this development will influence our relations with Greece as well as Turkey's relations with other countries. We must, however, admit that Greece's success in becoming a full member of the EEC is the outcome of the efforts of Greek diplomacy over the past 20 years; the Greeks have thus realized their dreams. Karamanlis has said: 'Europe is now coming to Greece.' This reflects the happiness of the Greeks."

After referring to Greece's advantages and disadvantages in entering the EEC, Kohen goes on to say: "Greece is a country fraught with 'problems' both at home and abroad. The EEC countries, particularly some European countries, will not want to share other people's problems. The domestic problems of Athens or its disputes with Turkey could pose problems for the EEC." Kohen concludes: "Greece's real advantage lies in the political arena. The whole problem is how Greece will use this advantage. The statement recently made to MILLIYET by Greek Prime Minister Rallis that Greece will create no difficulties in the way of Turkey in the EEC, including its efforts for full membership, is encouraging. It is hoped that Athens will not use the EEC as a forum regarding the disputes between the two countries."

On 2 January MILLIYET carries on page 7, an open letter from Mehmet Ali Birand to "Greek friends who have become members of the Common Market as of yesterday." After quoting President Karamanlis as saying "...Europe's frontiers end in the Aegean," Birand says: "An extremely perilous period is beginning between the two countries which may lead to extremely sensitive and even exaggerated situations." In his letter, Birand continues: "If you turn out to be the country which continually opposes Turkey's reasonable demands in the Council of Ministers, if you make specific efforts to turn the policies of the Council against Turkey by taking advantage of the mechanism of the European Commission, if your deputies try to lead to opposition in the European Parliament against the 12 September operation in Turkey, and if you endeavor to incorporate into politics in a concrete manner the approach that 'Europe's frontiers end in the Aegean,' we will know that under no circumstances do you wish friendship with Turkey."

Referring to the blessings of a true friendship between the two countries, Birand says: "In reality, an important opportunity is coming into being for a true Turkish-Greek detente. If the sense of confidence which the EEC membership will give both Greek public opinion and the Greek Government is properly evaluated, the solution of all disputes, including the continental shelf, the Dodecanese and the Aegean airspace, can be accomplished more easily."

On 2 January GUNAYDIN carries on page 3 an editorial entitled "The Race We Have Lost" in which Necati Zincirkiran says: "As one who has been watching the political as well as the economic activity of Greece, it would be unfair not to praise the efforts of Greece both before and after the junta regime, and particularly during the Karmanlis regime.... In the end they have become Europeans. This is a great accomplishment. Karamanlis' role in this is certainly very great."

Zincirkiran concludes: "Those who have caused us to lose this race, in which we had set out more or less at the same time with Greece, are our incapable bureaucrats, a section of our businessmen who easily got used to eating the cream of our internal market, and our so-called intellectuals and timid statesmen who allowed themselves to be carried away by conservative doctrinal views.... Our posterity will not speak very highly of us when they suffer more severely the distresses of not being Europeans."

On 3 January MILLIYET carries on page 2 a commentary by Mumtaz Soysal on Greece's full EEC membership. Soysal says: "This is the most opportune time to rid ourselves of the complex of 'being considered Europeans.' This complex has agitated our heads again now that Greece has entered the EEC. We are Turks from Turkey. Turkey is a country with one bank in Europe and the other in Asia. The same thing can be said of our geography and culture.

"We must realize and accept this as such and we must turn this embarrassment into a sense of superiority." Soysal then goes on to analyze the reasons which have led Greece to enter the Community, and adds: "It is as clear as daylight that Greece's decision to enter the EEC is more 'political' than anything else. Those who run that country now see Europe as an assurance for the protection of their regime. They also believe that their position against Turkey--which is a kind of 'fixed idea' in their heads--will thus be assured. Economic considerations are of secondary importance."

Soysal says that Norway, although a European country, considers entry into the EEC as prejudical to its own economic interests. "Is Norway any less European than Greece?" asks Soysal. He continues: "Turkey should not feel the need to take shelter under the wings of Europe in order to make its future more secure.... In making a decision we must not forget a most important point: being located between the two continents, two cultures and two worlds should not necessarily create bewilderment, indecision and embarrassment for us. On the contrary, it is a unique position, which is full of opportunities, that should be turned into good account."

Istanbul DUNYA in Turkish on 5 January carries on page 2 a short commentary on Greece's integration into the EEC and says: "When we take into consideration the kind of policies which Greece has been pursuing against Turkey over the years, we realize that the provision stipulated by article 28 of the partnership agreement will not and cannot adequately counter a probable veto by Greece against Turkey's application for full membership. Therefore, if it is not too late, the political and legal aspects of this issue must be taken up at the 'coordination meetings' due to begin in January."

FOREIGN MINISTER OLESEN ON NEED FOR SOLIDARITY

LD051647 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 1 Jan 81 p 5

["Sol" report: "Kjeld Olesen Fearful For East-West Relations"]

[Text] At the start of 1981 Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen noted a drastic deterioration in the climate between East and West. According to Kjeld Olesen it is due first and foremost to the situation in Afghanistan and the growing political and military tension in Eastern Europe.

"This makes great solidarity necessary in the Western alliance. But genuine solidarity will have to be accompanied by the necessary dialogue, so that all aspects of the complicated problems can be included in appraisals. An escalation of the arms race cannot alone be a satisfactory Western reaction," the foreign minister said.

In his New Year statement he added that the government is still of the opinion that relations with the Third World cannot be divorced from the East-West problems.

On his discussions during his meeting with Romanian President Ceausescu, with whom he discussed the situation in Poland, he said:

NEW COMMISSION EXAMINES BUDGET, JOB APPOINTMENTS

LD071243 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 7 Jan 81 p 4

[Alan Osborn dispatch: "EEC Jobs Struggle Delayed"]

[Text] Brussels--The new 14-member EEC Commission, which will serve as the Common Market for the next four years, met for the first time in Brussels yesterday but put off important decisions until today or even later.

Meeting under the presidency of Mr Gaston Thorn, the former foreign minister of Luxembourg who has taken over from Mr Roy Jenkins, the Commission made a first examination of the budget problem and then went in to the vital question of how to divide up jobs among the commissioners.

In both cases, they agreed to break off their deliberations and resumed talks today. This marks a break with tradition.

Normally, the new Commission goes on throughout a "night of the long knives" in a struggle over which commissioner should get which job.

This more studied approach may mark a more workmanlike attitude to EEC business by Mr Thorn than that taken by Mr Jenkins, who made little secret of his distaste for technicalities and day-to-day routine.

But it does not guarantee there will be a quick solution to the jobs problem. Many new commissioners, including Mr Ivor Richard, the former U.N. ambassador who takes over the Labour "seat" vacated by Mr Jenkins, are desperately fighting for worthwhile jobs in the new Commission.

The problem is that virtually all the heavyweight jobs, are held by stayers-on from the previous Commission, with none apparently willing to give way.

For Britain, this means that Mr Christopher Tugendhat, who now becomes the senior British commissioner and a vice-president of the Commission, is fairly certain to hold on to the very important job of running the Common Market budget.

On the budget question, the new Commission is faced with an immediate problem of how to tackle the refusal by France, Germany and Belgium to pay their share of the extra spending in 1981 written in to the budget by the European Parliament.

On jobs, Mr Richard will be trying to secure responsibility for industry or social affairs. Britain's first choice for its second commissioner would have been development policy, but it now looks as though it will be impossible to prise this away from the French.

GENSCHER REAFFIRMS COMMITMENT TO NATO DECISION

[Text] Bonn, 7 Jan (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher made a strong appeal in the cabinet today in Bonn not to allow any doubts to arise regarding Bonn's attitude toward NATO's double decision--installation of 572 medium-range missiles in West Europe and at the same time offering East-West disarmament talks. Government spokesman Kurt Becker announced after the cabinet session that Genscher called on members of government to support clearly and unequivocally the December 1979 alliance decision.

According to Genscher, who presided over the cabinet meeting during Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's absence, the "disadvantageous impression" should not arise either in Washington or other Western capitals or in Moscow that the Federal Government's attitude is wavering. The government spokesman said the reason for Genscher's warning was the "internal German voices" which might convey an impression to the NATO partners which does not correspond with the Bonn government's policy.

According to Becker, Genscher did not name the sources for this view. Observers are certain, however, that the deputy chancellor was referring to critical voices in the SPD which called for a reexamination of the NATO decision. The government spokesman said Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel also expressed his fears in the cabinet regarding an increase in "pacifist moods" in the Federal Republic and other West European countries. Despite numerous questions, Becker would give no details of the reasons for Apel's fears.

DIE WELT Comments on Trip

[Report by correspondent Rolf Goertz: "Schmidt in Morocco, Only a Stopover or an Offensive?"]

[Text] Madrid--Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is in Morocco for a 2-day official visit. What he would like to dismiss as a mere "stopover en route home" from his nearby vacation resort on Grand Canary Island must be viewed as part of a concentrated peace action of the Western powers in northwest Africa and the Middle East. While Schmidt meets with King Hassan II, a French delegation in the Algerian town of Tindouf is holding talks with politicians of the Saharian Polisario rebel organization which is at war with Morocco, and with members of the Algerian Government. French Premier Raymond Barre will soon join the delegation. Federal Foreign Minister Genscher is scheduled to visit Algeria on 11 January. The Polisario organization seeks to convert the Western Sahara occupied by Morocco into a separate state. Reagan's special envoy Henry Kissinger also is expected by King Hassan in the next few days.

Since the Carter administration in the United States wasted many chances, Hassan's moderating influence did not meet with the desirable echo from the Arab camp. This is why Rabat quarters assess the visit by the German chancellor as a revitalization of the political and diplomatic activities of the West in North Africa and in the Middle East. Observers directly link the chancellor's Moroccan talks with his recent meeting with U.S. President-elect Ronald Reagan.

During his exchange of views with King Hassan and members of the Moroccan Government the chancellor will not confine himself to the good German-Moroccan relations and to the common interests in a peaceful solution in the Middle East. Spain and Portugal also hope that the chancellor's visit might contribute to an appeasement of northwest Africa itself.

A Saharan socialist people's republic as originally pursued by the Polisario with Soviet help and with the support of Algeria, and above all of Libya, might endanger the strategic triangle which keeps the entrance to the Mediterranean between the Azores and the nearby Canary Islands under Western control.

PAPERS DISCUSS KISSINGER'S MIDDLE EAST TOUR

DW070945 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West German 0605 GMT 7 Jan 81

[Press review on the Middle East tour of former U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger]

[Text] Here is some comment on the Middle East exploratory talks by former U.S. Secretary of State Kissinger. Frankfurter ALLGEMEINE writes: Kissinger's private Middle East tour, which has gotten good results so far, covers stations on which the United States would like to rely in its defense against Soviet expansion. It is strategic tourism. What can be derived from the utterances of the traveler seems to be intended as a lesson, and not just an incidental one, to the Europeans who labor under the delusion that they can convert their own Middle East initiative from paper to reality. Kissinger was right when he said the Middle East policy of Europe and of the United States should be coordinated. In truth, it would even have to be integrated. Anyway, Europeans always should keep in mind that they cannot accomplish anything in that region without the Americans. Kissinger is not the infallible prophet of future developments between the oriental and occidental worlds, but he is a good analyst of the situation.

Bremen's WESER-KURIER makes this comment: Ronald Reagan, much more than his predecessor Jimmy Carter, will try to put the weight of the United States as a superpower on the scales for the purpose of solving the Middle East conflict. There is little doubt about that anymore after the appearance yesterday of Henry Kissinger in Jerusalem. Granted, the ideas of the former secretary of state must not necessarily be those of the future U.S. president. Yet, Kissinger, contrary to what he keeps saying, is not touring the Middle East as a private citizen, but is at least on a semiofficial mission. That is to say, he is traveling on behalf of the man who will be moving into the White House 2 weeks from now. Being one of the most internationally experienced negotiators, he is perfectly aware that any utterance during this tour immediately is linked to the new administration in Washington. This is why he chooses his words with great care when he speaks of the need for a visible U.S. military presence in the Middle East as a reply to the Soviet policy of expansion.

ECONOMICS MINISTRY RELEASES SITUATION REPORT

[Hans-J. Mahnke article: "Economics Ministry Does Not See Improvement in the Situation"]

[Text] Bonn--The weakness of the German economy continues. The Federal Economics Ministry attributes this, above all, "to the worldwide damping influence of the increased energy prices." The ministry's latest situation report points out that the gross national product, adjusted to seasonal and calendar peculiarities, again showed a real decrease from the second to the third quarters. The decrease by 0.5 percent, however, is clearly lower than that of the preceding quarter. Thus ultimately the level of the previous year was exceeded by slightly more than 0.5 percent.

"Even if the retarding forces obviously wielded less weight lately than they did during the spring and summer months, the latest results do not yet indicate any fundamental change in the overall economic situation," the Economics Ministry states. The demand for products of the German industry took a "steady course" also in the fall, without the tendencies of decline discernible since the spring further continuing. However, the orders received in September and October decreased by 0.5 percent compared with July and August. The orders from abroad increased slightly again (by 0.5 percent) while the domestic orders decreased by 2.5 percent.

In the opinion of the ministry, the performance of the production industry (not including the construction sector) lately showed signs of some "stabilization on a reduced level" after the clear production deceleration in the second and third quarters. Thus, production slightly increased in October compared with the preceding months.

The Economics Ministry believes that the decelerated overall economic development has not yet left any marked traces on employment. Thus, seasonally adjusted, the number of wage and salary earners at most decreased just slightly from the second to the third quarter. "This may be indicative of the fact that the companies do not reckon with a long-lasting decline in the economic activities," the ministry says. Apparently, the level of employment achieved is being maintained even under conditions of declining production output so as to prevent potential frictions in the course of an economic revitalization. The unemployment rate increased from 3.8 percent in October to 4.2 percent in November. A year ago, it amounted to a mere 3.5 percent.

The deceleration in the price development discernible in nearly all sectors of the economy after the middle of the year lately has stagnated. While the price level of the preceding year was exceeded by 5.1 percent in October, the increase rate came to 5.3 percent in November. Considerable price-hiking influences emanated, above all, from the foodstuffs subject to seasonal conditions, but also from mineral-oil products and other energy sources.

BERLIN DEPUTY MAYOR RESIGNS IN CREDIT SCANDAL

[Excerpt] Berlin, 7 Jan (DPA)--Wolfgang Lueder (FDP), Berlin deputy mayor and senator for economic affairs, who is involved in the Garski affair, today resigned from the Senat. After a 5-hour private meeting of the FDP group in the house of representatives, he said that next Tuesday he formally will tender his resignation to the president of the house of representatives.

He said that the discussions in the FDP group convinced him that his resignation would be better for the party without awaiting the findings of the parliamentary investigations committee. Before announcing his intention to resign, Lueder informed FDP Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher about developments.

Lueder, the Berlin senator for economic affairs, is accused of having failed as a member of the credit-guarantee committee to check the economic status of the firm run by Berlin architect Dietrich Garski. The senate gave a credit guarantee worth DM115 million to the firm. Finance Senator Klaus Riebschlaeger, who is resigning to become SPD floor leader, also sat on the committee which extended the credit guarantee to Garski, who has since gone bankrupt.

Lueder will remain chairman of the Berlin FDP for the time being. He pointed out that a regional party congress will meet in May and that decisions will have to be made by then.

DEFENSE MINISTER REJECTS LIBYAN-CHAD MERGER

[Text] Paris, 7 Jan (AFP)--France would never approve a merger of Libya and Chad, French Development Aid and Defense Minister Robert Galley said on television here today.

He was commenting on a reported plan to unite the two countries announced yesterday after a visit to Libya by Chadian head of state Goukouni Oueddei.

Mr Galley said the merger contravened international agreements and in particular accords negotiated in Nigeria in 1979 with all parties to the Chadian dispute under the auspices of the central African country's neighbours.

Announcement of the merger plan followed Mr Goukouni's victory, with Libyan help, over the forces of his former defence minister, Hissein Habre after a year-long battle in the capital, Ndjamena.

Today, Mr Galley denied that France, which for many years maintained troops in its former colony, planned military intervention.

The minister noted that France pulled out its troops from Chad in May 1980 in line with the accords negotiated in Lagos, and he deplored that "some people" who were party to the 1979 accords had maintained their troops in Chad. This, he said, was unacceptable.

Mr Galley also said he did not know of any meeting of the Chadian transition government during which the merger decision might have been taken. This decision went against the Lagos accord by which free elections were to have taken place to install a government of national union, he said.

He added that France had not taken sides during Chad's civil war: "France gave Chad its independence in 1960, and since then it has done everything to maintain its unity and territorial integrity," he said.

France could not intervene in Chad as it only intervened "on a government's explicit demand," he added.

Meanwhile, the French Foreign Ministry announced today that Chadian nationals planning to visit France would not require a visa. Until now, Chadians could freely reside and work in France.

SPOKESMAN SAYS FRANCE, GDR WANT TO DOUBLE TRADE

[Excerpt] Paris, 7 Jan (DPA)--France and the GDR want to more than double their trade from the present figure of about M860 million to more than M2 billion per annum by 1982. This was confirmed today by the office of French Premier Raymond Barre. Yesterday, he had a meeting with the state secretary in the GDR Foreign Trade Ministry, Gerhard Beil.

A spokesman for Barre denied, however, that the two sides linked this intention with the development of the situation in Poland, as was reported yesterday evening from circles close to Barre. The spokesman refused to comment on this question.

It was said yesterday that both Barre and Beil stated that East-West relations as a whole and especially between the GDR and France should not be influenced by the political situation in Poland. The hope was expressed that Poland will solve its problems alone.

BERLINGUER SCORES DC IN NEW YEAR'S STATEMENT

[Text] The wishes which at the start of 1981 we convey to our comrades are the same wishes as we convey to all those who suffer but are not resigned to injustice and violence and who, like us communists, are hoping and fighting to surmount and eliminate them in Italy and throughout the world.

The first wish is that peace will prevail throughout the world. Mankind refuses to be dragged toward nuclear disaster. But to prevent the aspiration for peace from being betrayed, there must be a more determined struggle by all peoples to ensure that the major powers' policy rediscovers the paths of wisdom, dialogue and cooperation, to ensure that the existing conflicts among states are resolved through negotiations, to ensure that the crazy and lethal rearmament race ceases, and to ensure that the vast problems of famine, backwardness and economic and social imbalances are tackled, while subduing the egoism of the wealthy.

The PCI, which has established itself and is acknowledged as a major autonomous national force, will remain loyal to its internationalist tradition and inspiration, demonstrating in its policy and initiatives in the European and world contexts, and through its involvement among the masses its support for and solidarity with the workers of all countries and all forces fighting for their emancipation, freedom, social justice, national independence and socialism.

In Italy, 1980 was a painful and burdensome year. It was the year of the Bologna massacre and the earthquake in Campania and Basilicata. It was the year when the accumulation of scandals in public life become too much to endure. It was also a year when attacks resumed on the working class and the workers and economical and social life deteriorated still further.

The response given to these negative and alarming events by the economic groups and political forces which still hold the essential controls of public authorities has been entirely inadequate; indeed, it has been a succession of errors, lack of foresight and petty partisan calculations. This is the principal cause of the dangerous spread of mistrust and suspicion toward the state through the broad strata of society.

But the year which we are leaving behind us also provided further definite proof that in Italy there are major combative energies opposed to the country's decline. So it is not true that everything is in jeopardy. And this has rightly been stressed by the president of the republic, among others.

This has been seen in the generous impetus with which workers, citizens of all classes, young people, volunteer groups, local organizations and divisions of the armed forces, Carabinieri and police have done and are still doing their utmost in providing aid to and solidarity with the people so terribly hit by the earthquake. It has been seen in the magnificent struggle steadfastly waged by the Fiat workers and by workers in many other factories. It has been seen in the powerful and admonitory response of the Bologna people, their administration and all Italian citizens to the 2 August fascist massacre. It has been and can still be seen in honest people's revolt against the corruption and profiteering which are still protected by too many instances of powerful tacit complicity.

It is this Italy which the Directorate addressed on 27 December, when it proposed a radical change in the leadership of the state and of society--a government for which the PCI would constitute the driving force and guarantor.

DC No Longer Capable of Leading Italy's Government

We requested and still request the support of all honest people both inside and outside the parties, of the healthy forces of labor, production and culture, of the democrats of every tendency and of people within the state bodies determined not to yield an inch to the subversive attacks and blackmail of terrorism, who want an efficient and clean government and an economy freed from the stifling burden of parasitism and corrupt practices of every kind.

The events of the last part of the year have made it obvious that the DC is no longer capable of leading Italy's Government. We give the Italian people three proofs of this, on decisive points:

In the face of the explosion of corruption and scandals, the DC leaders have shown their disinclination and inability to change their government methods and to regenerate their party; indeed, the DC has withdrawn into an arrogant defense of its entire power system and of the activity of all its representatives, including the most controversial;

The earthquake tragedy laid bare the complete inefficiency which DC-led governments have brought to public administration and the state machinery;

Last, just a few days ago, we witnessed the DC's and the government's indecisive and inconsistent conduct with respect to the terrorists' blackmail.

This is why we say that there must be a real change of direction in Italy's leadership. We hope that this realization will be reached as soon as possible by the parties, political groups and individuals who have hitherto endorsed, shared in or submitted to the DC's power system and misgovernment.

The proposal that we have put forward is well founded and necessary and demanded by events and experience. It is not a rejection and condemnation of the parties but a denunciation of the evident and major shortcomings of the present government parties, and it constitutes the utmost and highly responsible pressure to ensure that they are thoroughly reformed and that they rise to the current problems. Partly and perhaps precisely because of this we are well aware how much resistance our proposal will encounter, with what excuses and maneuvers people will try to evade it. However, we are also well aware that major forces within the workers movement and throughout society, the Catholic world and the secular parties are sensitive to the need for a real political and moral regeneration in the country's leadership and can commit themselves with us to struggle to achieve it.

The entire party must be aware of how intensive and continuous its masss political, ideological and organizational action must be to fulfill the task which it is now called on to perform.

We need a party more united and consistent in its practical activity aimed at realizing the objectives which it has set itself and proposed to the workers and the entire country--a combative, vigorous and specific party, open to innovation, determined to encourage all positive energies and willing to conduct a dialogue and reach understanding with all the forces aspiring to change.

With this confidence the Communists greet the new year, which for us will also be the year when we commemorate our 60th year of history, to draw from it a new impetus and a new lesson to improve ourselves and continue our struggle successfully.

'OVERT DIFFERENCES' REPORTED IN GDR-DANISH TALKS

[Text] Copenhagen, 7 Jan (DPA)--The first day of GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer's visit to Denmark ended today with overt differences of opinion. Danish Foreign Minister Kjelo Olesen said that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is responsible for the worsening East-West relations. "The occupation of Afghanistan by Soviet forces is a violation of the international community's legal principles and a serious setback for detente," he said.

He hopes, he said, that the Poles will be able to solve their problems without any external pressure or interference. The Danish Government will continue to support the resumption of SALT negotiations in order to achieve the largest possible reduction of strategic arms.

Fischer said that it is a matter of priority that the United States ratify the SALT II agreement and that Soviet-American negotiations on the limitation and reduction of strategic arms are continued. He called the voluntary withdrawal of 20,000 Soviet soldiers and 1,000 tanks from the GDR a first step which documented Moscow's desire for detente. "What mankind and Europe in particular need are not new missiles, nor a new arms spiral, but a stop to the arms race," he said.

NORWAY

FRYDENLUND ON NUCLEAR-FREE ZONES, NATO CONFLICTS

LD071629 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 6 Jan 81 p 52

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA interview with Norwegian Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund: "Resist Doomsday Prophesies"; place not given]

[Text] "Decisions that will be made in the next few months will decide whether the world will become a more dangerous place or whether it will be possible to steer developments in a more positive direction. The year 1981 will be an important year," Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund said in an interview with NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA at the turn of the year.

Frydenlund said that it is important that we do not allow ourselves to be carried along by the doomsday prophesies we hear nowadays or by fatalism. The worsening situation has been created by people, and it is people who must get the world on the right track again, he stressed.

"There can be no doubt that the international situation has become much more complicated and tense than in the past, and this, together with the intense debate on the nuclear arms race, can explain why the fear of war has become more widespread--according to the opinion polls, stronger in Norway than in other countries."

[Answer] We have great international involvement, perhaps the strongest we have ever had. Our international position is by no means bad, even though we do not have as central a position in world politics as we might imagine. We also now have a much more wide-ranging foreign policy debate in Norway, which has resulted in greater efforts for disarmament against the apartheid regime in South Africa and for a new world economic order.

[Question] Have you considered any models for a future plan on the question of a nuclear-free area in the Nordic countries?

[Answer] Here I will refer to the draft in the Labor Party manifesto which says: Norway will work for a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic area as part of the work for nuclear-free zones in a broader context. [answer ends]

Frydenlund pointed out that first this will mean a more active attitude in the work for nuclear-free zones, and second that a nuclear-free Nordic area will not be an isolated action but a phase in a process, in which during the first phase a reduction in the numbers of nuclear arms in Europe will be achieved through negotiation. A nuclear-free Nordic area would be an important pawn or a triggering factor in this work, Frydenlund said.

Frydenlund announced that at the present conference on European security and cooperation Norway will give its active support to bringing about a conference on disarmament in Europe.

[Question] How do you view Ronald Reagan's statements on military superiority over the Soviet Union?

[Answer] The task must be to reach a credible balance between East and West, and with this balance as a foundation try to carry out troop reductions. Military superiority on one side would only lead to uncertainty and further rearmament on the other. It is this arms race and the vicious circle of uncertainty which must be broken.

[Question] Will NATO cooperation be put to even tougher tests in the light of the situation in Poland?

[Answer] As far as Poland is concerned the matter is clear. The NATO nations will stand united. However, in the coming months there could be differences of opinion between the NATO nations of Western Europe and the United States in the following areas:

1. In the view of detente, where the results which have been achieved in relations between East and West mean more to the individual West German then they do to the individual American;

2. In the view of conflicts outside the NATO area, where the United States thinks that the West European countries are leaving these problems to the United States alone. [answer ends]

The compromise, according to Frydenlund, is for the United States to attach greater importance to the possibilities of detente in the European and East-West context, while the West European nations in NATO must involve themselves more actively in resolving conflicts outside the area covered by NATO, but without extending NATO's existing functions to new areas.

SWEDEN

DEFENSE OFFICIAL DISCUSSES SECURITY POLICY

LD080849 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 4 Jan 81 p 3

[Swedish Defense Ministry Under Secretary Sven Hirdman article: "Stabilizing Role"]

[Text] Swedish security policy is shaped to look after Swedes' interests. We have found that a policy of neutrality supported by a strong defense force gives us the best chance of maintaining our peace and freedom.

At the same time Swedish security policy has a very obvious significance for our Nordic neighbors. In the period since the war they have formed their own security policies in part on the basis of the assumption of continued Swedish neutrality and continued strong Swedish defenses, which could prevent threats to their territory via Sweden. We are dependent to a similar extent on the policies pursued by our neighbors. This reciprocal dependence has its obvious geographical and historical causes.

Since World War II we have had a long-term security pattern in the Nordic countries, which has often been called the Nordic Balance. As the Nordic area, for reasons which are given below, has acquired increasing strategic importance for the superpower blocs, increased attention has been paid to Sweden's role in this pattern too. Within both the superpower blocs there is a pronounced interest in Sweden's continuing to play a stabilizing role in northern Europe.

The superpowers' expectations of a possible future war's character are decisive for their peacetime deployment. As the following factors make clear, northern Europe and the North Atlantic have in recent years acquired growing importance for the two superpower blocs' military policy:

At its naval bases on the Kola Peninsula the Soviet Union has based two-thirds of its strategic submarines, which with their long-range nuclear missiles comprise the major part of the Soviet Union's second strike capability. The submarines' operational areas are the Arctic Ocean and the North Atlantic; because of this these sea areas have acquired a corresponding strategic importance.

The Soviet northern fleet also includes many modern surface vessels and attack submarines with the task of both protecting the strategic submarines and in wartime of cutting NATO's lines of communication across the Atlantic. Even now, in peacetime, the Soviet Navy is making appearances with advanced ships further and further south in the Norwegian Sea, and this has an effect among other things in Norway's situation.

In addition, in the western Soviet Union there is the medium-range bomber, the Backfire, with the main task of operating against the NATO aircraft-carrier fleets in the Atlantic and the Norwegian Sea.

NATO has in turn adopted a number of measures in recent years to meet what it sees as a Soviet threat in this area. These include preparations for antisubmarine warfare, modern air and sea surveillance systems, a pattern of more frequent exercises, and planning for reinforcements for Norway and Denmark.

Denmark and southern Norway have come to acquire growing importance as flank areas in the event of a conventional superpower conflict in central Europe. Danish defenses are in many ways inseparable from West Germany's. The Norwegian and Danish airfields would be especially important in a struggle for air supremacy on the continent.

The Baltic has by no means lost its importance for military policy. The majority of the Soviet naval shipyards are located on the Baltic, and their repair capacity could influence the outcome of a long superpower conflict. Forward military exercises are held in the Baltic several times each year. The control of Oresund and the Belts [seaways through Danish islands] would be of great importance for either the East or the West in a conflict in Europe.

Sweden's large territory occupies a central position in the Nordic countries. Attack operations on or through our Nordic neighbors would be made easier with at least access to parts of Swedish land, sea or air territory. Developments in military technology, including cruise missiles and the increased range of tactical aircraft, heighten this tendency. To this extent Sweden has acquired increased importance as a strategic corridor area.

To sum up, it is possible to assert that the Nordic countries have for several reasons acquired greater strategic interest for the superpowers, that their military involvement in the area has therefore grown, and that this means that if a military conflict between East and West breaks out in Europe it could also affect the Nordic countries at an early stage.

We should not of course speculate about an imminent superpower war. The probability of this is still very small in Europe. The deterrents work, primarily because of the existence of nuclear arms, and the borders between the power blocs have been stable since 1948. But even against the background of total peace Swedish defense has acquired greater importance for our neighbors' security policy.

The Swedish policy of neutrality and the Swedish defense forces' strength have formed two of the most important factors in the stable Nordic security pattern. Since World War II Swedish policies have been seen as one of the guarantees for a continuation of the status quo in the Nordic countries.

Thus it has been an advantage for the Finnish policy of neutrality that Sweden by means of its nonaligned foreign policy and its strong defenses has constituted an area free from superpower involvement west of Finland. The traditional Swedish policy of neutrality has also been able to give support in other ways to the Finnish policy of neutrality, as this has taken shape since World War II.

The fact that Norway and Denmark have been able to express certain reservations about their NATO membership ever since 1949 in their so-called nuclear and base policy has been partly due to the realization of Sweden's importance as a buffer for these states. If the Swedish defense forces' strength decreases, this could have repercussions for the Norwegain and Danish policies of alliance. Within the NATO framework they could then have to consider whether they would have to adopt compensatory measures to guarantee their own security.

If so, several of these measures would have to be adopted in peacetime. All in all, so important a shift could occur in the Nordic security pattern that we all would find ourselves in a worse position. There are close connections between security policies of the various Nordic countries, which makes it impossible to alter basic values in a single country without affecting the whole.

It is the rest of the world's view of Swedish neutralist policy and Swedish defense which is decisive here. Every state acts on the basis of its own appraisals, and not on the basis of ours. The debate within Sweden on the defense forces' future composition has already lead to ideas abroad that Swedish defense strength has been seriously weakened.

What we sometimes forget is that our debate has not so much been about our defense during the eighties, which largely as a result of earlier defense efforts are strong, as about how the defense forces will look in the nineties after the 1982 and 1987 defense resolutions. Despite the fact that ideas of a reduction in Swedish defense strength thus are exaggerated as far as the eighties are concerned, they do influence many foreign observers' view of Sweden at the present time. It is of course especially serious if such ideas gain a foothold with the superpowers or with our neighbors, and there lead to new measures in foreign or defense policy.

FOURTH ROUND OF INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS OPENS 7 JAN

[Text] The first session of the fourth round of the intercommunal talks was held at the Ledra Palace Hotel this afternoon.

A UN statement said that discussions on resettling Varosha under UN auspices were resumed at the meeting. The statement added that various aspects of the issue were further discussed and explained in a spirit of good will. The next meeting will be held on Friday, 16 January, when both sides will continue the discussion on the initial practical measures to promote good will, mutual confidence and the return to normalcy.

Speaking before the meeting began, Greek Cypriot representative Ioannidhis said that the Greek Cypriot side expects the Turkish Cypriot side to take a positive stance on the Varosha resettlement issue. If this is done, Ioannidhis said, it will have a favorable effect on the talks, which, he added, will be very useful to both communities. Ioannidhis said: We continue the talks with readiness to hold a constructive dialogue leading to a viable and logical solution to the Cypriot issue.

In reply to a question, Turkish Cypriot representative Onan said that he was going to submit what he described as very concrete proposals on Famagusta. In answer to a question on how he can link the Varosha issue with practical measures, he said that all issues are interlinked and that all four aspects of the problem are included in the total settlement. In answer to a question on what is being done about the priority of Varosha, Onan replied: I think you must not insist on priorities. My view, he added, is if we come to an agreement on one issue then the rest of the issues will certainly follow.

Waldheim's Proposals

NC080909 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 8 Jan 81 p 1, 7

[Text] Yesterday, authoritative diplomatic circles confirmed that the question of the resettlement of Varosha and of the practical measures, or rather the exchanges, demanded by the Turkish side have taken a completely different form within the framework of the intercommunal talks which, as of yesterday, entered the fourth and most substantive round.

Specifically, these authoritative circles have disclosed that these questions are now being discussed on the basis of a fresh proposal which UN Secretary General Waldheim submitted and explained during his recent New York meetings with Foreign Minister Rolandhis and Mr Atakol, the Turkish Cypriot side's representatives.

Dr Waldheim's proposal, which has been described by UN circles as an attempt to resolve the deadlock in the issue, aims at the simultaneous operation of the Nicosia international airport--under absolute UN control--and the resettlement of Varosha.

The same UN circles have maintained that the operation of the airport by the United Nations and the free use of the airport for the movement of passengers and cargo for the benefit of all the regions of Cyprus and, above all, the abolition of the illegal Tymbou airport, would resolve to a large extent the problem of taking other practical measures by the Greek Cypriot side that would entail direct or indirect recognition of the Turkish Cypriot "state"--such as the lifting of restrictions which the Turkish side has described as an economic embargo.

As for the operation of the Famagusta harbor, sources close to the United Nations said that if agreement is reached on the reopening of the Nicosia airport, along with the resettlement of Varosha, it will not be difficult to deal with this question by means of some kind of arrangement of common acceptance.

According to private reports, the following questions are the subject of discussion in connection with the Waldheim proposal:

1. What would be the specific area of Varosha for resettlement? It has been learned that the Waldheim proposal provides that the area will be the same that was envisaged by the Western plan--that is, south of the Famagusta-Larnaca road and to the east of the Ayios Nikolaos base. This area does not include the quarters of Sakkaria, Nea Smirni, Karaolos and so forth where 4,000-5,000 Greeks were living. Until today the Turkish side insisted that the area for resettlement be confined to a coastal strip, to something that Denktas described as one city quarter. On the other hand, the Greek Cypriot side is implying for resettlement the entire area which was inhabited by Greeks, and it appears that the Greek Cypriot side is insisting on this view.

2. Since, following resettlement, the city of Varosha and its administration will be a UN responsibility, and if the whole area is declared a demilitarized area, the insistence of the Turks to set up entry and exit check points--even with the presence of UN observers--is unacceptable.

3. The Turks insist that 50 percent of the Nicosia airport personnel should be Turkish Cypriots and that the Turkish Army should exercise some control over the operation of and movement at the airport.

4. Since movement through the airport will be free, what travel documents are the Turkish Cypriots going to use? The Turks insist that Turkish Cypriot passports should bear the seal of the "Turkish Cypriot Federated State."

5. In view of the fact that with the reopening of the airport the movement of foreign tourists to and from the occupied territories will be free, the Greek Cypriot side is faced with the question of substantive recognition and legalization of the Turkish occupation of hotels of Greek ownership in the occupied areas. In connection with this, and of course if final agreement is reached, it is being suggested that the Turks be asked to allow the Greek hotel owners and their personnel to resettle there and to be free to run these hotels. Finally, among the views which are being discussed in an effort for a compromise solution that would not entail acceptance by the lawful state arrangements that would put the occupation status on the same footing there is one of setting up a special independent authority or organization to run the Nicosia airport and the Famagusta harbor. It must be noted that if the illegal Tymbou airfield is abolished, the Turks have hinted that they will demand the abolition of the Larnaca airfield as well.

EDEK LEADER DEMANDS DIPLOMATIC BREAK WITH ISRAEL

[Text] The general secretary of the socialist EDEK Party, Mr Takis Khatzidhimitriou, has demanded the severance of relations with Israel on the grounds that Israeli intelligence services are reportedly active in Cyprus against Cypriot interests.

Among such activities Mr Khatzidhimitriou lists the bombing which nearly killed the Syrian journalist, Mr Hani al-Hindi in Limassol last Saturday.

However, the Cyprus Government avoided any comment yesterday on press reports according to which the alien detained in connection with the bombing has made "confessions" that he is of Israeli origin and had Israeli accomplices.

The investigations are continuing and nothing can be said at this stage. The government spokesman said:

Mr Khatzidhimitriou, a member of the House, in a question which he addresses through the House to the Ministry of the Interior, says that "a whole series of events and reports convince that Israeli agents are operating in a criminal manner in Cyprus against Cypriot interests."

He mentions that there have been reports that the Israeli civil aviation authority, in maps it publishes, acknowledges the existence of a Flight Information Region pertaining to Ercan (Tymbou) airfield, that there has been a case of an Israeli member of the diplomatic staff drawing a pistol in public place and of "Israeli agents being involved in the attempt on the life of the Syrian journalists", while the case of the killing of two Palestinians in December 1979 is still unresolved.

"The severance of diplomatic relations with Israel, on account of their anti-Cypriot policy is an old demand. All these events convince that a decision must be taken as soon as possible. The Cyprus Government is asked what practical measures are planned in this direction," Mr Khatzidhimitriou asks.

TURKEY'S OZAL CONCLUDES CONTACTS IN NORTH REGION

[Text] Turkish Deputy Prime Minister and State Minister Turgut Ozal concluded his contacts in the TFSC and returned to Turkey this evening.

In a statement at Ercan (Tymbou) state airport before his departure, Ozal explained the motives of his contacts with TFSC officials. He said: We wanted to investigate the compatibility of the economic program aiming at a free market, which has been implemented in Turkey for the past year, with the economic system in Cyprus and ways of applying a similar or more advanced system in Cyprus and to impart this information to the relevant people in Turkey. Pointing out that the real aim is to strengthen the economic structure of the TFSC, Ozal expressed the belief that if harmony is achieved between the work conducted here and in Turkey, positive results can be obtained.

Replying to journalists' questions, Ozal noted that the status of the state economic enterprises was also discussed during his contacts. Pointing out that the subject of increasing interest rates was also taken up, he recalled that the rate of interest applied to foreign currency deposits is higher than the rate applied to the Turkish lira. Ozal noted that interest rates should be readjusted in a bid to encourage savings. He said that this would be done and expressed the conviction that a reasonable rate of interest would be determined. In reply to another question, Ozal said that the inflation in Cyprus is, to a great extent, related to the inflation in Turkey. He explained that as long as the Turkish lira is the (?accepted currency) in the TFSC, the local inflation would generally behave in parallel to the inflation in Turkey. Pointing out that the measures adopted in Turkey have begun to curb inflation, Ozal said that the positive consequences of this would be felt in Cyprus as well.

Ozal noted that a change of the monetary unit was not discussed during his talks and that such a thing is out of the question for the time being.

In his statement at Ercan airport, Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay said that agreement was reached during the talks to work further. Cagatay noted that the talks would be continued within this framework.

TRADE MINISTER STARIBACHER TO VISIT MOSCOW 18 JAN

[Summary] Trade Minister Josef Staribacher will pay a 2-day official visit to Moscow beginning 18 January. On this occasion he will sign a long-term program for economic cooperation with the Soviet Union that was worked out some time ago. This cooperation program, which originally was to have been signed in Vienna last fall, contains detailed lists of envisaged cooperation projects as well as lists of goods on which both sides agreed to focus special attention in an effort to intensify economic relations. The program is coordinated with the new Soviet 5-year plan from 1981-1985.

In addition, Director General Fremuth of the Austrian Federal Power Company, who will accompany Staribacher to Moscow, will have talks with Soviet officials on the planned power exchange--expensive Austrian peak-load power in exchange for less expensive base-load power to be supplied by the CEMA power grid. This power exchange would require an extension of the West Ukraine-Budapest power line to Vienna, and the construction in Vienna-Oberlaab of a direct-current coupling plant to link the CEMA grid to the Austrian power grid.

"The Moscow talks with government representatives and experts of the Soviet Energy Ministry will deal primarily with possibilities of financing this large project, with technical and credit questions, and with the exchange ratio for mutual power supplies."

USSR CUTS NATURAL GAS QUOTA BY ONE-THIRD

AU081503 [Editorial Report] Vienna Domestic Service in German at 1158 GMT on 8 January carries a news report stating that "the Soviet Union has announced a cut of its natural gas deliveries to Austria for the first quarter of this year," by "about one-third of the current quota." In the same program, Vienna Domestic Service at 1122 GMT carries a backgrounder on the Austrian natural gas situation referring to the announced cut in Soviet deliveries by saying that "technical reasons, the nature of which were not explained," have been given as the reason for the measure. According to the authors of the latter report--Hans Adler and Ernst Behersdorfer--such delivery cuts "for technical reasons" have occurred several times before, and although Soviet deliveries amount to nearly half of Austria's annual natural gas consumption--2.5 out of 5.2 billion cubic meters--an Austrian Oil Administration [OEMV] source has pointed out that in view of Austria's ample natural gas reserves private households and large gas users will not be affected by the cut in Soviet gas deliveries. This view is shared by the Vienna and Lower Austrian Gas Companies, while the Upper Austrian Gas Company has warned large gas users including the Voest Steel Corporation, that a 50 percent cut in their gas allotments might have to be imposed as of 1 April. In this context a Voest spokesman voiced the hope that during his forthcoming talks in Moscow, Trade Minister Staribacher might succeed in inducing the Soviets to supply more gas to Austria after all.

The authors quote an OEMV spokesman as saying that, as usual at this time of the year, an OEMV delegation is at present negotiating in Moscow on this year's natural gas import quotas, and that only after its return will the 1981 quotas for each province be fixed by the annual Austrian gas conference of the OEMV and the provincial gas companies. On this occasion, the OEMV will also inform the gas companies to what extent the Soviet side intends to fulfill its 1981 delivery quota by higher deliveries later this year.

VICE ADMIRAL FROMM COMMENTS ON NAVY'S ROLE

[Text] Flensburg, 8 Jan (DPA)--According to Navy Commander Vice Admiral Guenter Fromm, the Federal Navy is aware of its widening foreign policy role "in the service of peace."

Speaking today at the 21st conference on the history of tactics of the Federal Navy in Flensburg, Fromm said he considered actions like the 1911 "leap of the panther" unthinkable. The government of the German reich at the same time sent a gunboat to Morocco as a token of its economic claims.

Even so, Fromm said, the Federal Navy has to carry out "in close cooperation with the allies, the political task of securing access to energy and raw materials, especially overseas." "This does not mean that we want to be a naval power operating in the Indian Ocean," the admiral said. However, it cannot be excluded that the Federal Navy will have to close a gap in northern Europe if the United States and Britain have to strengthen their presence in more southern regions. For the German Navy, the main task remains to secure jointly with the Danish Navy the Baltic region and its approaches and, with other NATO partners, the supply routes in the North Sea.

According to Fromm, the Federal Navy visited 60 countries during the past 5 years. On all occasions the bearing of the crews was universally praised.

According to Fromm, the equipment program for the navy, costing a total of DM12.5 billion, is to be fully implemented within the next few years. The navy then will have 6 122-class frigates, 6 Troika minesweeping systems, 10 143-A class patrol boats and 112 Tornado planes.

COLUMNIST VIEWS IMPACT OF FUTURE U.S. POLICIES

[Friedhelm Kemna editorial: "The New Sound of the Trumpet"]

[Text] The period of paralysis is approaching its end. The conditions of no more and not yet, which smokescreened the features of U.S. action and forced the protagonists of world politics into a standby position, cease to be applicable. The United States of Ronald Reagan's presidency is providing new, concrete orientation data. It provides course data on a policy from which the Americans and their friends in the world--and also their adversaries--anticipate a new quality of leadership and reliability.

Reagan's legacy, which he must administer in keeping with priorities of his own, includes partnership with Europe, something that has high political rank. Now at the close of a decade which began for the Old World with so much hope for changing the confrontation between East and West into cooperation, balance of interests and detente, it finds it must cope with what actually has resulted. And what has resulted is depressing, at least after Afghanistan and under the spell of the Polish drama. As far as tensions and conflict are concerned, the era of detente has by far exceeded the cold war.

This Europe has become a difficult partner for the United States, having been disconcerted by political and world economic crisis conditions and irritated by the Western superpower's weakness in leadership and action. In this regard, the United States did not meet the expectations of its friends in the upward surge that followed the depths of Vietnam and Watergate and, thus, it aroused a new appetite on the part of the competing Soviet power. It is a difficult Europe which, facing challenge, particularly from claims made by the Third World, has entered into a global competition with the United States. It has done so in the depressive atmosphere of the Russian coup in Afghanistan and the situation in the Middle East.

Yet, unlike Jimmy Carter, who in the confusing handling of what he had inherited, did not succeed in rebuilding the solid, powerful political antipole in the Atlantic alliance, his successor is setting clear targets which Europe will not be able to avoid. The political strategy expounded to the U.S. Senate by Caspar Weinberger, Reagan's designated secretary of defense, is intended to impose on the Europeans a new commitment for productive debates. The discussion on arms and arms control will have to adapt to the new basic concept of U.S. security policy if the alliance wishes to retain its political purpose and renew the credibility of its military deterrence. This sign of adaptation stands for counterarming and the restoration of the strategic nuclear balance between the superpowers. It spells the readiness, without ifs and buts, to eliminate the lead of Soviet armament, a lead which no one denies. Weinberger goes beyond Reagan's election campaign position which was phrased as a matter of principles: SALT II in the form negotiated to date cannot be ratified, the "too brittle" treaty can no longer form the basis of the U.S. negotiating strategy for the limitation of arms on both sides. The credibility of one's own position toward arms control, a position which is to be redefined, presupposes "swift and drastic" counterarming. Reagan does not want to negotiate under conditions of an imbalance which would have been formalized through a ratification of SALT II. He wants to create impetuses facilitating negotiations on formalizing a verifiable balance of strategic armament. A position of weakness, that is to say a sort of political priority for disarmament and arms control, is being ruled out. This presupposes particularly the improvement of U.S. military preparedness in the crisis zones.

This policy and the spirit in which it will be formulated will test political wills in Europe. The core of the policy is in accord with the December 1979 decision on the Euronuclear closing of the arms gap. It does not contradict the balance established by the NATO decision involving armament with missiles and negotiations on control and limitation of strategic arms in Europe. But it clearly collides, at least at present, with political advisability or the political-ideological confessions to which some of the governments and government parties have subordinated themselves. There is an enormous difference between the security concept of Caspar Weinberger and the counterarmament fears of the Dutch and the Belgians, or the dogged attempts of certain German Social Democrats to argue in favor of exempting the Federal Republic from its duty concerning the decision to close the arms gap. The increasing volume of the choir of critics in the chancellor's party may possibly take the new American security policy directives as a reason for announcing a "new situation," as Karsten Voight termed it, if the SALT II agreement is not ratified. And Helmut Schmidt, who was one of those who invented the decision to close the arms gap, does not give the impression, or does not give it any more, that he is a man who has the strength to prevent his party from definitely abandoning this unloved child. So Genscher is important for the government because he called to order the sympathizers of unilateral disarmament in Stuttgart. Also important is the opposition and most of all German public opinion, if the dialogue with America is not to become the nightmare of the Atlanic alliance. The credibility if a new and powerful American leadership position cannot feed only on the priority of security and the defense budget. But if the presidency of Ronald Reagan will do justice to this highest and toughest office, this impulse also must have an effect on Europe. The tone that was heard in the Senate committee was at any rate not an uncertain trumpet.

ECONOMIC RESEARCH INSTITUTE ISSUES 1981 FORECAST

DW081222 Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 8 Jan 81 p 3

[Article entitled: "DIW: The Key to Recovery Lies in the Financial and Monetary Policies"]

[Text] Berlin, 7 Jan--In view of the further decline in overall economic developments in the FRG, Berlin's German Institute for Economic Research (DIW) is once again advocating a steady financial and monetary policy. This is because the economy of the Federal Republic is currently in a phase in which the economic policy goals set by the law on stability are increasingly being missed.

In its annual forecast for 1981, the DIW expects a decrease of about 1 percent in the real gross national product with a further, serious increase in unemployment to a level of 1.2 million. Besides, the anticipated price increase, more than 4 percent on average over the year, is not in keeping with stability even though it is quite moderate compared with international levels. Beyond that, there will be less leeway in economic policy, where it will be narrowed down by state deficits, as well as in the overall trade balance, which will be high compared with former phases of recession.

According to DIW President Prof Hans-Juergen Krupp, the actual decision and responsibility for the further economic development will rest with the finance and monetary policy. As early as in the all-institute diagnosis of the fall of 1980, it was made clear that a change of course in monetary policy is necessary. At the same time, warnings were voiced against acrobatics in finance policy. But since the advice was not followed, the consequences now have ensued.

If in 1981 finance policy continues to follow the plans that have been used up to now, it will impede rather than promote economic development, the Berlin explorers of the economic cycle warns. This is true despite the tax relief which took effect on 1 January and despite increases going to private households. These measures are more than balanced again by increases in indirect taxes, the increases in social services withholdings and through rigorous cuts in expenditures.

The rigorous course of consolidation directed by finance policy this year, which shows the increase in the growth of expenditures being limited to about 4 percent, will not leave any leeway for public investments. Since the increase in state revenues of 2.5 percent to DM386 billion will clearly be smaller than last year, it is necessary to anticipate for 1981 a reduction in the state requirements for investments. The DIW expects a nominal decrease of 4 percent, and computed in in constant prices this amounts to nearly 9 percent. On the whole, state consumption in 1981 will increase nominally--5 percent plus, after a rate of 9.5 percent in 1980.

Despite these consolidation efforts, however, the DIW believes the ceiling on renewed borrowing, set by the Federal Government in the current draft budget at DM27.5 billion, cannot be met. Renewed borrowing will increase by more than DM10 billion and reach a level of about DM67 billion (1980: DM56 billion), if alone because of the tax revenue losses and losses of revenues attributable to cyclic conditions.

According to the DIW forecast, construction investments in 1981 will experience a considerable drop of 5 percent, the rate of increase in construction prices decreasing to 5.5 percent as against the 10 percent 1980 annual average.

The production volume in all fields of industry--not including the foodstuffs and luxury foodstuffs industries--in 1981 likewise will be clearly smaller than last year. Along with this development, production potential will increase about 2.5 percent, whereas the degree of utilization of this production potential will drop by more than 3 percentage points. The DIW estimates the private consumption increase to be about 1 percent (1980: 1.5 percent), with clearly lower wage agreements of about 5 percent and a price increase rate of about 4 percent.

Despite this prospect for economic development, which is not particularly favorable, the DIW harbors the "modest" hope that things will gradually improve as the year's end draws nearer. What matters now is to render unnecessary a short-lived economic stimulation program. Credible austerity measures should be adopted now and then implemented in 1982-83. The DIW thinks a consolidation at this time is wrong.

FOREIGN MINISTRY COMMUNIQUE ON CHAD-LIBYA MERGER

[Text] Paris, 8 Jan (AFP)--France today condemned this week's merger agreement between Libya and Chad, a former French colony. The agreement, signed in Tripoli by Chadian President Goukouni Queddei and Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi, ignored the rights of the Chadian people, a communique from the Foreign Ministry said here.

France could not accept validity of the agreement without it having first been put to the Chadian Government, the communique added.

The Foreign Ministry said that Mr Goukouni's transitional government of national unity had been given the job of holding general elections before January 1982. The transitional government had no right to prejudice the future options of any government elected in those elections, the communique added.

France will stand beside the Chadian people when it is a question of their rights, and it will stand beside Africa when it is a question of its (Africa's) security, the communique said.

Francois-Poncet Comments

[Text] It was with a 48-hour delay but in particularly strong terms that France condemned the agreement between the Libyan head of state al-Qadhdhafi and Chadian President Goukouni. The agreement involves the merger of the two countries into one sole and single country. In a communique published at midafternoon, the Quai d'Orsay considers that the Tripoli agreement disregards the rights of the Chadian people and displays ambitions which represent a threat to Africa's security. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs reiterates that France led Chad to independence and always has observed its sovereignty. The last phrase of the communique is somewhat cryptic. The Quai d'Orsay states that France will be at the side of the Chadian people in order to defend its rights, and on the side of Africa to defend its security.

French Foreign Affairs Minister Jean Francois-Poncet, the author of this text, just arrived in Africa, in the Ivory Coast where he was met by President Houphouet-Boigny. This visit was planned for a long time but, of course, comes at the right moment in view of the present situation. Interviewed by Ralph Pinto, our special correspondent in Abiduan, Francois-Poncet reiterated France's stand regarding what one should call al-Qadhdhafi's master stroke:

[Begin recording] I merely want to say that France always, as recently shown again in Chad, has observed the sovereignty and independence of African states. France will continue to be at the side of its African friends in order to help them when necessary to defend their stability and security. Development and security are the two aspects of French policy toward Africa and represent the basis of French-Ivory Coast cooperation which fortunately is what brings me today to this country. [end recording]

MINISTER DISCUSSES FRENCH-LIBYAN OIL AGREEMENT

[Text] The agreement concluded between ELF-Aquitaine and Libya for the exploitations of oilfields continues to be topical. The minister of industry reportedly intends to ask the ELF board of management meeting on 14 January not to implement this agreement and not to include Libya in the 1981 prospecting budget of the French company.

Andre Giraud actually was presenting his New Year's good wishes to the press in the afternoon. He called for the lucid approach, intelligence and efforts of the French. At the same time, he made it clear that within the general field of energy, oil will represent only a small part of France's supplies for the current year.

POLL SHOWS 'NEGATIVE' SCORE FOR GISCARD D'ESTAING

[Text] Paris, 9 Jan (AFP)--With little more than three months to go to the first round of voting in the French presidential election, fewer than half French voters are confident that President Valery Giscard d'Estaing can solve the country's problems.

A poll from Sofres to be published in FIGARO magazine tomorrow showed 49 percent of those questioned did not have confidence in Mr Giscard d'Estaing, while 47 percent supported him. It was the first time the monthly poll had given the French leader, who has still to announce his candidature for a second seven-year term, a negative score.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing's Prime Minister Raymond Barre scored at 62 percent disapproval vote, two percent worse than last month.

Socialist leader Francois Mitterrand, who is expected to face the incumbent president in the run-off vote, saw his score rise three points to 35 percent. But Michel Rocard, the charismatic Socialist who withdrew his candidature when Mr Mitterrand said he would stand, headed the list of opposition figures with a one percent rise to 50 percent.

Communist leader Georges Marchais saw his support fall two points to 18 percent.

Inside the ruling coalition, Jacques Chirac, the Gaullist mayor of Paris who has still to announce he will run against the president, rated 33 percent, while his fellow Gaullist Michel Debre, Charles de Gaulle's first prime minister, who has declared his candidature, rated 29 percent.

POPE DISCUSSES UPCOMING VISIT WITH JAPANESE ENVOY

OW090209 Tokyo KYODO in English 0152 GMT 9 Jan 81

[Text] Rome Jan 8 KYODO--Pope John Paul II said Thursday he had decided to visit Hiroshima and Nagasaki during his forth-coming tour of Japan to pray for the victims of the 1945 atomic bomb explosions in the two cities.

He is scheduled to visit Japan from February 23-27 on the last leg of his Asian tour which will also take him to the Philippines and Guam.

The Polish pope, in a meeting with Masami Ota, newly appointed Japanese ambassador to the Vatican City, said he will pray so that such a nuclear disaster will never happen again.

The envoy had an audience with John Paul at his office in the Holy See to present his credentials.

The pontiff told Ota he had long wanted to visit Japan and that he is happy to make the visit which his predecessors also had planned but failed to carry out.

Ota said the pope described Japan as an economic power bestowed with hardworking people although it is without major natural resources.

The leader of the Roman Catholic Church also said Japanese Catholics have a unique tradition of their own, surviving constant persecution by the Tokugawa Shogunate from the 17th through the mid-19th century.

John Paul said during the 30-minute meeting he is impressed with such a tradition, which he said is remarkable in the 2,000-year history of the Roman Catholic Church.

The government and the people alike, the pontiff went on, are open-minded toward about 400,000 Catholics and treat them equally in the predominantly Buddhist country with a population of 117 million.

The pope also said he is happy to have numerous Japanese visitors at the Vatican, including many non-Catholics.

The 60-year-old pope, who is now taking a crash course to learn Japanese, called the language the most difficult he has ever studied, the envoy said.

John Paul is a fluent speaker of at least six languages--Polish, Italian, French, German, English and Spanish--and has working knowledge of several other tongues.

He plans to say mass in Japanese during his coming stay in Japan, Vatican officials said.

L'UNITA: PCI'S PAJETTA ADDRESSES WORKERS IN CUBA

[Giorgio Oldrini report on PCI Directorate member Gian Carlo Pajetta undated speech at corn processing plant as a delegate to the Communist Party of Cuba [PCC] Congress in Havana: "Cuba, Point of Intersection and Unity Among Different Forces"]

[Text] Havana--Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta has conveyed the PCI's greetings to the Second PCC Congress, speaking together with the Japanese and Congolese delegations at a corn processing plant built largely by a Cremona firm in the popular quarter of Regla, behind the port of Havana. "Addressing you workers," Pajetta said, "irrespective of what speeches and approved documents you have followed and read day to day, I would like to show you what this congress has meant to a partisan fighter, an old member of the workers movement who believes in the strength of unity, in the importance of the alliance of the democratic and liberation movements and in international solidarity.

"The first things that strikes you, the stronger and more homogeneous it becomes, is the unity of a communist party that emerged from the fusion of movements of differing origins and ideological frameworks--a party such as the Cuban Communist Party, which now identifies with Maj Fidel Castro, with his comrades of that time and with the comrades who subsequently shared a new experience with him and together found an organizational, ideological and political unity. Because of the very way in which it was formed, yours seems like the party of unity and identifies with a man who is an example and symbol of how to be an enthusiastic patriot, jealous of his independence and bound to his country's traditions and at the same time an internationalist, with the explicit awareness that there is no kind of conflict between these two aspects."

"Thus," Pajetta added, "an Italian can understand how the fact that the names of Marx and Lenin recur every time with that of Jose Marti is no rhetorical expedient but the realization that Marx and Lenin taught everyone to rediscover their own country's reality in its history. So for an internationalist, for someone who believes in the strength of unity and in the hope of its expansion and consolidation, albeit within the diversity of ideological stances and historical origins, it is very important that the party which has found this unity is bringing together--perhaps more than ever before at a communist congress--so many different forces which until recently were far apart and which even conflicted on several issues.

"The Cuban Communists are communists who certainly do not conceal their identity," Pajetta continued, "or even their party patriotism. They know, however, that they must not isolate themselves, that they can be and indeed are an element of attraction even for socialists such as the Spanish and the French, for Social Democrats such as the Swedes, Danes and British Laborites, for liberation movements all over the world and for the most varied parties in many Latin American countries. We could not fail to be struck by the fact that parties and groups which find themselves polemicizing or even conflicting in Venezuela and Mexico have found a point of contact in Havana, at this congress. There is a sign of the recognition of this party's internationalism and also of its authenticity and originality.

"This party and this kind of socialism were reached via a 'Cuban road' and not by importing any scheme or model. Lenin taught us that the path of revolution is not straight and flat like the Nevskiy Prospekt; socialism was reached here via the 'Cuban road' across the Sierra Maestra.

"Fidel Castro was not using a rhetorical image when he once spoke about Havana as the capital of unity, within respect for diversity and within the great variety of currents."

Profound Ties With the Masses

"Havana hosted the youth festival for which dozens and dozens of organizations from all countries converged here. It hosted the nonaligned summit at which Fidel Castro himself, having asserted his stances as a communist, acknowledged the need to rally together in unity again and to reject all attempts to align or to subordinate the nonaligned.

"The secret of the Cuban Communists' resistance and success and of the fascination which they exert," Pajetta added, "is to be sought in their profound ties with the masses, which a group of guerrilla fighters managed to establish with the mountain peasants, which a party has been determined to develop with its people, within the present situation, by reviving in people's minds the history, sacrifices and heroism even of the distant past.

"This is why we feel close to a party acquainted with even harsh criticism and with self-criticism and which knows that you must know reality before you can change it and that it cannot be disguised or changed with words alone. Our party too, the PCI, is the party of unity, the party of the resistance, of socialists and communists working together in the municipalities and regions, of the cooperatives and trade unions--the vanguard of those who hasten to help quake victims or encourage workers struggling outside Fiat factory gates, who denounce scandals and demand that terrorism be isolated and who have the ambition to excel and never to be alone.

"Within the spectrum of tensions now covering the world, the Polish issue is of great importance. It is," Pajetta stressed, "The example of a turmoil which must be understood, of problems--indeed, of a crisis--which demands the boldness of regeneration, of solutions that must be the result of experience, dialogue and the acknowledgement of errors that must be corrected by those who made them or tolerated them. The Polish comrade who spoke at this congress asked us to trust in the Polish United Workers Party, in a party which recognizes the need to say where it has gone wrong, to try together with its people and with the forces which issued a legitimate protest the new paths for a necessary regeneration which will reject any nostalgia and the dangerous illusion that the recourse to force can be of any use. He spoke to us with the modesty and commitment of the representative of communists who want to have faith in themselves and in their people, the representative of a country which knows how tough the path of freedom and independence is but which also knows how valuable and inalienable these qualities are and how they cannot be requested in the form of aid which disguises intervention or which justifies interference.

"This is our opinion. In Poland a regeneration is both necessary and possible. It is up to the Poles, with the solidarity and cooperation of people who do not confuse these terms with imposition or even pressure and blackmail, to resolve their situation with prudence, hard work and patient courage. It is up to everyone else," Pajetta concluded, "to prevent a process, which could be long and even turbulent, from being interrupted, remembering that to believe in the possibility of reversing it or even merely obstructing its course could constitute an unjustifiable error and cause very serious damage."

CATALAN SOCIALIST PARTY ELECTS PRO-SOVIET LEADERS

[Text] Pere Ardiaca and Francisco Frutos have been appointed president and secretary general respectively of the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] at a meeting held in Barcelona this morning by the Catalan Communists' new Central Committee. Elected at the party's fifth congress which has just ended, the new PSUC leaders belong to the pro-Soviet or hardline of the party. The president, Pere Ardiaca, was one of the founders of the party and Francisco Frutos is a leader of the Workers' Commissions.

PCE LEADER CARRILLO COMMENTS ON PSUC AGREEMENTS

[Text] The fifth congress of the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC], the Catalan Communists, has been a veritable political earthquake, about which everyone is expressing an opinion. Santiago Carrillo, secretary general of the PCE, whose flagship of Eurocommunism has been directly affected, had remained silent. That silence, however, was broken today in the Madrid daily EL PAIS, with an article of some five pages [as heard] in which the Communist leader says, textually, things such as:

There's no getting away from the fact that the agreements of the fifth congress of the PSUC signify a profound isolation from the positions of principle and general policy approved by the PCE and that the joint resolution approved in October by a PCE delegation and the Executive Committee of the PSUC is now clearly broken. Furthermore, the break affects the very statutes of the two parties. The PSUC, which had the reputation of being the most Eurocommunist party in Spain, and perhaps for this reason obtained such a high percentage of votes, has made a 180-degree turn. It is true that we are at a critical point for Eurocommunist policy, but does anybody think that the communist parties which are not "Euros" are in any better position? The abandonment of Eurocommunist policy will place us in a position more difficult for defending the workers, for unlocking democracy and for advancing toward socialism.

The agreements reached by the fifth congress of the PSUC are, objectively, therefore, a serious blow to the credibility and the prestige of the PSUC and the PCE, which are being exploited and will be thoroughly exploited by all our opponents.

We are, Carrillo says in his last paragraph, fully in solidarity with those who defend Eurocommunist policy and, in collaboration with our Catalan comrades, we are going to do everything possible so that the PSUC will continue to be a Eurocommunist party and so that the PCE will respond to the working class and the peoples of Spain with the strategy to which it committed itself many years ago and which I summarize not only with the words socialism and liberty, but also with another decisive word, that of independence.

RADICAL LIBERALS WANT BROADER SECURITY POLICY

["CB" Report: "Radical Liberals Want 'Wide-Reaching' Defense Plan"]

[Excerpt] The Radical Liberals, who are still officially taking part in negotiations for a new defense plan, no longer think that a separate defense bill is in keeping with the times. At the Radical Liberal New Year meeting in Nyborg during the weekend Radical Liberal defense spokesman Jens Bilgrav Nielsen said that it is possible to envisage instead more wide-reaching security policy legislation, which would include the defense forces alongside other elements.

Bilgrav Nielsen said that there is no need to "rattle sabres" now that the Soviet Union has been weakened after its intervention in Afghanistan and has been forced to ensure that a peaceful movement has taken place in Poland. He considered that the preservation of sovereignty and surveillance activities must be put before the ability to wage war.

The Folketing Defense Committee chairman, Conservative Palle Simonsen, stresssed that Western strength is a prerequisite for the preservation of peace, and he said that Danish defense plans for the eighties must not be inferior to the plan in existence today.

NORWAY

POSSIBLE NORTH SEA OIL PRICE RISE TO $41

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA report: "North Sea Oil Up To $40-41"]

[Text] According to reports to NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA, Norway will probably increase its North Sea oil prices shortly to $40 or $41 per barrel. The increase will probably be made with effect from the new year.

British Oil and Energy Minister David Howell announced in Abu Dhabi on Tuesday [6 January] that Great Britain will follow the world market price for its North Sea oil, and that the country will increase its price for North Sea oil to $40 or $41 as a result of price rises in the OPEC countries. Up to now Norway has followed more or less the same practice and pegged its prices according to those of the OPEC nations. According to NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA's information Statoil in Stavanger has been discussing raising oil prices with effect from the new year.

DENKTAS REPLIES TO GREEK CYPRIOT ALLEGATIONS

[Text] President Rauf Denktas said that it was out of the question for any Turkish Cypriot to be displaced as a result of the agreement providing for the provisional settlement of Maras [Varosha]. President Denktas was replying to questions by correspondents today in the wake of the intercommunal talks held yesterday. In answer to a question by a journalist on this subject Denktas said: Such a possibility does not exist. Everyone will remain in his place in Maras and will not be disturbed. Everyone should feel master of his land and should work hard at it. To another question on allegations that the Greek Cypriot side did not agree with the supervision clause concerning the entrance and exit checkpoint in Maras, Denktas said: Let us not deal with details. We have offered our conditions. These are sensible proposals which are compatible with our legal stand and the realities. It is for the other side to agree or disagree with them.

When the point was raised that if an agreement is reached which airport would tourists to Maras use, Denktas said: According to the provisional status agreement, Maras will remain a part of the TFSC and Turkish Cypriot laws will apply. Therefore, it is natural that foreign tourists to Maras should come through the Ercan state airport [Tymbou] or the Magosa [Famagusta] port.

When a correspondent recalled that the Greek Cypriots agreed to the opening of the Lefkosa [Nicosia] international airport only under the UN auspices, Denktas replied: Our own proposals in connection with the use of airports in Cyprus were already submitted to the United Nations a few years ago. We see no connection between the issue of the use of airports and the Maras agreement. Our desire is for the use of the Nicosia airport to be based on equality and partnership.

On the possibility of the closing down the Ercan state airport--which the Greek Cypriots insisted was illegal--in the event of the opening of the Lefkosa international airport under UN auspices, Denktas answered that these allegations were imaginary and unfounded. He added: The Ercan airport is as legal as the Larnaca airport. It is in a position to supply much better service. There is no connection between the opening of the Lefkosa international airport and the use of the Ercan airport. The latter is the airport of the Turkish Cypriot community in north Cyprus, and it will continue to serve as such.

In reply to a question on travel documents to be carried by Turkish Cypriots in the event of the opening of the Lefkosa international airport, Denktas said: It is only natural that until a particular agreement on this subject is signed in accordance with our equal status, the Turkish Cypriots will use our travel documents and seals. When recalled that Greek Cypriots objected by claiming that certain communist countries refused to recognize Turkish Cypriot travel documents, Denktas said: It does not matter. In time they will get used to it.

Referring to Greek Cypriot allegations that a solution to the operation of the Magosa port should also be found, Denktas said: The Magosa port is already functioning perfectly. We have not requested any assistance from the Greek Cypriot side. The Magosa port is not a subject open to discussion in the intercommunal talks. Magosa is a port of the TFSC and will remain so. The problem is the functioning of ports both in the northern and southern parts of Cyprus, within a framework of cooperation and mutual assistance. No one should question our rights on Magosa.

In reply to Greek Cypriot claims that discussions were being held on establishing an independent authority or body in a bid to deal with the functioning of the Lefkosa international airport and the Magosa port, Denktas said: No such discussions are being held. The Magosa port is part of the TFSC, it is functioning properly and will continue to do so. The Lefkosa international airport can be opened to traffic under equal rights to the two communities.

RALLIS, PAPANDREOU MEET, EXCHANGE STATEMENTS

AT071852 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 7 Jan 81 pp 1,12

[Excerpts] The PASOK chairman's entire effort to create an artificial exacerbation in the political atmosphere and to politically exploit his meeting with Prime Minister Y. Rallis finally ended in a real fiasco.

After his meeting with the PASOK chairman, Prime Minister Rallis made the following statement: I explained to A. Papandreou that the reports which had made him uneasy --regarding the alleged downgrading of our defense--were inaccurate. I added that the country's armed forces are guaranteeing our defense in an absolutely satisfactory manner. Papandreou agreed with me that further discussion of the subject would be detrimental.

On the issue of elections, I reiterated the viewpoint which I have had the opportunity to express publicly in the past: That elections should be held as close as possible to the end of the deadline specified by the constitution. In addition, I told the PASOK chairman that currently there is no disharmony between the Chamber and popular feeling.

I discussed with Papandreou the issue of incompatibility in serving as both a Eurodeputy and a national deputy, and we agreed in principle.

I told A. Papandreou that it is not right to describe radio and television as one sided since during the relay of the Chamber discussions more time was allotted for the projection of the opposition's views than for government views. I noted that, more specifically, the official opposition is being publicized systematically as can be proved by the recent presentations of A. Papandreou's trips to Britain and Hungary and also by the reviews of political events that are made every Sunday. I ended by stressing that the government does not agree that television should be transformed from an information and recreation media into an arena for party recriminations and disputes. Party disputes can and should be conducted in the press.

Immediately after leaving Rallis' office, PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou made the following statement to political editors: "The first and most basic issue which led me to today's meeting with Prime Minister Y. Rallis was that of national defense. On the basis of reports I had received, I was seriously concerned about the country's level of defense--about whether or not it had been downgraded. The Prime Minister assured me that there has not been any downgrading but he requested me not to go into details and I accepted that.

"The second big issue was the democratic operation of the mass media. I stressed the party character of television and radio and asked for their democratization. The mass media constitute a state monopoly and, unfortunately, a party monopoly too. I made it clear that PASOK will continue its struggle to rid them of party leanings.

"The third big issue was elections. We truly believe that elections are necessary for the country because very important issues will appear in the near future, for example, the U.S. bases. We believe that the current Parliament has completely ceased representing the public will and, during the discussion of the agreement on return to NATO, we stressed that the Chamber is not in a position to commit the people and their will in view of the huge decline which New Democracy has suffered among the public and in view of the fact that the 1977 elections were held with Karamanlis as leader of New Democracy whereas, at present, the leadership of the government and the ruling party have changed. (In reply to a question, Papandreou revealed that Prime Minister Rallis had insisted that, for reasons of constitutional order, the life of the current Parliament should be maintained to the end of the 4-year term.)

PRIME MINISTER ON DOMESTIC, FOREIGN POLICIES

[Interview granted by Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu to Robert Little in Ankara--date not given]

[Excerpts] Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu has told ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in an exclusive interview that Turkey will be represented at the Islamic summit conference to be held in holy Mecca on 24 January. The Turkish prime minister said in this regard: "Yes, I will attend the summit conference. The Turkish delegation will be headed either by Gen Kenan Evren, the head of state and chairman of the National Security Council, or by me personally. We will play our role in it in full."

As soon as we sat down, almost before I finished thanking him, he began explaining with total frankness the policies of his government and his absolute determination to implement them. He said: As a person who studied a lot and wrote a lot about Turkish politics for many years, you must know that the authority of the state was seriously damaged during the days that preceded 12 September. Also, the state, with almost all its constitutional bodies and organizations, lost its effectiveness, since the democratic regime had actually abandoned its position in conditions of total chaos and terror. During that time most of the state institutions and bodies were to a large extent in a state of paralysis.

Continuing, the Turkish prime minister said: This challenge to the security and future of democracy in our country was in my opinion due to two principal elements: First, there is the red terror and there is the black terror. I can tell you that the Turkish Government and people will not tolerate either kind of terror, and we will do our utmost to wipe them out. Above all else we have known for many years how the communists, with the help of Russia, have tried and succeeded sometimes in using the democratic trade unions and our free institutions in order to stir up labor unrest in an attempt to destroy the country's economy. Also, everybody knows that those people themselves had a hand in the acts of violence and terror in recent years, but we have begun to bring this under control.

With regard to what he described as "black terror," he said: The narrowminded, like Ayatollah Khomeyni and the Muslim Brotherhood, have no place in the modern Turkish state. They have violated the secularism which is one of the steps introduced by Ataturk and one of the basic principles on which our republic is based. During the growing chaos, attempts were made to restore the religious regime to the country. As I said, although Turkey is a Muslim state, its constitution allows the practice of other religions.

I then asked the Turkish prime minister if he had any specific information regarding the results his government has achieved in its campaign against terror. After the director general for press information gave him the necessary information, he said: As I told you, the principal objective in our government's program is to secure people's lives and property and the rule of law and order in the country.

As for the figures I am going to give you, they are based on statistical comparisons relating to the 80 days between 24 June and 11 September and the subsequent 80 days from 12 September to 30 November.

These figures show that the number of armed attacks and clashes dropped from 1,609 before the September coup to 305 attacks and clashes during the subsequent period. Also, the number of bombing incidents dropped from 704 to 238 for the same periods. With regard to the total number of deaths, this dropped from 680 in the 20 provincies that were under military rule to 132 in all of Turkey's 67 provinces.

During the period under comparison, the number of handguns seized increased from 1,823 to 6,871. The figures, as I was told, do not include the 132,550 pistols, the 2,474 automatic pistols, the 25,144 rifles, the 5,087 kg of explosives or the 18,647 detonators handed in voluntarily to the authorities under the law on "seizure of unlicensed arms," which provides for punishing those who carry guns or explosives without a license. This law has affected most male inhabitants of Trabzon Province on the Black Sea, where almost every man carries his own gun as a sign of manhood.

Ulusu affirmed that this type of statistical information is clear evidence of the new administration's success in "its campaign against chaos, terror, and illicit trading in arms and explosives." He added: We are quite determined to eliminate the centers of terror so as to ensure peaceful coexistence between citizens of different political views and to achieve the progress of the democratic system in an organized and sound manner.

I asked the prime minister about his government's future policy in the external field, particularly toward Turkey's Arab and Muslim neighbors, and Turkey's continued role in NATO. He replied: In our relations with the Arab countries we seek to strengthen our historical, cultural and moral ties and to establish fruitful cooperation in all the fields in order to serve our common interests. The progress of our relations with these countries and the results achieved through our cooperation in the recent years are a great source of satisfaction to us.

We still believe that the Middle East problem, which has been outstanding for a long time, can be solved justly, comprehensively, peacefully and lastingly through the participation of all the parties concerned in negotiations. Israel must withdraw to the pre-1967 borders. The final settlement must include the recognition of the Palestinian people's legitimate and legal rights, including their right to establish an independent state. In light of these considerations, no obstacles will remain to the establishment of normal relations with Israel if it refrains from jeopardizing the region's peace and abandons actions and practices that are harmful to the interests and moral values of the area's countries, and if it also implements the UN resolutions concerning the Middle East problem.

Ulusu added: What about our relations with Western Europe and the NATO alliance? As we have affirmed before, the Turkish Government attaches great importance to its membership in the European Council and its cooperation with it. It is our natural right to expect our friends, particularly the politicians, and the European Council member states to appreciate Turkey's position in a realistic manner in the light of the geographical characteristics of the area in which it is located and of the incidents it has experienced in the recent years. Politicians and diplomats of the European Council must take into consideration the fact that every time they have assumed power in contemporary history, the Turkish Armed Forces have done so in order to support rights and human freedoms and in order to deepen the roots of true democracy in a successful manner.

Prime Minister Ulusu concluded: There is no doubt that the NATO alliance is of great importance in maintaining the balance of security which is an indispensable element in world peace. Turkey is cooperating closely with its NATO allies.

GENSCHER RESTATES CONCERN ABOUT MISSILES DECISION

[Excerpts] Bonn, 9 Jan (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Genscher has again expressed his "profound concern" that a continuing German discussion on NATO's twin decision of December 1979, providing for the installation of 572 medium-range missiles in West Europe while at the same time declaring readiness to enter into disarmament talks, might endanger Western cohesion and induce Moscow to arrive at mistaken conclusions.

"Nothing could be more dangerous than the USSR arriving at false assessments about the firmness of the Western alliance at this stage," Genscher said in a talk with journalists in Bonn last night.

Genscher referred to the CPSU Congress due to be held in February and the definition of Moscow's future policy which it is expected to formulate. The "absolute sincerity" of both portions of the NATO decision must be made clear to the Soviet leadership, Genscher said. If German politicians publicly move away from the NATO decision or call for its revision, this also will have a detrimental effect on the opinion-forming process among the smaller allies. Above all, no doubts about Bonn's firmness must be allowed to arise in Washington.

Genscher said the United States and the USSR began talks last year on the inclusion of medium-range missiles in the SALT framework and have concluded the first round. The proposed date for the installation of the Western medium-range missiles (1983-84) left sufficient time for negotiations. It should be the aim of these talks that the USSR make a start on dismantling and destroying the superior number of its missiles aimed at West Europe so that the number of medium-range missiles to be stationed in the West to establish a balance can be kept as low as possible.

The foreign minister stressed that although France is not militarily integrated into NATO, it too is determined to contribute its efforts to military equilibrium. In this context, Genscher called for the conclusion at long last of a treaty establishing a genuine political union of the countries of the European Community with a view to making their foreign and security policies identical. They are, at present, merely coordinated.

PAPER DISCUSSES SPD VIS-A-VIS NATO DECISION

[Commentary signed W.H. E.: "Genscher's Alert"]

[Text] The federal chancellor deserved his vacation after the strain of the election campaign battle and his low point at the start of the new legislative session. But can he any longer politically afford the pause? One must ask oneself this question now that his vice chancellor, the federal foreign minister, has appealed in cabinet to defend publicly NATO's decision to counterarm. Genscher obviously fears there might be conflicts with the new American Government if the Federal Republic were to give the impression of hesitating and temporizing in defense policy matters vis-a-vis the Soviet Union.

This impression already has been made at least by some parts of the SPD. The fact that the SPD at its 1979 Berlin congress did not produce anything better than a compromise formula now is backfiring. The party congress agreed to counterarming with missiles in Europe under the premise that priority must be given to negotiations on arms control. Ratification of SALT II by the United States was considered the underlying foundation, but nothing will come of the present SALT II Treaty. Some parts of the SPD, therefore, are questioning the NATO decision.

GROWING RESISTANCE TO NATO'S 'COUNTERARMING' SEEN

[Article by Christian Potyka: "Attack on the Missile Arsenal"]

[Text] Munich, 8 Jan--A new antinuclear movement is growing in the Federal Republic. It is directed against NATO's so-called counterarming decision, against the deployment of about 200 U.S. medium-range weapons with nuclear warheads--missiles of the Pershing II type and cruise missiles--on German soil. For the first time since the 50's debates on setting up the Bundeswehr and arming it with nuclear weapons, Bonn's military plans are meeting with serious resistance among the people as well as among a qualified minority of experts. Some experts seek to mobilize the public with dramatic appeals: "The Federal Republic is threatened by a mortal danger. It can be averted if the people resist it," the latest utterances of that nature say.

These "remarks concerning a strategy for the prevention of the deployment of new medium-range weapons" were written in Starnberg near Munich under the dateline "Christmas 1980." The author is Alfred Mechtersheimer, strategy analyst and former air force officer who made a name for himself as a critic of the Tornado combat plane and thus cut short his Bundeswehr career. The learned officer is now a member of the working group for "alternative defense," a branch and successor of the formerly renowned Max Planck Institute set up by the nuclear physicist and philosopher Carl Friedrich von Weizsaecker in Starnberg. In Mechtersheimer's view,the planned U.S. medium-range weapons on German territory make "the outbreak of war more probable in a crisis and increase the danger of nuclear annihilation." Preventing them from being deployed means serving peace in Europe and the security of the Federal Republic.

To justify his rebellious position, the scientist lists four arguments. First, the planned "Eurostrategic" weapons are primarily instruments of the new U.S. nuclear strategy in which the emphasis shifts from deterence to the capability to wage war. Second, NATO's arms decision of 12 December 1979 contributed considerably to the worsening of the international situation. Third, the SS-20 Soviet missile referred to in justification of the so-called counterarmament has been "greatly overrated" in the West. In all probability, the missile can carry only one warhead and not three, as is generally claimed. Fourth, NATO's security concept consisting of deterrence and detente has begun to waver because the Reagan administration "interprets" detente "at best as a task of secondary importance."

The Starnberg analyst speaks of a veritable "outside determination" of German policy by the United States. He would like to mobilize the public in support of the Bonn government which fears the "displeasure of the U.S. administration" much more than a "protest by a marginal group" from among its own people. The patent medcine of Mechtersheimer is that "massive public criticism and collective civil protest against counterarming alone will enhance the Federal Government's room for maneuver vis-a-vis the United States." What he regards as the "moving force" of the protest movement is the people's will for peace, which largely is ignored by the "party system." Such a "popular movement from the grass-roots" also will alleviate the delimitation against the communists. As far as CSU member Mechtersheimer is concerned, and he has been active in his party's working circle for defense policy for years, the temporal "target point" is the SPD congress in March 1982.

In his party, one of the "numerous starting points" for protest seen by Mechtersheimer has developed much within a short period of time. At a press conference in Bielefeld on 9 December 1980, the SPD initiative "Courage for a Better Future" became public. As starting capital, they presented the signatures of 150 Social Democrats on a disarmament appeal to the Federal Executive Board. The Bundestag faction and the chancellor--the signatories including former Berlin Mayor Albertz, Schleswig-Holstein's Land Chairman Jensen as well as Bundestag Deputies Coppik, Hansen, Hoffmann, Meinike, Simonis and Thuesing.

In the meantime, about 5,000 Social Democrats and "sympathizers" such as college teacher Walter Jens or satirical comedian Dieter Hildebrandt have added their signatures. And they did so even though nationally distributed newspapers ignored the Bielefeld debut (only local newspapers reported it), and even though the initiative at first lacked adequate funds to mimeograph its appeal. In any event, one of the chief organizers of the initiative, Peter Pahmeyer, the eastern Westphalia-Lippe district chairman of the Young Socialists, says in light of the impression of growing interest: "This is only the beginning."

The second pillar of the venture is Dieter Begemann, member of the Herford City Council and chairman of the SPD village organization. This is intended to document that the initiative is not exclusively a Juso [Young Socialists] affair. The appeal seeks to gain broad support for instance by linking the increasing defense expenditures with the general economic situation and by associating themselves with statements by top SPD politicians. "We have taken the general disarmament appeals by Brandt and Bahr quite seriously," Pahmeyer says. But one cannot always be satisfied with mere words, one must become specific once in a while as well. "In so doing, we concentrated on the medium-range missiles." What they aim to do is prevent the counterarming decision from creating "faits accomplis." The SPD should "find its way back to the original intentions of the detente policy of 10 years ago." They interpret as a "token of turnaround" the resistance against the counterarming decision and thus more and more end up at variance with the federal government, as illustrated by developments after the Wednesday cabinet meeting.

Pahmeyer thinks he can see resistance forming on another three levels: among ecclesiastical groups such as the Berlin "peace conference," in the sphere of the branch trade unions and, finally, in the so-called Krefeld forum. Pahmeyer is particularly happy about this latter group because followers of the extreme left thus have a platform of their own and because it makes delimitation toward the left easier. In the campaign against counterarming the Krefeld initiative is considered a sort of extraparliamentary collective movement; this, at least, is the way SPD quarters look at it.

After all, the Krefeld forumhas shown the greatest increase in following to date. It claims that so far roughly 20,000 people have signed the appeal to the Federal Government to rescind the fatally erroneous decision concerning the deployment of the U.S. medium-range missiles. "This is a new beginning," the propelling force of the forum, says Josef Weber. Being a former member of the Wehrmacht's General Staff and member of the German Peace Union, the retired colonel arrives at the conclusion in a comparison with the rearmament debate of the fifties that the engagement of his fellow fighters today is even greater. It is no longer necessary to run after the people; they call by telephone on their own. "Quite definitely" his forum is not infiltrated by communists, he says.

The attractive figures of the forum include Prof Gerhard Kade, Pastor Martin Niemoeller, Petra Kelly from the ecology movement, Dutch European Parliament Deputy Wim Albers (The Netherlands is also affected by the NATO decision) As well as retired Dutch General Meyenfeldt and former Bundeswehr Divisional Commander Gert Bastian who was put on compulsory retirement last year because of his objections to the counterarming decision. Bastian, too, considers the resistance of the protesters to be more serious than during the fifties; the people refuse to be simply put off by the government; they feel cheated, especially in the SPD. "It will not work that easily."

The lack of the Federal Republic's readiness to provide information and to engage in discussion is meeting with massive criticism. Professor of Jurisprudence Helmut Ridder on behalf of the forum refers to the bases of the counterarming decision as "heterodoxy" and to the decision proper as a "trick." The stronger counterarming becomes, the more reserved the Federal Government is becoming with regard to information about the practical implementation of counterarming. A halfhearted documentation released by the Defense Ministry last year has been rejected by Hamburg peace researcher Dieter S. Lutz as belated, inadequate and contradictory.

So far it has been a private citizen who provided public information most explicitly as to what counterarming specifically means. Hubertus Hoffmann, Bundestag assistant of CDU defense expert Peter Wuerzbach, with his book "Nuclear War--Nuclear Peace" (Bernhard and Graefe Publishing House, Munich) take the side of NATO and of the Federal Government. Hoffmann thinks the new weapons are necessary to compensate for the Soviet SS-20 missiles and the backfire bombers. The discussion in the Federal Republic to date does not even correspond to "medium requirements for forming an objective, broad opinion and will in our democracy." It is not the research on peace alone which has "grossly flopped so far" in this respect.

In Great Britain, which under the NATO decision must station 160 cruise missiles (but no Pershing II missiles), people as early as in the middle of last year ventured an open, offensive information policy--up to the question as to what would happen if a cruise missile crashes on their own territory. The Federal Government is reluctant to follow London's example. In particular they do not want to make known the deployment points of the cruise missiles. (The Pershing II will merely replace the Pershing I in the U.S. Army Corps.) Bonn quarters argue that the release of such information would appear to be an anti-American act. Hence, all they are saying is that preparations for counterarming are "continuing" as planned. Still, the Defense Ministry denied a report by the newspaper DIE WELT which said that bureaucratic delays have occurred in the organization of the infrastructure.

The construction of roads and reinforced shelters cannot be hidden. The Federal Republic will be assigned at least 96 of the total 464 NATO cruise missles. Since 16 missiles each are concentrated in a company, this would amount to six companies. Mechtersheimer expects one additional company, meaning a total of 112 cruise missiles. In any event, this would require the assignment of more than 1,000 U.S. soldiers for the operation and maintenance of the weapons. Four missiles each are contained in a "can" 8 meters long mounted on a 32-ton truck. The vehicles are between 15 and 17 meters long. They contain an operations box just behind the driver's cabin. The so-called launching control center and the telecommunications facilities--the use of nuclear weapons is subject to the approval by the U.S. President--are accommodated on escort vehicles. Four launcher vehicles make up a company. Together with the escort vehicles they will be accommodated in "reinforced" bunkers, presumably on German air bases of the U.S. Air Force.

When an alert is sounded the vehicles scatter to firing positions reconnoitered and surveyed in advance. According to Mechtersheimer, these positions may be located in a periphery of 160 km.

It is these regions on which the attention of the counterarming opponents is concentrated. Some of the locations are known to experts. They are keeping silent out of loyalty to the Federal Government. Yet it is only a matter of time until the first names of positions will be mentioned which, presumably, are located in Rhineland-Palatinate and perhaps also in the north and south of the republic. Following the collection and presentation of signatures, "spectacular actions" in the next 3 years seem to be "inevitable" to Mechtersheimer. He warns that violence against persons and property is "incompatible with actions aimed at peace." Legal actions, however, remain a "question of democratic imagination," he says.

COMMENTARY ON NEW U.S. GOVERNMENT DEFENSE POLICY

[Commentary signed EIN: "Filling The Gap"]

[Text] The incoming U.S. Government will resume the SALT negotiations. But Caspar Weinberger, slated by Reagan for secretary of defense, said that one must talk to the other nuclear giant from a position of strength.

The new Pentagon chief promised in his first interview that the United States will make all efforts to reestablish the balance of forces: "We will fill the gap." Weinberger stressed, however, that it does not mean just spending money, catching up with the help of dollars alone. Weinberger, who is very much for economizing, wants to first "weed" the Pentagon. He also sees poor planning in the Defense Department as well as corruption and mistaken efforts. The core of his defense policy will be the following: making America strong in all strategic zones. It means that NATO will lose the special position it held under Carter. The striking power of strategic arms systems and the stabilization of the Gulf region will have the same strategic value as the Atlantic alliance for America in the next 4 years. Europe will have to do more for its defense.

DPA VIEWS PROSPECT OF ARMS SALES TO SAUDI ARABIA

[Excerpts] Bonn, 9 Jan (DPA)--Saudi Arabia's chances of securing Bonn Government permission to purchase German Leopard II tanks are improving. It became known in Bonn today that Federal Foreign Minister Genscher shares the view that Saudi Arabia should not be regarded as an "area of tension" within the meaning of the regulations precluding the delivery of German military hardware to such areas. A similar view was expressed by SPD Deputy Chairman Wischnewski on Wednesday.

According to reports from Bonn, Genscher wants a possible official request from Saudi Arabia to Bonn to be examined "factually and without prejudice." Such an examination should also consider the effect of arms deliveries on FRG-Israeli relations. So far, Chancellor Schmidt has given no promise to Saudi Arabia.

Genscher, Bonn sources say, may also see Saudi Arabia's increased military strength as an element in stabilizing the Gulf region, which possesses vital oil wealth for the West. Arms deliveries could be regarded as a contribution within the framework of an overall Western concept to a response to a Soviet advance in this part of the world. Nonetheless, the foreign minister regards Bonn's restrictions on arms exports as fundamentally correct and stands by his refusal to justify an expansion of German arms deliveries as a means to provide jobs.

RUHRGAS REPORTS REDUCTION IN USSR GAS SUPPLIES

[Excerpt] Essen, 9 Jan (DPA)--The Soviet Union is to cut by about one-third its natural gas supplies during the winter months "because of technical difficulties." Ruhrgas was informed of this by the USSR, a Ruhrgas spokesman confirmed on Friday.

Ruhrgas emphasized to VWD [DPA's Economic News Service] that in the past there had been similar cuts in Soviet natural gas supplies for technical reasons. They were due to problems faced by the USSR in expanding its transport system and had "no apparent political background."

FOREIGN MINISTER GENSCHER TO VISIT EGYPT 16-17 FEB

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 10 Jan (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher will visit Cairo on 16 and 17 February for political talks with Egyptian President Anwar as-Sadat and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali. The Egyptian Foreign Ministry announced on Saturday that Genscher's visit is at the invitation of the speaker of the Egyptian People's Assembly. Genscher intends to link his trip to Egypt with political talks in other Middle East countries.

MILITARY CAPABILITY STRENGTHENED IN AFRICA

[Excerpt] France considers the situation in Africa as serious in the wake of the union between Chad and Libya.

After a meeting at the highest level yesterday at the Elysee, France decided to strengthen its military capability with men and aircraft in the Central African Republic, to strengthen the French forces at the request of those African countries linked to France by defense and cooperation agreements.

French soldiers already are stationed in a number of African countries. There are in fact some 4,000 French military personnel stationed in central and west Africa at the present time, of which 1,400 are in central Africa and the others are spread over Gabon, Ivory Coast and Senegal. France has signed defense agreements with 18 African countries and tomorrow French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet will chair a meeting in Abidjan of 21 ambassadors representing France in Africa. Needless to say, Chad will be at the center of the discussions. Chad also has been the subject of today's talks between Jean Francois-Poncet and President Houphouet-Boigny of the Ivory Coast.

[Text] Regarding French reinforcements for Africa: following Libya's invasion of Chad, 200 men of the 3d Marine Regiment, stationed at Vannes, left by air early this morning bound for Bangui, the capital of the Central African Republic. Two other companies are expected to emplane for Bangui tomorrow.

Further Report

[Text] In the wake of Libya's annexation of Chad, the strengthening of France's military capability in Africa is getting underway. Men of the 1st and 9th Marine Regiments already have arrived in Bangui. The Air General Staff is in a state of readiness to despatch additional Jaguar fighter-bombers if required. Four of these planes already are stationed in Libreville, along with a refuelling plane. The firepower of a squadron of 12 Jaguars is phenomenal. It can be compared to the fire power of 3 regiments of artillery firing for 15 minutes nonstop.

Meanwhile, Libya has described France's behavior as unacceptable and is threatening economic reprisals. It has condemned the communique released by the Quai d'Orsay. For Tripoli, the attitude taken by France confirms the hegemonic policy pursued by the Paris government and its determination to extend its influence on the African continent.

More Troops Depart

[Summary] More French military reinforcements have left Nantes airport on a DC-8 for Bangui. They are the equivalent in number of a company of the 9th Division of Marine Light Infnatry.

FRANCOIS-PONCET ON LIBYAN ECONOMIC REPRISAL THREAT

[Text] In a statement made in Abidjan before departing for Angola, Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet said that Africa had witnessed earlier destabilization attempts initiated by Cuba and that it is now seeing new destabilization efforts undertaken by Libya. France is paying very close attention to the situation, he said.

Regarding Tripoli's threat of economic reprisals against France, Jean Francois-Poncet said that France purchases only a little over a million tons of oil per year from Libya.

LE MONDE DISCUSSES CREDIBILITY OF 'MILITARY UMBRELLA'

[Jacques Isnard article: "The Credibility of France's Military 'Umbrella' Is Called Into Question"]

[Text] Will African states, disturbed by Libya's "annexation" of Chad, ask France for a review of the agreements on defense or military assistance which they concluded bilaterally with France some 15 years ago?

That is the question currently being asked in French military circles where it is believed that the blow struck by Tripoli against the principle of the inviolability of the borders inherited from colonization in black Africa, in a country like Chad, where the French Army fought for a long time to maintain territorial unity, also is indirectly perceived as an attack on the credibility of France's military "umbrella" in relation to all the states which once claimed the guarantee of that security.

The most pessimistic military observers in Paris go so far as to fear a trend, created by the Chad-Libya merger, toward the denunciation or at least renegotiation of defense agreements with France, at the prompting of certain African states--such as Sudan, Egypt or even Nigeria--which, drawing their strength from their links with the United States, could make their partners on the dark continent realize how much greater America's credibility would be in the face of Colonel al-Qadhdhafi's expansionist impulses than that of France, particularly if the new Reagan administration seems to them to have more "muscle" and resolve.

If that were the case, it would mean the failure of the African policy whereby France, by virtue of its presence, its investments and its intervention strength, sought to play the part of a third guarantor in addition to the two superpowers.

But other military specialists in Paris believe that the Chad-Libya merger has, paradoxically, a positive aspect for France: that of revealing or reviving a certain sense of solidarity. In the African countries allied with Paris, as regards their continent's security, culminating in the formation, as already proposed by Mr Giscard d'Estaing, of a real pact modeled on the Euro-African cooperation already commenced--with considerable difficulties--in the economic sphere.

This prospect is only meaningful if, on the one hand, European countries which already have African traditions and relationships support it, and, on the other hand, French military deployment is organized in accordance with these ambitions.

As for this last aspect, the least one can say is that the French overseas action force lacks new, well-adapted facilities, as officers repeatedly have pointed out to a government whose vigilance has relaxed since the success of the Kolwezi operation in May 1978. A solution exists--namely, that of reinforcing, at the request of the states concerned, the French garrisons deployed there so as to dissuade local or minor acts of aggression.

But this quest, in Africa, for the maximum quantity of military "facilities" or "strongpoints," besides the fact that it is reminiscent of the colonial period, risks turning French units into so many hostages held by force, "trapped" in each country's internal conflicts.

LE MONDE REPORTS ON FRENCH-LIBYAN OIL DEAL

[Text] Tripoli's General People's Committee has just authorized the Libyan State Oil Company [NOC] to grant the ELF-Aquitaine National Company [SNEA] five oil-prospecting and production permits (with a share of the production).

Three of them are permits returned by other companies and are land permits in the Gulf of Sirte, the people's republic's most prolific oil-producing region. The fourth is situated in the al-Hammadah region on the Tunisian border. The fifth permit--for sea prospecting--is an area in which ELF-Aquitaine already had rights.

Libya recently signed six similar contracts with Anglo-Saxon companies. The financial clauses of these contracts are secret. SNEA says that Albin Chalandon visited Tripoli at the end of November--in the middle of the Chadian crisis--"with the backing of the authorities" to negotiate this contract. For more than 6 months, the directors of French enterprises operating in Libya had been noting that Tripoli was well disposed toward Paris.

Therefore, some people have seen in French passivity toward Libya during the latest phase of the Chadian conflict proof of a tacit oil-related agreement between the two capitals. Colonel al-Qadhdhafi himself lent weight to that idea since he recently spoke to LE MONDE's special envoy of a "gentleman's agreement" with Paris on Chad and since the Libyan regime's number two, Major Jallud, stated that Tripoli was prepared to sign a long-term supply agreement with the French companies.

It is true that, with the conflict between Iraq and Iran, France has been able to assess the fragility of its position since 60 percent of its oil still comes through the Gulf. It is also true that Libya, the world's seventh biggest oil exporter, only supplies 2 percent of the nation's oil.

The agreement which ELF-Aquitaine has just signed with the NOC, although not unusual, proves that, despite Chad, Franco-Libyan relations are far from bad.

Minister's Communique

[Bruno Dethomas report: "Cherchez Le Petrole"]

[Text] "'Cherchez le petrole' [look for the oil] has become the key to international tragedies and comedies just as 'cherchez la femme' is the key to human tragedies and comedies," a deputy said during the debate on the 1928 law [not further identified]. Because it has been "looking for oil" in France's passive attitude during the latest sudden developments in the Chad conflict, the press has prompted a reaction from the industry minister which borders on the ludicrous.

In a communique, Mr Giraud states: "The French Government was not consulted on the appropriateness of concluding an oil agreement between the ELF-Aquitaine Company and the Libyan Government and hence did not give its approval." The industry minister is "asking the petroleum exploration and activities enterprises to examine this affair carried out by the ELF-Aquitaine National Company [SNEA], on its own responsibility, at the company's next board meeting."

The communique clearly is playing on words. First because the negotiations of drilling rights, which is the daily bread of oil companies, is their mission and hence they alone are responsible for it.

"The companies sometimes discuss such matters with the administration," admitt a senior official. However, he added: "When a company feels there might be problems, in Algeria, China or the USSR for instance, it consults the administration and keeps it informed." Hence, the subtleness of the statement: "The government was not consulted on the appropriateness."

In addition, these negotiations with Libya--where ELF-Aquitaine already has been operating for many years--are not new. The application for a permit was made on 26 December 1979 and an agreement in principle was signed in January 1980. The reports on SNEA's activities, which the minister reponsible for the company has to read, already had mentioned that.

Finally, the definite signing of the agreement allocating this 15,000 square km area to the French group--amid similar contracts with various Anglo-Saxon companies--took place on 4 December and was to be announced at the board meeting on 14 January (the previous meeting took place on 12 November).

What Tripoli officially announced on 7 January was the go-ahead which the General People's Committee gave to the Libyan State Oil Company to sign the contract.

Moreover, can the Elysee claim that it knew nothing about Mr Chalandon's trip to Libya on 20 November? The SNEA chairman stated in an interview published by Paris MATCH on 26 December: "The general rule which we apply is to pursue our overseas activities--we are operating in 43 countries--without worrying about the political relations between those countries and ours. When we establish ourselves in a country we do so for 20 or 30 years. We need stability. Therefore, we have to avoid the ups and downs of politics." However, Mr Chanaldon added that, in important cases, the authorities are consulted.

Aside from the government's dubious method of whitewashing itself in the Chadian affair, this communique revives the quarrel between Andre Giraud and Albin Chalandon. The Industry Ministry is trying to play down that interpretation and there are rumors that the communique was a joint effort by the Industry and Foreign Affairs Ministries with the consent of Elysee Secretary General Jacques Wahl.

However, the enmity between Mr Giraud and the SNEA chairman is too strong for the former not to have seen the opportunity to rub salt in the wound, especially since Mr Chalandon also prides himself on having ideas on energy, which is intolerable. Did he not recently say in Paris MATCH with reference to gas: "Big contracts--the one with the USSR will represent 30 percent of our annual consumption--put us at the mercy of political pressures. If it were impossible to avoid that we would not mind. However, as far as gas is concerned, the North Sea and Africa offer an alternative with their considerable gas potential. It is wise not to depend on one country or one region of the world." That statement came at a time when the government was preparing to give the French Gas Company the go-ahead to sign a new contract with the USSR in mid-January.

The first conflict between the two men--over the possibility of SNEA buying a U.S. company--resulted in a structural reform announced as a solution to all problems.

The present tension confirms that a structural reform never solves a human conflict. It ought to end with the non-implementation of the Libyan agreement and a request to ELF-Aquitaine not to spend a centime on prospecting and production in Libya. However, it is a sure bet that there will be more incidents.

COMMENTATOR CRITICIZES POLICY ON CHAD, LIBYA

[Jacques Amalric article: "A Double Game?"]

[Text] The Chad crisis continues but France's policy is certainly not improving. Whatever version you accept, Wednesday's events are painful for the government and especially for the head of state who is, in fact, alone responsible for our African policy.

For several weeks, France has been suspected of playing a double game in the Chadian affair, in other words of having the delicacy to turn a blind eye to the Libyan offensive which was eventually to rout Hissein Habre's forces in order to safeguard if not improve trade relations with Tripoli. Those suspicions were certainly not dispelled by the 13 December Elysee communique warning Libya--without naming it--against an intervention in Chad, just a few hours before Libyan weapons settled the problems.

The affair which is now being called the "Chalandon" affair certainly does not dispel the doubts people could have about the French authorities' sincerity. According to Mr Giraud, the government "was not consulted about the appropriateness" of the ELF-Aquitaine contract being signed and "hence did not give its approval." That may be so. However, if we are to be satisfied with an explanation in the form of a condemnation of Mr Chalandon, we must assume that the government knew nothing about the ELF chairman's trip to Libya on 19 and 20 November and the rumors which have been circulating in well-informed circles for the past 2 years and which relate precisely to the contract which Paris now is virtually denouncing.

That is asking a great deal. Although it is true that Mr Chalandon took care not to inform the Quai d'Orsay of his trip, it is equally true that the French ambassador in Libya complained to its [presumably Quai d'Orsay's] Central Administrative Department at this lack of coordination. Was his message not handed to the Elysee by Mr Francois-Poncet's department? That would be very surprising. Even more surprising are the statements which Mr Chalandon made to Paris MATCH in its 26 December issue: "When relations with a foreign country raise special problems as is the case with Libya, we obviously do not take any initiative without prior consultation with the competent state authorities." Here we have a man who is soon likely to have only a choice between the role of mendacious scoundrel and scapegoat....

However, it is an ill wind which blows nobody any good. Perhaps Mr Chalandon's "sacrifice" heralds the Elysee's return to commonsense not so much with regard to Chad as to Libya. Indeed, an oil crisis is not a good enough reason to accept virtually unconditionally what France has been accepting from Colonel al-Qadhdhafi for months, starting with the sacking of its embassy followed, a few weeks later, by the ignominous and discreet return of its ambassador to Tripoli.

Disregarding insults and shutting your eyes to interventions have never made good policy. Such an attitude, as Giscard d'Estaing may realize now, merely encourages new abuses, hence, France's urgent need to define quickly and clearly its stance with regard to both Libya and Chad. Wishing Colonel al-Qadhdhafi "much good" in his operation to annex Chad, as Paris now seems to be doing, is rather shortsighted. It pays scant regard to the lives of thousands of Chadians. That is known as a policy of calculated pessimism.

FRANCE, AUSTRALIA SIGN NUCLEAR TRANSFERS AGREEMENT

[Text] An agreement on nuclear transfers between France and Australia, the result of lengthy negotiations, was signed in Paris on Wednesday 7 January by Mr Rowland, Australian ambassador to France, and Mr de Leusse, secretary general of the French Foreign Ministry.

"This agreement," a Quai d'Orsay communique notes, "sets the condition which will apply to transfers of nuclear material equipment and technology between the two countries. It envisages as the most important thing that items thus transferred will be subject, in their countries of destination, to International Atomic Energy Agency guarantees and controls of peaceful utilization.

"The agreement allows each country," the communique goes on, "to undertake reprocessing of nuclear fuels based on uranium from the other country. That means in particular that France will be able to use plutonium produced from uranium of Australian origin in its nuclear power program."

This agreement is the culmination of very long negotiations, which were complicated by the position occupied by the Australian Government until recently as regards nonproliferation. In effect, Canberra was adhering to positions close to Washington's and was reluctant to accept clauses--like those eventually incorporated in the Franco-Australian agreement--giving the purchasers of Australian uranium complete freedom of utilization, particularly as regards reprocessing. On 27 November, the Australian Government officially announced a softening of its position. The Franco-Australian agreement should make it possible to break the deadlock at several sets of negotiations underway between French and Australian groups.

LE FIGARO VIEWS U.S. MILITARY POLICY DECISIONS

[Paul-Marie de la Gorce article: "United States-USSR--The Real Balance of Forces"]

[Text] The 40th U.S. president, Ronald Reagan, will take office on 20 January. And among the first decisions which he will take there undoubtedly will be decisions concerning American military policy. To assess their orientation and significance, it is necessary to take into account both the political atmosphere in which they will be made and the realities currently behind the polemics and propaganda. There is a gap between atmosphere and reality.

In the present atmosphere, some people are complaining vehemently about the backwardness, weaknesses and even inferiority of the American forces and, as a result, a rather hysterical atmosphere has developed which certainly affected last year's election campaign and undoubtedly will affect Reagan's coming decisions. But reality is naturally rather different.

There is an imbalance to the USSR's advantage as far as conventional forces are concerned. That imbalance has in fact always existed. It was even more marked in the late forties. It always will exist because, irrespective of any offensive or defensive intentions on the part of governments, it is consistent with two completely different strategic situations, since the United States is, as it were, an island surrounded by oceans, Canada and Mexico whereas the Soviet Union constantly has to watch over all its endless land borders.

The United States has more tactical nuclear arms in Europe than the USSR--7,000 compared with some 4,500--and its big Mediterranean and Pacific fleets also probably carry more such weapons than their Soviet equivalents. however, the situation differs with respect to so-called theater nuclear arms, that is, arms with a 3,000-4,500 km range which, if deployed in the USSR, could hit any place in Europe and, if deployed in Europe, could reach the heart of Russian territory.

The Americans acquired them first, with the F-111 equipped with nuclear arms and based in Britain, and their Mediterranean fleet naval air force planes. However, the Soviets since have acquired some exceptionally effective arms in the form of the 4,000-km range SS-20 missiles, each equipped with three Mirved nuclear warheads whose accuracy is such that, provided enough of them are used, they could destroy most of NATO's sophisticated forces and infrastructures with one or two strikes. The Soviets now have 150-200 such missiles, some 50-60 are being produced annually and the present plan provides for 360. In particular, it is to counterbalance this formidable force that the United States has decided to deploy 572 Pershing II and cruise missiles in Europe.

As for the nuclear strategic forces, the Americans have 1,054 ICBM launchers--656 carried on submarines and 338 on bombers. The equivalent Soviet figures are 1,398, 1,028 and 156. However, these figures conceal a complete different reality. What counts from operational viewpoint is the nuclear throw-weight. According to Paul Nitze, a specialist very close to the coming Reagan administration, in 1977 the United States had 9,786 nuclear devices and the USSR 11,112. The gap has narrowed since then and, according to the arrangements provided for in the SALT II accords, a balance should be achieved in 1982 with both sides having 10,914 devices. In 1985, the United States would have 12,504 devices and the USSR, 11,728.

So all in all, the United States has maintained a lead in many respects. And, in any case, if the balance of forces is examined dispassionately, it is seen that this balance is much closer to equivalence and more complex than various propaganda has suggested. The fact remains, however, that as a result both of the political atmosphere prevailing in the United States and the international situation, the United States certainly will increase its military effort.

This effort will first of all relate to strategic nuclear forces. In any event, Mr Reagan already has announced this. In order to assess it, it will be necessary to remember both the characteristics of the nuclear arms and the strategic consequences stemming from them. First of all, it must be remembered that any increase in their number will not change the nature of nuclear parity, which means that the two superpowers can destroy each other at any time. The figures mentioned above show that the United States now is enjoying considerable, even though temporary, superiority in this sphere. Whether this superiority is preserved will in no way affect the essence of the matter.

In practice, President Reagan will have to solve three problems with respect to strategic nuclear arms. The first concerns the Minuteman missiles buried in silos on American territory. A wide-ranging discussion on the subject has been taking place ever since it became known that they can be destroyed by a preemptive strike by Soviet SS-19 missiles. In fact, however, this would have no decisive strategic effect since 74 percent of the American strategic arsenal consists of air-to-surface and sea-based missiles.

Nonetheless, it is planned to ensure the invulnerability of the 1,000 Minutemen missiles deployed at present more effectively, for instance, by building several hundred additional silos which would make it possible to move about the missiles.

The decision to be taken with respect to the MX missiles is of greater importance. To avoid the disadvantages attached to silos and replace the Minuteman, which has become vulnerable, President Carter has decided to develop these mobile surface-to-surface ICBMs, each equipped with 300-350-kiloton nuclear warheads. But even though Mr Reagan has stated that he is in favor of developing the MX missiles, he has to solve two problems: that of the missiles' deployment--the country's southwestern states chosen for this purpose violently are opposed to the idea--and that of their cost, which has been estimated officially at $38.8 billion and unofficially at $79 billion.

And, finally, it is very probable that a new decision will be made with respect to the future of the air component of the American strategic forces. These are three possible solutions to this problem: either the plan for the B-1 bomber, of which there are four variations and which was abandoned by President Carter, could be taken up again with the proviso that its penetration capability would be improved; or the performance of the F-111 bomber, whose range is only 6,500 km could be improved; or a new aircraft based on the plan for an "invisible" aircraft called Stealth could be developed, which would in practice involve the development of the already formidable possibilities of ECM techniques.

As far as theater nuclear arms are concerned, everything indicates that Mr Reagan will not go back on the decision taken by NATO on 12 December 1979 on the deployment of 208 Pershing II and 464 cruise missiles in Europe, despite the fact that this decision already has given rise to serious technical, military and strategic discussions. However, it should indeed be realized that its aim is to prepare the ground for negotiations with the Soviet Union. Mr Reagan already has repudiated the SALT II accord and stated that any future accords should take into account the SS20 missiles and backfire bombers. This means that he wants to link SALT II talks with any future SALT III talks on theater arms.

However, the American military effort in the sphere of conventional forces may well prove the most important.

Like all its predecessors, the Republican administration will have to decide on priorities and everything indicates that, following in President Carter's footsteps, it will give precedence to foreign intervention capabilities. In fact, the present state of affairs is sure that the United States is unable to engage in any large-scale or rapid military action abroad. This clearly has become apparent as a result of the conclusions drawn from the "bright star" exercise held in Egypt in November 1980, in which 1,400 men from the 101st Airborne Division participated. To make the exercise as realistic as possible, not only these 1,400 men but all their material and all the equipment necessary for their survival were committed. The conclusion was reached that 21 days would be needed to deploy the 82d Airborne Division and a marine division--a total of 35,000 men--in the gulf region. This was all. President Reagan probably will infer from all this that supplementary funds should be made available to ensure that the European intervention force increases its manpower to 200,000 men, but in any case it will take several years to achieve this as well as logistical support similar to that which the United States recently has secured in Egypt, Somalia and the Sultanate of Oman. Be that as it may, it is along this path that President Reagan undoubtedly will direct the main American effort.

Consequently, the political significance of this effort has become clearer. The candidate Reagan repeatedly stated--and so incidentally did his rival--that the United States should regain its superiority in all strategic spheres: superiority, not equality or parity, as if to repudiate everything that tacitly was accepted in both the SALT I agreement negotiated by Mr Kissinger and in the SALT II agreement. In fact, the notion of "superiority" is more important from the political and psychological viewpoints than from the military viewpoint, as we have seen in connection with the features and consequences of any nuclear strike. However, it becomes quite meaningful once it is accepted that what is at stake is not a confrontation with the USSR--since avoidance or direct confrontation between the Soviet and American forces remains an unwritten but fundamental law of international relations--but rather restoration or preservation of American positions wherever they are challenged, wherever demarcation lines between spheres of influence have not been determined, or wherever they could be called in question, that is, practically anywhere in the world.

CGT OFFICIAL INTERVIEWED ON VISIT TO POLAND

[Text] A CGT delegation returned to Paris today after a visit to Poland. Pierre Gensous, a delegation member, in an interview said that there is much unjustified noise made about Poland.

[Begin recording] The workers, as well as the trade union leaders we questioned, all consider that Poland is a socialist state and will remain socialist, but, of course, with some improvements brought about so that it can be a truly democratic socialism. It appeared to us that the government is doing all it can to maintain the closest relations with the trade unions and that the government is taking the closest account of trade union opinions. There may be discussions, there may be tensions, there may be differences of opinion, but we think this is perfectly normal. We did not want, as some others did, to rush into Poland. We thought it normal that the Poles themselves should discuss all questions that concern them and it was not for us to make any gestures that might be interpreted as interference in their domestic affairs. We went to Poland at a time when it was right to do so, when we were aware that the Polish workers already made their choice, and it was then that we felt it necessary to establish relations with those organizations and to learn about the situation. BERLINGUER'S CLOSING STATEMENT TO PCI SESSION

[Text] Rome, 9 Jan (ANSA)--Italian Communist Party Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer has reconfirmed his party's proposal to "put an end to Christian Democrat domination of the government and the state," and recognized the need for "a turning-point in the party's efforts toward building a broader and continuous tie with the people".

Berlinguer made these statements in his closing statement to the PCI Central Committee session yesterday which was released today.

Berlinguer's statement did not offer many new elements after Giorgio Napolitano's opening address two days ago.

The secretary focused on political reaction to the PCI's proposal last month for a radical shift in government rule.

"The government parties were put on the defensive and were deprived of or set aside any alternative political or governing proposal. They were reduced to rallying around the current cabinet, taking a position which becomes increasingly less convincing to the people".

However, Berlinguer added, despite "these positive effects", the Communist proposal has not yet "fully carried out its full political effectiveness" since also the Communists have not done everything possible and necessary "so that the specific and profound sense of the proposal be understood and work [words indistinct] and even the party itself".

Echoing a phrase Napolitano used in his opening speech, Berlinguer called for "a turning-point in the party's efforts" to give back to the PCI "the capacity of continuous presence and initiative" in the nation's problems which are "an essential and unrelinquishable aspect of the 'new party', of a party which must be capable also in today's conditions to organize the life and collective actions of the people".

LD091754 [Editorial Report] Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese at 1220 GMT on 9 January broadcasts a 45-minute live relay from Lisbon's Ajuda Palace during which President Ramalho Eanes swears in the 18-member cabinet and 3 secretaries of state. The announcer notes that this is Portugal's 7th constitutional and 13th postrevolutionary government, and that it has been formed by Francisco Pinto Balsemao, the late Prime Minister Sa Carneiro's successor in the leadership of the Social Democratic Party [PSD], which in coalition with the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] and the Popular Monarchist Party, make up the ruling Democratic Alliance.

The announcer then names the members of the new government who are taking the oath of office, giving their party affiliations as well:

After the swearing-in ceremony, Prime Minister Francisco Pinto Balsemao delivers a 25-minute speech, during which he states that his government "accepts the political heritage of the late Prime Minister Francisco Sa Carneiro" and will continue the policies of the outgoing government.

Paying tribute to the late Sa Carneiro as prime minister and a leader, Pinto Balsemao says that whatever modest ability he now has was to a great extent acquired by "learning" from the late prime minister.

Pinto Balsemao states that the Portuguese people have elected the Democratic Alliance to rule for the next 4 years. Therefore, he says, the Democratic Alliance will pursue the task of development it began last January. The main policy of his government, Pinto Balsemao states, will be aimed at "releasing the civilian society" from the bonds of the state and at developing the country's economy.

Turning to Portugal's foreign policy, Pinto Balsemao says that "the (?clouds) formed [provocadeas] by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan are still dense." He pledges that his country will (?ensure) active participation in NATO.

Speaking of the economy, Pinto Balsemao says that the government's policy will be designed to check the rate of inflation and to reduce it to 16 percent.

As for the state-owned mass media, Pinto Balsemao says a system will be devised to make these organs the representatives of neither party nor government but of the people.

At 1253 GMT, President Ramalho Eanes delivers a 12-minute speech. He states: "The installation of the government is evidence of the vitality of our democracy, reinforced in the continuity of the country's institutions. The government's political legitimacy is neither in doubt nor in question."

Eanes asserts that the government has "favorable conditions on the political front" for beginning its work. He adds that with a "fundamental orientation" geared to "respect democratic rules, outside which the real interests of the Portuguese people cannot be defended, the government can rely on the institutional solidarity of the president of the republic."

The live relay ends at 1305 GMT.

PCP Criticizes Speech

[Text] In a communique released in connection with the swearing in of the seventh constitutional government, the Portuguese Communist Party says that with his statements at the installation ceremony yesterday, Pinto Balsemao destroyed the naive illusions which some sectors had been seeking to create about the personality of the new prime minister.

The communique goes on to say that behind a screen of euphemisms and pretentious formulations, Pinto Balsemao's speech in fact manifests his intention to pursue a policy of attacking the democratic regime. His announced crusade allegedly to release civilian society from the bondage and influence of the state, the communique concludes, is nothing but a cover for his real intention to despotically subject the country to the interests and objectives of big capital.

BRIEFS

NEW PARTY REGISTRATION--From today the Portuguese political scene has yet another legally registered political party, namely, the Portuguese Communist Party-Reconstructed [PCP-R] whose registration papers today were submitted to the Supreme Court. The PCP-R was founded in December 1975 at a congress which merged a number of political groupings claiming allegiance to the teachings of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin. The new political party has so far operated as a kind of wing of the Popular Democratic Union, to whose political campaigns it has given its active support. With the legal registration of the PCP-R, our country now has 22 political parties ranging from the extreme left, or revolutionary left, to the right, claiming to stand for national reconstruction. KIPRIANOU STATEMENT ON DEPARTURE FOR ATHENS

NC111218 Nicosia Domestic Service in English 1200 GMT 11 Jan 81

[Text] The president, Mr Kiprianou, flew to Athens this morning for talks with the Greek Government on the Cyprus problem. He was accompanied by the foreign minister, Mr Rolandhis, and the Greek Cypriot negotiator in the intercommunal talks, Mr Ioannidhis.

In a statement at Larnaca airport, President Kiprianou said he attached particular importance to the Athens discussions as they would be held at a very delicate phase of the Cyprus problem. He remarked: We are entering a rather crucial, I would say decisive, phase in the intercommunal talks which will determine further developments. He said, with the Greek Government, he would discuss general and specific matters that might be raised in future rounds of the intercommunal talks and make a general review of the latest developments.

President Kiprianou went on: Despite the good will that has always been shown and continues to be shown by the Greek Cypriot side in the talks in an effort to find an honorable solution, I must say that there has been no corresponding response from the Turkish side so far. Not only there has been no change in the Turkish attitude during the dialogue, but I would say that Mr Denktas' continuous provocative statements have been such that logically they would leave no room for optimism.

President Kiprianou stressed, however, that it was still too early to make a forecast about the outcome of the intercommunal talks. He said: Despite the Turkish provocations, the Greek Cypriot side will continue the dialogue with good will and in a constructive manner. Any failure of the talks will be entirely due to Turkish intransigence.

Mr Kiprianou said relations between Athens and Nicosia were excellent. He also believed that, following recent developments in the European area, Greece would be in a better position to lend even more support to Cyprus, and he was confident Greece would make use of this position.

KIPRIANOU VIEWS NEW ROUND OF INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

AT111640 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 11 Jan 81 p 7

[Interview with Cypriot President Spiros Kiprianou by correspondent Vasos Mathiopoulos, presumably in Nicosia--date not given]

[Text] [Question] For the first time since the first round of inter-Cypriot talks almost the entire political arena in Cyprus has the impression that there are now some indications of progress. Do you share this viewpoint and, if so, why?

[Answer] It is a fact that on the eve of the new round of inter-Cypriot talks the prevailing thought was that an atmosphere had been created that would guarantee progress. This atmosphere was due to the fact that various governments and other factors systematically gave the impression that the new Turkish Government wanted to solve the Cyprus problem and was prepared to confront the situation with greater moderation. However, since the start of the new round of talks, the almost daily statements of Denktas, which betray absolute intransigence, have tended to dissipate hopes for progress. Despite this I would not like to make certain predictions yet. The only thing I can say is that the outcome of the new round talks will determine further developments. In other words, with his daily provocative and intransigent statements Denktas is proving wrong all those people who expected an immediate change in the Turkish position, even on the Famagusta issue on which the UN secretary general had recently undertaken a special initiative.

[Question] Do you believe that because of its international isolation and economic and financial sufferings and because of its experience over the last 6 years which has proved its inability to maintain the strange legal status that the Turkish troops imposed on it, the Turkish Cypriot community is beginning to see the significance of a democratic, peaceful and just solution? Specifically, are you convinced that, if left free to express their will, the Turkish Cypriots would want to coexist with the Greek Cypriots as, after all, they had done for centuries?

[Answer] I have absolutely do doubt that most Turkish Cypriots want to coexist with the Greek Cypriots as they had done for centuries. This can be guaranteed through a just solution of the Cyprus problem, a federal solution that will guarantee the unity of the state and the unity of the people. It is also a fact that under their status of occupation the Turkish Cypriots are suffering, and I have the impression that Denktas' effort to create partitionist situations does not agree with the great majority of Turkish Cypriots. Toward this direction it is our duty to prove beyond any doubts to the Turkish Cypriots that their true freedom and the fulfillment of their best interests lie within the unity of the state through a federal system, not through separation--this is something which I absolutely believe in.

[Answer] I do not think one can speak of minimum acceptance on the part of the Cyprus Government regarding the solving of the constitutional and territorial issues. Our positions are still those which the unforgettable Ethnarch Makarios submitted in 1977 on both issues, the final formulation of which will depend on the current negotiations provided, of course, there are margins for progress.

In any case, we have not departed from the proposals of 1977. What also particularly interests us regarding the internal aspects of the Cyprus problem are the inalienable rights of the citizens including the right of the refugees to return to their former homes. Of course, the constitutional and territorial aspects are of huge significance and in both cases the solutions must correspond to the realities of Cyprus, not to faits accomplis.

[Question] Will you seek what you have mentioned in the past within the framework of a final solution: that a future united Cypriot state should be demilitarized and non-aligned in its foreign policy? I would like to define the term demilitarized: Does it mean withdrawal without exception of all non-Cypriot military who are now on Cyprus territory, north and south; dissolution of the British bases and abandonment of military defeat [as published] with only the existence of a Cypriot police force comprised of both Greek and Turkish Cypriots?

[Answer] Within the framework of a final solution we shall most certainly seek a demilitarized Cyprus that will be able to freely follow a nonaligned policy without intervention. When we speak of demilitarization we mean all troops without exception that are on the soil of the Republic of Cyprus except for a Cyprus police force which would be under the surveillance of an international police force for some period of time. Regarding the British bases, this is a bilateral issue between Britain and Cyprus and does not fall within the current Cyprus problem. Certainly in the future we will aim for Cyprus' complete demilitarization so that it may become a bridge of peace in the area and a place of happiness and tranquillity for its inhabitants.

In No Alliance

[Question] Mr President, according to your policy position nonalignment means that the Republic of Cyprus would stay outside the big blocs; that is, if a proposal is made for Cyprus' integration into NATO--an indirect proposal, of course--the proposal will not be discussed? On this issue I would like to ask you whether Greece's recent return to the NATO military wing has had positive or negative repercussions on the Cyprus problem, especially on its diplomatic maneuvers?

[Answer] When we speak of a nonaligned foreign policy we me an Cyprus would stay outside the military blocs. We do not mean neutrality; we mean a policy which will be based on the principles of the UN charter and the declarations of the nonaligned on international problems. I believe that this policy which the unforgettable Ethnarch Makarios adopted from the beginning of the republic is the correct policy for Cyprus from every viewpoint, both because this policy is right for reasons of principle and because it serves Cyprus' best interests. The issue of Cyprus' accession to NATO has not been raised and if it is raised I believe that Cyprus should not join any military bloc. Furthermore, both the NATO countries and the countries of the Warsaw Pact as well as those of the nonaligned world have clearly taken a position supporting Cyprus' maintenance of a nonaligned policy.

Regarding Greece's return to the NATO military wing, I would not like to comment on this because this is an internal Greek issue.

[Question] If the deadlock which until last September characterized developments in the Cyprus problem, principally because of Turkish Cypriot intransigence, continues, do you believe that seeds of danger will be sown here in this sensitive area so close to the current volcano of the Near and Middle East?

[Answer] As long as the Cyprus problem remains unsolved it will be permanent seedbed of danger in this sensitive area of the Mediterranean. For this reason it is in everybody's interest to solve the Cyprus problem as soon as possible. However, in order to discover a solution to the Cyprus problem that will be viable and permanent a radical change in Turkish policy is needed. Many people are in a hurry to solve the Cyprus problem but very few people are truly interested in a correct solution that will not become the seedbed of a new conflagration and dispute. The Cyprus people, more than anybody else, are interested in a quick solution to the Cyprus problem. However, we are primarily interested in the essence, something that should interest everybody. Any partitionist solution will not solve the problem. On the contrary, it will lead Hellenism to new adventures and will cause new friction in this area which is near the volcano of the Near and Middle East.

Cyprus Has The First Word

[Question] Cooperation between the Cypriot and Greek Governments has been very friendly during your term. During your upcoming visit to Athens what do you expect from your talks with the Greek Government and the Greek opposition? Do you consider the economic and diplomatic support of the Greek state to Cyprus satisfactory?

[Answer] Cooperation between the governments of Greece and Cyprus is really very close and constructive, and personal relationships among the responsible people are characterized by true friendship. I believe that my visit to Athens for talks with the Greek Government will be useful from all aspects given the fact that the Cyprus problem by general admission is entering a critical phase: it needs internal unity on the one hand and the close cooperation of Athens and Nicosia on the other. We maintain very friendly relations with the Greek opposition which also views the Cyprus problem as a national issue. Greece supports Cyprus in many ways, especially with regard to economic and diplomatic support to the Cyprus state. This issue is included among those which we shall discuss in view of the recent accession of Greece to the EC as a full member. I look forward to the talks I will have in Athens with true interest and I am convinced that they will produce results in every respect.

[Question] Does the statement "The Cyprus Government should decide on the content of the solution of the Cyprus problem and Greece should help it as soon as the solution has been formulated," which the current president of the Greek Republic declared during the time of Ethnarch Makarios, continue to be valid?

[Answer] The statement that the Cyprus Government decides and Greece supports continues to be valid even now. Many things have been said and written about this subject but this position is very correct given the fact that Cyprus acts as an independent state and should have the first word. Of course this does not mean that Greece should remain a passive observer of developments, and this is not happening. If there are margins for greater involvement by Greece, this is a subject that the Greek Government will be the first to judge and possibly a subject that will be a point of discussion during my upcoming visit to Athens.

[Answer] I was absolutely satisfied with my meeting with Willy Brandt in which I got the impression that the great German politician is interested in finding a democratic solution to the Cyprus problem. I believe that everything he said to me will be acted upon. From what I understood from Prime Minister Mrs Thatcher, Great Britain is limiting itself to the expression of wishes although she made some suggestions concerning her interest in a quick solution to the Cyprus problem. Always within the framework of the United Nations, Europe can play a much larger role by exercising its influence on Turkey because I want to reiterate that there can be no progress in the dialogue if Turkey's position in Ankara is not radically changed.

[Question] When will parliamentary elections be held in Cyprus? After the elections in Cyprus will you exercise the privilege granted to you by the Constitution to form a political government, either ecumenical or comprised of certain political parties? Or should such a solution be ruled out? From your experience so far you believe that a government of personalities outside parties and technocrats is more in line with Cyprus conditions?

[Answer] It is not yet known when parliamentary elections will be held but in any case it will be before September. Regarding the formation of a new government after the elections, this will depend on many factors although experience to date convinces us that a government by personalities and technocrats is more in line with Cyprus' conditions. Generally I would say that I do not consider the possibility of a reshuffle before the expiration of my term as president of the republic unless this is objectively judged as indispensable.

[Question] After the recent ministerial-level conference on the further development of Cyprus' association with the EC how are Nicosia's relations with the EC developing? Specifically, how are you dealing with the tightening of relations between Cyprus and West Germany? Do you foresee a visit to Bonn?

[Answer] I want to hope that the conditions Cyprus will guarantee for the second phase of its association with the EC will be much better than the previous ones and, toward that direction, we are striving to do everything possible. I believe that West Germany can play a serious role in this direction. In addition to this, we view closer Cypriot-West German relations with good will. I have planned a visit to Bonn in the near future but the date has not yet been fixed.

KIPRIANOU RECEIVES NEW BULGARIAN AMBASSADOR

[Text] President Kiprianou again declared that we will never legalize the results of the invasion because the acceptance of these results would mark the beginning of the end of Cyprus as an independent state. President Kiprianou, who was speaking during today's ceremony where the new Bulgarian ambassador, Mr Bocho Bochev, presented his credentials, added that we seek a serious dialogue with the goal to overthrow the faits accomplis and to find a solution that would serve the interests of all the people of Cyprus.

In his address, Mr Kiprianou also said that we have accepted as a solution the biregional federation, and he voiced the certainty that such a solution could secure the necessary unity of the state and the people, a thing that would make possible the survival of the state and the happiness of all the people irrespective of religion or extraction.

The president stressed that the dialogue does not deinternationalize the Cyprus problem and added that the problem can be resolved with the implementation of the UN resolutions that provide for the restoration of the people's rights, including the right of refugees to return to their homes.

Finally, President Kiprianou thanked the president and people of Bulgaria for Bulgaria's consistent support in the struggle of Cyprus.

Presenting his credentials, the new Bulgarian ambassador reiterated his country's support for the Cypriot people's legal aspiration for a peaceful and fair Cyprus settlement without outside intervention. He also reiterated his country's support of the Soviet proposal for a representative international conference on Cyprus within the UN framework.

Present at the credentials ceremony were Foreign Minister Rolandhis, Under Secretary to the President Stavrou, Director of the President's Office Vovidhis and Protocol Director Loizou.

GOVERNMENT DECLINES COMMENT ON DENKTAS STATEMENT

NC100738 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 10 Jan 81 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] Official sources yesterday declined comment on the Turkish Cypriot proposals about Varosha though they did not hide their surprise and displeasure at the harshness of the terms and the way the Turkish Cypriot leader Mr Denktas sought to accentuate them.

It is understood that the government has already drawn the attention of the UN secretariat to the statements of the Turkish Cypriot leader and that Cypriot legations abroad will do the same in the capitals where they are accredited.

O AGON DENOUNCES DENKTAS' VAROSHA PROPOSALS

["My Opinion" column by the Observer: "The Turkish 'Proposals'--A Mockery and a Provocation"]

[Excerpts] Denktas' grotesque and preposterous "proposals" regarding Famagusta have painfully shattered all hopes and dealt a coup de grace to the process of the intercommunal dialogue. These "proposals" are a mockery and an insufferable provocation, and every reasonable person wonders whether there is any sense in negotiating with the arrogant and presumptuous opponent who uses the negotiating table not for discussions but to dictate terms.

It has been reported in the press that acceptance of the Turkish "proposals" on Varosha would create 12,000 new enclaved persons. But things are not so: They are abysmally worse. Denktas wants the 12,000 Greek Cypriots to be enclaved serfs for 5 years, and after sapping the fruits of their labor and sacrifice for 5 years, to eventually turn them into refugees for a second time.

The Turkish proposals rule out "enforced displacement", but they do not rule out "voluntary displacement," the one they invented for the unfortunate people of the Karpas Peninsula. And so the people of Varosha will be "voluntarily" displaced for a second time.

To "give" what they are "giving," the Turks also want things in return: They say they want us to lift the "political and economic embargo" so that we can turn 12,000 people first into enclaved serfs and later into refugees for a second time!

In other words, Denktas hopes to eventually gain double and for us to be ruined twice. Maybe this is what the Turkish philosophy of "give and take" is all about!

The Turks must be forced to submit new proposals; otherwise the dialogue cannot proceed. These must be new proposals that are improved and reasonable, both as regards the area of Famagusta that they will hand back and the principles that will govern resettlement. In particular, the philosophy that permeates the proposals must be radically changed. Waldheim and Turkey's friends have the floor--if they are interested, of course, in continuing the talks....

GOVERNMENT PROTESTS U.S. DECISION ON AID RATIO

[Text] The Greek Government has learned of the U.S. intention not to maintain in the future the 7:10 ratio on aid that the United States gives to our country and Turkey within the framework of seeking balance in the Aegean. For this reason, the Greek Government has lodged a strong protest with the U.S. Government. Specifically, Deputy Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry St Rousos reiterated to U.S. Ambassador McCloskey, who was called to the ministry, the well-known Greek position on maintaining by all means the balance in the Aegean, and he asked him to convey our country's protest to his government. The fact that this U.S. intention was manifested while Greek-U.S. negotiations on the future of U.S. bases in our country are going on is especially noteworthy. Diplomatic observers have interpreted this as a U.S. maneuver to exert pressure on the Greek side, given its objections to the content of the U.S. plan for the bases.

MITSOTAKIS, TURKISH AMBASSADOR EXAMINE ISSUES

[Text] Bipartite issues were examined during a meeting between Foreign Minister Mitsotakis and Alacam, the Turkish ambassador in Athens.

The Turkish diplomat handed Mitsotakis a warm greeting from Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen on occasion of Greece's full accession to the EEC. In his message, the Turkish foreign Minister expressed his congratulations because Greece, as he stresses, has occupied its position within the European Community. He also expressed assurances that this development, which is an important milestone in Greek-Turkish relations, creates a new tie for cooperation between the two countries. Mitsotakis addressed a similar reply to Turkmen.

As reported, other issues related to Greek-Turkish relations were also examined during the meeting, and it was resolved that the next meeting between the Greek and Turkish foreign ministers will take place next spring. It is expected that a new meeting between the secretaries general of the Greek and Turkish Foreign Ministries will precede such a meeting.

MITSOTAKIS RETURNS FROM SOFIA, ISSUES STATEMENT

[Text] Foreign Minister Mitsotakis returned to Athens this morning after a 3-day official visit to Sofia where he held talks on bilateral issues and the intraBalkan conference.

In a statement at the airport, Mitsotakis said that agreement was reached on all issues which were discussed; on the issue of the Nestos River, another step forward was taken, but of course the issue was not closed. A review of the international situation was also made and, as Mitsotakis said, despite the different economic and social systems of Greece and Bulgaria, it was once again confirmed that on great international issues their positions are close.

After Mitsotakis' talks in Sofia ended, a joint communique was issued. Among other things it stated that the foreign ministers of Greece and Bulgaria were satisfied to note that Greek-Bulgarian relations are continuing to improve and that the last meeting of Presidents Karamanlis and Zhivkov gave them new impetus. Regarding the issue of the Nestos River, the communique mentioned that it was discussed in a spirit of understanding; it was decided to continue discussions in the future. Furthermore, the two ministers exchanged views on Balkan cooperation and current international problems; they noted an identity or similarity in their positions.

KIPRIANOU ARRIVES FOR VISIT, ISSUES STATEMENT

[Text] This morning President of the Republic of Cyprus Kiprianou arrived in Athens for talks with the Greek Government. Upon his arrival at the airport, Kiprianou stated that during his talks in Athens a review will be made of recent developments in the Cyprus problem and viewpoints will be exchanged on the further handling of the issue in view of the fact that the inter-Cypriot dialogue is entering a very delicate phase.

After stressing that the Greek Cypriot side has always attended the dialogue with good will, Kiprianou emphasized that these efforts will be continued despite the daily provocative and intransigent statements of Turkish Cypriot representative Denktas. The Cypriot president also said that if the dialogue does not produce results then the responsibility will be entirely borne by the Turkish Cypriot side.

Kiprianou then noted that the Greek Cypriot side accepts a federal solution that will totally guarantee the independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and unity of the state, and stressed that he rejects any kind of partitionist solution.

Referring to the possibility of the Cyprus Government accepting faits accomplis, Kiprianou categorically stated that neither the fear nor the hope of this is justified.

In conclusion, Kiprianou expressed the Cyprus people's gratitude to the Greek Government, the political world and all the Greek people for their continuing support of Cyprus' just struggle.

Kiprianou was welcomed at the airport by Deputy Prime Minister Papakonstandinou, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, Deputy Foreign Minister Rendis, Cyprus ambassador in Athens, Hatzimiltis and other officials.

Tomorrow morning, Kiprianou will hold talks with Prime Minister Rallis; in the evening he will visit President of the Republic Karamanlis. A conference will also be held tomorrow by the representatives of Greece and Cyprus to discuss developments in the Cyprus problem.

PAPANDREOU ISSUES WARNING ON CYPRUS ISSUE

AT101444 Athens APOYEVMATINI in Greek 10 Jan 81 p 16

[Text] During a cake-cutting ceremony [for the new year] at PASOK offices last night, in referring to the Cyprus problem and its latest developments, Andreas Papandreou warned the Greek Government and, for the first time, the Government of Cyprus not "to legalize faits accomplis in order to end the Cyprus problem in accordance with NATO interests" because "concerning the extent these things would be accepted, we would say [this] constitutes treason."

Diplomatic and political circles in Athens were struck by the fact that Papandreou is not even allowing the Cypriot Government to handle the problem in accordance with Cyprus' interests as it, the leadership of the Cyprus people, sees fit. This is the first time that Papandreou has personally addressed the Cypriot president and warned him.

Papandreou's reference to the Cyprus problem is as follows: "The Governments of Greece and Cyprus are simultaneously trying to end the Cyprus problem one way or another on the basis of the interests of NATO and the great powers. A general atmosphere in the official government and in the established governments of Europe, an atmosphere of 'optimism' exists about the course of the Cyprus problem. On what is this optimism based? Is it based on the division of Cyprus' popular forces which Cyprus' hidden forces have so much promoted? Is it because the Turks are ready to accept thousands of refugees in Famagusta in exchange for the essential acceptance of faits accomplis in Cyprus? When the Turks first demand the lifting of the economic embargo on occupied northern Cyprus, when they insist upon and hope to share the Nicosia airport and also issue passports like the Republic of Cyprus currently does, when they put forth the condition that Cyprus cease to resort to the United Nations and internationalize the Cyprus problem; from that time on, according to the extent these things are accepted by the Greek Government, we can say that this would constitute treason.

"For the first time I address myself not only to the Greek Government but also to the Cypriot Government, and warn President Kiprianou, whom we respect and whom we have supported in his most difficult hours, that neither the Cypriot Government nor the Greek Government has the right to legalize faits accomplis in order to end the Cyprus problem in accordance with NATO interests.

"We are ready to support the Cypriot people's struggle, we are ready to support the work of the Cypriot Government and its president. However, in no way will the Greek people and PASOK recognize the faits accomplis of Attila I and II. We must not forget that our own territorial integrity and national independence are solidly linked with the fate and course of the Cyprus problem."

According to our reports, Cypriot President Kiprianou, who will arrive in Athens tomorrow at noon, will meet with Papandreou and brief him on developments in the issue; he will explain to him the points on which the Cypriot Government can agree.

In addition, speaking in an interview yesterday, [KODISO Chairman] Pesmazoglou said he is uneasy about developments in the Cyprus problem but he does not have enough evidence to allow him to take a position.

AFP: EDITOR OF HURRIYET NEWSPAPER ARRESTED

[Excerpt] Ankara, 11 Jan (AFP)--The editor-in-chief of the moderate HURRIYET newspaper was arrested today in Istanbul, the newspaper's directors reported.

The reasons for the arrest of Salim Bayar were not given, but it followed reports in the newspaper forecasting widespread price increases over the next few days.

On Friday, HURRIYET said the cabinet had agreed to raise train fares 40 to 50 percent, airline prices 30 to 40 percent, alcohol and cigarettes 43 percent, and to boost prices for electricity, paper and cement.

The paper said that the increases were aimed at covering the deficit of nationalized companies so as to end government subsidization, and were to be announced by the company directors.

Yesterday, the headline of a follow-up article said the government had denied the price increases.

FINANCE MINISTER ON FOREIGN DEBT, 1981 BUDGET

TA091643 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1615 GMT 9 Jan 81

[Text] Ankara, 9 Jan (AA)--Finance Minister Kaya Erdem said if Turkey had not obtained rescheduling of foreign debts totalling 8.8 billion dollars from 1978 to 1980, she would have faced an unbearable burden of paying back 17.3 billion dollars in principal and interest from 1978 to 1983.

The minister made the statement to the National Security Council's budget and plan committee while introducing the draft budget for 1981.

Turkey received a total of 6.8 billion dollars in foreign credits in 1979-80, Erdem said, including 1.4 billion dollars of project credits for each year. OECD countries were the major source of project credits with 777 million dollars, followed by the World Bank, which extended 647 million dollars.

In calculating inflation in 1980, the minister excluded the 29.3 percent increase in wholesale prices in February 1980, which were, he claimed, a reflection of "black market prices removed by the austerity measures of 25 January." The wholesale price index had recorded a cummulative increase of "only 33.8 percent" in the nine months from February, he then noted. Therefore, he was optimistic that the rate of inflation could be held below 50 percent in 1981.

Appropriations proposed for fiscal year 1981, which starts the first of March, total over 1,500 billion Turkish liras, the minister noted. This total would be distributed as follows:

25.7 percent for personnel; 13.3 percent for other current expenditures; 20.4 percent for investment; and 34.6 percent for transfer payments. The increase in 1981 appropriations compared to 1980 expenditures would be around 21 percent, he estimated.

USSR WILL FULFILL 1981 GAS DELIVERY 'AS AGREED'

[Text] In an ARBEITER-ZEITUNG interview, Director General Bauer of the Austrian Oil Administration declared that there is certainly no natural gas shortage in Austria, and that the delivery cuts announced by the Upper Austrian Gas Company for the second quarter of this year are not due to lower imports from the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Union will supply 2.5 billion cubic meters of natural gas to Austria this year as agreed, he said, adding that there is nothing new in slightly less Soviet natural gas being available in the first quarter of the year. "That has always been so in the past 12 years--that is why we have provided such ample storage capacity." In Vienna and Lower Austria, no bottlenecks are to be expected according to the provincial gas companies in charge of gas distribution.

The Austrian Socialist Party floor leader in the Upper Austrian Landtag, Freyschlag, has called for placing the Upper Austrian Gas Company under the control of public authorities.

SUBSTANTIAL INCREASE IN EXPORTS TO IRAN IN 1980

[Summary] Vienna--Despite the political unrest and fighting in Iran, Austrian exports to this country developed surprisingly well in 1980, and reached 2.5 billion schillings as against 940 million schillings in 1979, and 1.8 billion schillings on an annual average over many years. "In the opinion of Herbert Geissler, Austrian trade delegate in Tehran, this was ultimately achieved as a result of Austria's nonparticipation in the U.S.-initiated boycott measures. However, Austria has by no means become a transit country for detour deliveries to Iran, he says."

Austrian exports to Iran went up especially in the chemical, iron, steel, paper and foodstuffs sectors. Imports from Iran declined by nearly half in the first 10 months of this year as against the corresponding 1979 period. In view of the foreign currency shortage--Iran's foreign currency reserves have dwindled to $6 billion--the Iranian Government now wants to tighten foreign trade controls and issue import licenses only for vital consumer goods, industrial products and semi-finished goods. Despite the insecure situation, Austrian firms should intensify their marketing efforts in Iran to ensure a good starting position for the expected reconstruction. So far, payments by Iranian banks to Austria have functioned without any difficulties.

SCHMIDT, GISCARD AGREE ON WORLD ASSESSMENTS

[Text] Bonn, 12 Jan (DPA)--Bonn has officially said that there is "complete agreement" between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing in the assessment of the foreign political situation and the state of the world economy.

Government spokesman Kurt Becker today told the press in Bonn that the chancellor and the president in a lengthy telephone conversation on Saturday reached similar views on developments in Eastern Europe and in Africa as well as with regard to the policy standpoints of future American President Ronald Reagan. Becker indicated that Schmidt and Giscard want to counter suppositions that there lately has been a change in their relationship. Both men voiced their surprise at reports speculating on a cooling in this relationship. The chancellor and the president are convinced that these speculations were started deliberately. The government spokesman said that both Schmidt and Giscard intend speaking in the very near future on the foreign political situation. Becker was not specific as to the form this would take. The federal chancellor and the French president intend to meet in Paris at the beginning of February for their next consultative talk.

BONN 'SATISFIED' WITH NEW U.S. DEFENSE VIEWS

[Text] Bonn, 12 Jan (DPA)--The Federal Government is very satisfied and gratified at incoming U.S. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger's statement withdrawing the demand that the European allies adhere strictly to an annual increase in defense expenditure of 3 percent in real terms. Government circles spoke today of a "substantive adjustment" in Washington's attitude toward Bonn's thinking and the arguments of Chancellor Helmut Schmidt.

Government Spokesman Kurt Becker said today that he is pleased at the appreciative remarks by incoming U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig about the defense efforts of the European NATO partners. The Federal Government sees those remarks as a considerable easing of the assessment of European efforts and an easing of the strains connected with Washington's previously critical remarks regarding the defense efforts of the West European partners.

Bonn government circles regard the remarks by Weinberger, who, while calling for adequate defense efforts by the NATO alliance, has nonetheless eased the 3-percent demand so far rigidly adhered to in Washington, as the "pragmatic approach" advocated by Chancellor Schmidt. These circles regard both Weinberger's and Haig's remarks as "very helpful." The chancellor had opposed the American insistence on the 3-percent target, reasoning that some countries are already making a considerable contribution to defense with compulsory military service and that therefore the individual defense budgets should be assessed differently. In the Federal Republic, the change in the American view of European performances expressed by Weinberger and Haig is partly attributed to the chancellor's talks in the United States in November and the subsequent contacts between Bonn and Washington in recent weeks.

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON GENERAL HAIG SENATE HEARING

[From the press review]

[Text] FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU writes: The clear terms in which the designated U.S. secretary of state paid tribute to the defense efforts of the Europeans, even if he deems them capable of improvement, may well clear the road for a fine basis for good and fair cooperation in the future.

The past several months' constant play with figures which always ask only about the real growth rate of the defense expenditures of 3 percent without taking points of no less importance into account--for instance those concerning the reserves and the conversion to new weapons systems--are tiring and do not get us anywhere.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE emphasizes: While people in Europe are still beating about the bush and while in the Federal Republic the unwrapping from tissue paper and foam insulation--with which we had cushioned outselves--is only beginning, the designated U.S. secretary of state in remarks to the Senate indicated a harder line of a revised U.S. world policy. Being an expert on our conditions, Haig at the same time will work as a friendly buffer. His fairness came to light when he reminded the Senate that if the Americans would proportionally put up as many soldiers against the Soviets as the Germans do, 42 U.S. divisions would have to be stationed in central Europe and not just 6. The future political scene in the Federal Republic, however, will have an even harder time finding its way in a changed situation and living up to some world-political circumstances.

STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN believes that disturbing disharmonies have crept into Haig's utterances. The paper notes: Latin American dictators are unscrupulously upgraded as if Carter's human rights policy was mere tomfoolery. Haig makes no bones about his contempt for the SALT treaties to date, as if arms control with Moscow are mere decorative trimmings. He refuses to see that so far they have been the strongest ties holding a U.S.-Soviet alliance of interest together. Ultimately, they are also a prerequisite for Europe's having remained a zone of relative detente. The interlocking political world nowadays does not allow for any diplomatic knockout, which Haig obviously devises for Moscow. It only allows for the constant search for communities of interest which may strengthen peace.

KOELNER STADT-ANZEIGER says: Unlike quite a few of his predecessors, including Henry Kissinger, Haig does not speak of the need for attaining detente. He instead stresses the confrontation with the Russians. What concerns him is the Soviet Union's expansion of power. Haig resorts to using the alarming phrase that there are more important things than living in peace. People are able to understand them only if they comprehend the interconnections partly supplied afterwards. Basically, what he wants is nothing else but to keep the powder dry so that it will deter and help avoid the nuclear catastrophe.

COMMENTATOR ON KISSINGER, U.S. MIDDLE EAST POLICY

[Commentary signed EIN: "Overthrown Taboo"]

[Text] Kissinger is not the incoming American Government but when he makes suggestions for the U.S.-Middle East strategy, one can assume that they are in accordance with the ideas of the future secretary of state, General Haig. Kissinger has Haig's confidence and Haig knows that Kissinger is fully on his side politically. So in Jerusalem, the "tourist" Kissinger demanded an American presence in the crisis zone of the Gulf region. He doesn't think much of an American unit 8,000 miles away ready for action in the Middle East while 18,000 Cubans are ready in Ethiopia and 100,000 Russians occupy Afghanistan. Kissinger did not answer the question about what country will give the American units permission to establish bases. That is of secondary importance. It is important, however, that some thought is being given in America to becoming closer militarily to the endangered zone. Kissinger has overthrown the taboo which the Carter government established upon Brzezinski's advice. It will now be up to the Reagan government to initiate steps for a more effective strategy than the current one.

FOREIGN MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON ALGERIAN VISIT

[Excerpts from reporter Marx telephone interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Algeria; date not given--recorded]

[Answer] Yes, due to relatively high oil imports and increasing natural gas imports, considerable interest exists indeed on our part to offset the trade balance through greater exports to Algeria. Yesterday, we discussed the international situation in our initial talks. One must realize that Algeria is significant not merely because of its geographic situation. Algeria is one of the most influential members of the nonaligned movement. That nonaligned movement has at least an increasingly stabilizing effect on world politics. We in the Federal Republic of Germany very much welcome this development and the influential members of this movement are, therefore, of special interest to us as important discussion partners.

[Question] Algeria shows more and more engagement for the problems of developing countries, while on the other hand, however, Algeria belongs to countries exporting raw materials and demanding higher and higher crude oil prices. What do your discussion partners say when you point out that contradiction to them?

[Answer] I believe that one must realize that Algeria belongs to those countries which are trying to bring about a world economic summit consisting of industrial states, developing countries and oil exporting countries, a summit conference this summer in Mexico. I had initial preparatory talks in Vienna some weeks ago with my Algerian colleague and others with regard to that conference. This indicates that Algeria very well realizes the problems of developing countries.

This also will be a most important point of discussions today. It is obvious that industrial countries are suffering considerably from increasing oil prices, but the increasing oil prices are significant for the very existence of quite a number of developing countries which have no oil themselves. A most important part of my visit is to campaign for understanding in this respect.

[Question] Algeria is a member of the so-called Arab rejection front. What does it mean that the foreign minister will point out to his discussion partner the approach of the Federal Government and the European Community to the Middle East conflict?

[Answer] It is well known here what the European Community states said this summer in Venice regarding their approach to the Middle East problem. This, too, will be explained here again--our motives will be explained. But naturally, we also will ask questions as to how Algeria believes progress can be achieved to overcome that difficult conflict.

Moreover, one must realize that two most important conferences are in the immediate offing: the Islamic conference in Saudi Arabia and the nonaligned conference in India. Both conferences will be concluded by mid-February. In these conferences, the nonaligned also will deal with international developments. Such problems as ending the war between Iraq and Iran will be discussed, as well as paths on which to embark to establish a really nonaligned state by ending the occupation of Afghanistan.

When one sees how much Algeria recently has become engaged--for several months already--in contributing to a solution of the hostage conflict between the United States and Iran, it indicates that nonaligned countries--I mean Algeria in this case--gain more and more weight in international politics. These most intense efforts will soon be successful--we all hope.

[Question] Do you have new information?

[Answer] I believe that it is up to those directly involved to make public statements in this respect.

[Question] What is Algeria's approach to political developments in the north African area, such as the alliance between Libya and Chad?

[Answer] Algeria mainly is trying to see to it that no conflicts will come about between the states of this region. The limits of their own policy are being demonstrated very clearly. Most of all, there is an elementary interest of this country in seeing to it that quarrels between north African states do not result in extended conflicts.

[Question] What will you bring back home, an economic agreement?

[Answer] We will sign an agreement. But I believe that it is most important in present international developments that a state holding such a key position among the nonaligned of this region must most accurately understand the peace policy of the Federal Republic of Germany, a policy we pursue together with our partners. It is aimed at strengthening the independence and sovereignty of the Third World. We, on the other hand, must understand the motives of such an important country in this region. Particularly in critical international developments, it is of decisive significance to know the aims of the other side, thus having the ability to predict the policy of another country. Lack of clarity is perhaps the most dangerous thing in such a situation.

RENGER DISCUSSES SALE OF TANKS TO SAUDI ARABIA

[Interview with Annemarie Renger, SPD Bundestag vice president--date and place of interview not given]

[Text] SPIEGEL: Mrs Renger, up to now, the principle was valid in Bonn that no war materiel be delivered to areas of tension. Would this principle be violated by the sale of tanks to Saudi Arabia?

Renger: We have the war arms control bill and we have the 1971 cabinet decision according to which on principle no war equipment may be delivered to areas of tension. Nothing has changed in this principle to this day.

SPIEGEL: Something is changing about it indeed.

Renger: Occasionally, consideration is given as to whether the question of what areas of tension are ought to be redefined. That would include the question of whether Saudi Arabia still will have to be considered part of the areas of tension subject to that law.

SPIEGEL: Do you consider Saudi Arabia an area of tension?

Renger: Yes, no doubt about it. The entire region is an area of tension. I cannot understand those who deny this. The Saudis are talking of holy war which must be waged against Israel. At the moment, no change in their attitude is in sight. Furthermore, events have taken place in Saudi Arabia which do not have a particularly calming effect.

SPIEGEL: You mean the occupation of the mosque at Mecca by religious fanatics?

Renger: Yes, and above all what might result from the Iranian revolution and from the revolutionary situation in the Islamic states at large.

SPIEGEL: Specifically, you are afraid that the princes might be overthrown by a regime which would then use German tanks against Israel?

Renger: I do not know what kind of a regime might ensue, but changes are possible and even a government of religious leaders would proclaim a so-called holy war, as already happened.

SPIEGEL: The advocates of arms deliveries to Saudi Arabia argue that the country should merely be strengthened in its defence readiness against a Soviet seizure of the oil region in the Persian Gulf. They say this will not aggravate the conflict with Israel.

Renger: I am not saying that the Saudis should not be helped in a certain way to hold this bastion.

SPIEGEL: But not militarily?

Renger: Not militarily by the Germans. After all, it is known that the United States makes available all kinds of military arms and equipment that can serve Saudi Arabia's security. In this connection it is necessary to be aware that the United States not only links conditions to the deliveries, but also is in a position to ensure politically and otherwise that these conditions are observed.

SPIEGEL: What conditions do you mean?

Renger: These arms must be used against Israel.

SPIEGEL: Could the Germans not insist on this the same way?

Renger: We would not have the power to enforce it. But it is not just a matter of power, but above all a matter of morality. A delivery of German arms to Arab states, to Saudi Arabia, definitely would not only cause a worsening of relations with Israel, but also would objectively arouse the impression in Israel that the Germans ignore Israeli security interests.

SPIEGEL: Could it not be made plausible to the Israelis that the Federal Republic must do quite a few things to ensure its oil supply?

Renger: The oil supply is the decisive point which people like to conceal in this debate. However, I have two objections in that respect. To begin with, can we allow ourselves in the long run to be prone to blackmail by oil suppliers? All those who, like myself, are against arms deliveries also must say that we want to become more independent from oil. We can no longer pretend that the introduction of nuclear energy to a certain extent is not inevitable.

SPIEGEL: And your second point?

Renger: We should not pretend that we can safeguard our oil supplies only through the delivery of arms. I say no, that is not necessary. If the Americans supply arms to strengthen the Saudis, we must think about what else we can do to help the Saudis. Someday, we will have to discuss the distribution of burdens. I am not prepared to defend arms exports to tension areas by pointing out economic interests or the preservation of jobs.

SPIEGEL: Paris for a long time has been selling German war materiel which Germany and France jointly produced, to the Middle East, such as to Syria, without Bonn protesting.

Renger: We have not said that the French ought to supply Syria. But there are certain grey zones to which one must attribute more attention in the near future. I am quite certain of that.

SPIEGEL: You would have to stop coproduction with France before you would be able to prompt Paris to stop those exports.

Renger: I have no final answer. I do not believe we can say that we do not supply. Morally, we are staying out of it. But we know that our allies are involved in this business together with our own production. That would not be honest.

SPIEGEL: You say that the Germans cannot make arms deals for moral reasons. Haven't relations with Israel normalized to the point that there is no need to maintain a special moral concern?

Renger: There is normalization between the states, no doubt about it. But the moral background of German-Israeli relations should not disappear from our thoughts in coming generations.

SPIEGEL: The federal chancellor maintains occasionally that the moral burden of the Nazi past has to end sometime. In the meantime, Israel has developed some understanding in this respect.

Renger: That is not an antagonism. I am one of those, as the chairman of the German-Israeli parliamentarian group for many years, who always has said that our children and grandchildren cannot bear the burden of our guilt--which I do not consider the guilt of all Germans, but of many Germans. But it is impossible to just ignore historical facts as if they did not exist.

SPIEGEL: Assuming the Federal Government did not share your reservations, how would the Israelis react?

Renger: I fear that in such a case relations would become ice cold and that everything settled through a wise policy would be endangered.

SPIEGEL: It is not possible to avoid this danger through a generous fulfillment of possible Israeli demands?

Renger: Which?

SPIEGEL: Economic demands, for example, special rights for access to the European market.

Renger: I would not like to see the Israelis respond to a wrong moral action with the same wrong moral action on their part.

SPIEGEL: Should the Federal Republic supply both sides with military equipment?

Renger: No. I do not think this is our mission. We should not contribute toward increasing tensions in this region. It could in the end bring the Soviet Union to the gates of Israel.

SPIEGEL: Will a majority of the SPD faction support the Saudi deal?

Renger: I believe that my SPD faction colleagues see these things similarly to the way I have just described them. I cannot imagine that there will be approval of arms supplies to Arab countries, to Saudi Arabia. That is not a problem of rightists or leftists.

SPIEGEL: So you see great difficulties for the chancellor if he insists on supplying tanks?

Renger: I see no great difficulties for the chancellor because I assume that the chancellor will develop his opinion in a similar way. In view of the way things stand, I cannot imagine that his policy would lead him to hold a different opinion.

SPIEGEL: There will be no deliveries?

Renger: You said it.

GROWING SUPPORT FOR GDR CITIZENSHIP DEMANDS CITED

DW121520 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 12 Jan 81 p 8

[Article signed WS: "The Wrong Topic"]

[Text] Berlin, 11 Jan--Honecker can be satisfied in two respects. Instead of discussing the mandatory exchange amount, which would be in the interest of the people, the Federal Republic is discussing citizenship, which is in the interest of the GDR.

But the GDR's demand for recognition of its "citizenship" is not merely a diversion from the mandatory exchange amount. The GDR is serious.

Although the constitution and the Federal Constitutional Court prohibit the deprivation of the Germans in the GDR of their German citizenship--and that is what recognition of GDR citizenship would mean--the SED obviously is convinced that a majority will emerge in Bonn which will agree to an amendment of the constitution in terms of a repeal of citizenship being made up of all Germans.

This optimism is being nourished by ambitious politicians as well as by scientists in the Federal Republic who ponder publicly as to how the GDR's wishes can be met. Discussion of the citizenship which has broken out here exults the GDR. It is aware that much can be achieved in Bonn through persistence. After all, it now has the backing not only of the Young Socialists, but of the Young Democrats.

BRIEFS

OIL CONSUMPTION DECREASE--The United Economic Information Service reports that oil consumption in the FRG decreased by 10 percent or by 15 million tons in 1980 compared with 1979, amounting to almost DM7 billion. The Hamburg Esso Company reports that two-thirds of the decrease was due to consumers' economy, while one-third was caused by substitution of other energy sources and by lower economic activity. For the first time since 1968, the oil share in German energy consumption dropped under 50 percent. [Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 8 Jan 81 p 20 DW]

TEXT OF FOREIGN MINISTRY COMMUNIQUE ON CHAD

[Text] The following is the text of the Quai d'Orsay communique [issued 8 January] on the merger between Libya and Chad:

1. France led Chad to independence. It has always respected Chad's sovereignty. At the request of Chad's regular government, it has given the country its aid on several occasions and has afforded it protection. France has never intervened in its internal affairs, not even in the troubled period through which Chad is passing. It withdrew its forces from Chad following the Lagos agreement.

2. France is justified in recalling today that nobody, aside from the Chadian people themselves, has the right to pledge that country's long-term future. Consequently, having had the opportunity to deliberate on this matter, France cannot regard as valid the moves made in Tripoli toward a merger between the Libyan and Chadian peoples within the Chadian government.

The Chadian Government, which describes itself as a transition government, owes its existence to the Lagos conference and its legitimacy to the mandate it received from that conference. Having been given the responsibility of administering Chad during the transition period and of preparing for elections before January 1982, it is in no position to forecast the choice which will be made by the government which emerges from those elections.

3. In these circumstances, France condemns the Tripoli agreement. It contradicts the Lagos agreements which the Libyan Government itself signed. It disregards the Chadian people's rights, denying them the opportunity to freely give their verdict. It reveals ambitions which constitute a threat to Africa's security.

4. France, for its part, will stand by the Chadian people with regard to their rights and by Africa with regard to its security.

LE MONDE ON INCREASED MILITARY PRESENCE IN AFRICA

[Text] In the command post known as Jupiter, which is, in a way, the Elysee's "operations room," Giscard d'Estaing on 8 January chaired a "working and review session." It was attended notably by Defense and Cooperation Minister Robert Galley and by diplomatic and military advisers. This meeting was devoted to the means of increasing France's military aid to the African countries which might request it.

The Elysee stressed that the head of state wishes to give that meeting a degree of publicity while Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet is in Africa, soon to be followed by [Secretary of State to the Minister of Foreign Affairs] Olivier Stirn, who also will discuss security problems.

Following the Elysee meeting, military circles stated that the French Government is prepared to increase its military aid--in men and equipment--to African countries which request it and agree to French troops being stationed, if previously they refused to agree to that. This decision in principle could be implemented very quickly.

Initially, the aim will be to strengthen French military presence in African states in which it already exists, in other words, in Gabon (at present there are 500 men with airlift capability), in central African (950 men dvided between Bangui and Bouar), in the Ivory Coast (450 men) and in Senegal (600 men with airlift capability). With the consent of the governments concerned these "support points" could receive new forces and additional equipment to strengthen the garrisons within the framework of defense or aid agreements already concluded.

Eventually, there will be negotiations with the African states which hitherto have accepted only a military aid mission from France, in order to increase the number of French officers present and to send military advisers and even organized units. At present, this category includes Niger and Cameroon--two of Chad's neighbors--where France so far only has senior and junior training officers in the local native military staff training schools.

Talks already are in progress with Niger on adding some 20 men to the 60 French officers now in Naimey military schools. If Niger expresses the need during the talks, organized units of the French intervention forces will be sent to the country, from which France obtains around 20 percent of its annual uranium supplies. Similarly, French forces could be stationed in Cameroon where there is already a military mission of 70 officers excluding medical staff.

PAPER DISCUSSES FRENCH ROLE, LIBYAN-CHAD MERGER

[Jean-Marc Kalfleche article: "Backfire"]

[Text] The French Government, which had seemed resigned to the large-scale intervention by Libyan forces in Chad, although deploring it, seems particularly angry about the "merger" agreement concluded at the end of Goukouni Oueddei's visit to Libya.

Paris, which pretended to regard the latter as the only legitimate authority in Chad over the past few months, although 6 of the 11 groups which signed the Lagos agreements were expelled by him from the Transitional National Union Government [GUNT], had clung until the past few days to the hope of a rapid departure by the Libyan troops after Ndjamena's "liberation." In any event, the Quai d'Orsay thought that a rapid resumption of cooperation with the GUNT was eventually likely to favor this withdrawal. It was said that refusing to help Goukouni would condemn him to a dangerous role as a vassal.

This is clearly not the view held now and the Foreign and Cooperation Ministries now are wondering whether the Tripoli agreement, announced only by Libyan sources, was not forced on Goukouni, whether he will not try to disavow it in the coming hours or days and, if he really was willing to sign it, whether he has the power to commit Chad to it and whether his colleagues in the GUNT will disown him. Thus, the Lagos agreements are being found to contain constitutional rules, collegiality and the need for agreement from all factions--which previously seemed completely unimportant. And a clause, accepted at the time by Libya, has been found which forbids Chad's neighboring states to interfere in its affairs....!

What is the precise significance of the document signed in Tripoli? What are its terms? Are we really going to see the creation of a united republic? Will the southern Negro-African population, partially converted to Christianity, accept that? These are probably the questions which were examined during the government discussions yesterday, although it is impossible to do more than hypothesize. However, three crucial problems are likely to be raised in the very near future:

1. What attitude would France adopt if some of the existing GUNT leaders (possibly even Goukouni himself: such things have happened before) were to reject the Tripoli agreement and ask for French aid?

2. What would it do if the south, where several hundred French nationals including voluntary workers are still living, were to rebel? What if the Libyans in turn undertook to "normalize" that region? These are two hypotheses which now seem to be taken very seriously in some circles.

3. Finally, if the merger is confirmed and if it is accepted, at least until there is some indication to the contrary, should France behave as if nothing had happened, respond to Goukouni's offers and send civilian voluntary workers to work alongside Al-Qadhdhafi's soldiers or mercenaries?

In the third case, one of Paris' main concerns probably would be to prevent the idea of Franco-Libyan connivance from prevailing throughout French-speaking Africa. Mr Giraud's communique has already shown that the government is on the defensive in his respect, especially since Al-Qadhdhafi is deliberately doing all he can to compromise him.

LE MONDE ANALYZES COLONEL AL-QADHDHAFI ACTIONS

[Editorial: "Challenge?"]

[Text] Since he seized power in Tripoli in 1969, Colonel al-Qadhdhafi has drawn some of his strength from his adversaries' refusal to take his initiatives seriously. Thus when, following up a military victory won less than 1 month ago by the Libyan troops in Ndjamena, Al-Qadhdhafi proclaims his intention to unite Chad and Libya, chancellories and general staffs quibble or say nothing.

Al-Qadhdhafi for his part, in keeping with his particular brand of logic, is determinedly pursuing his advance which, in Chad's case, began in 1973 when the Aouzou strip was annexed and added to Libyan territory on the strength of an agreement reached in 1935 between Laval and Mussolini and never ratified by France, relating to the transfer of that territory to Italy. The vacillations of the Elysee and the Quai d'Orsay, the incoherence and even non-existence of French policy in central Africa, aggravated by the sterile expression of the fears of France's African partners, have given the Libyan president self-confidence. However, while the reasons for the initiative taken by Colonel al-Qadhdhafi are relatively clear, it is not clear that he has really assessed their full scope.

The Chadians themselves could not unanimously share the Libyan viewpoint. Hissein Habre intends to pursue the armed struggle in the eastern part of the country. Although Colonel Kamougue recently moved closer to Goukouni Oueddei, president of the Transitional National Union Government, a body whose days are now numbered, he still cannot back the unity plan since he remains the leader of southern Chad. For religious, ethnic and historical reasons, this region traditionally is opposed to everything relating to the Islamized world to which the northern white minorities are tied. Goukouni Oueddei is the son of the traditional chief of the Toubous whose area of inhabitation covers Chad, Libya and Nigeria.

The astonishing absence of any immediate official reactions from Maghreb and Machrek capitals and from the capitals of the south Saharan states can be explained by the effects of Libyan petrodollars which are used notably to maintain numerous local lobbies. However, it is clear that, in Africa as a whole, anxiety has turned to chaos.

Sudan, which is now a "sanctuary" for Hissein Habre's supporters, is the first state to be threatened by this sudden extension of Libyan proximity. Beyond Sudan, it is Egypt which is in Al-Qadhdhafi's way and he cannot be indifferent to the future of two states whose leaders are hostile to him.

The central African French-speaking states are watching the dangers grow: Cameroon, into which the Chadian refugees are still flowing; Central Africa, not properly recovered from the damage done by the newly deposed Emperor Bokassa's wild illusions, Zaire and the Congo, which are in the throes of serious internal tensions and Gabon, leader of this region's moderate states. However, western Africa as a whole is under a general threat of destabilization.

Moreover, France is particularly uneasy since it is aware that the Libyan president knows a great deal about such obscure affairs as the sufferings of the Claustre couple, former hostages of Goukouni Oueddei and Hissein Habre or Delpey's relations with Bokassa. The initiatives by French oil companies in Libya, which apparently are hampering political relations between Paris and Tripoli, are not reassuring either.

MARIO SOARES ON ELECTION RESULTS, PERSONAL PLANS

LD121253 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 13 Dec 80 review section pp 1-5

[Maris Joao Avilez interview with Mario Soares: "'I Would Never Be Secretary General Of A Trend, Of One Part Of The Party Against Another'"; date and place not given]

[Text] EXPRESSO: During the weeks of the election campaign did you expect the election to turn out the way it did?

Mario Soares: I realized that General Ramalho Eanes' campaign had gathered an irresistible momentum of popular support even in the zones of traditional Democratic Alliance influence. On the other hand, I always thought, and I said so, that General Soares Carneiro was a "stock product" in election marketing terms. I was, however, surprised by the size of the victory.

EXPRESSO: But how do you view the result? How do you regard such a big victory, as you call it, and the defeat of Soares Carneiro?

Mario Soares: [Words illegible] eyes of the people, as candidate of the democratic constitutional regime. Soares Carneiro, as the opposite of that: candidate of an anti-regime, virtually anonymous vehicle for a plan which many people showed to be authoritarian. No remotely valid alternatives to the two candidates emerged; there was no other choice.

EXPRESSO: It is said that two major defeats resulted from the Eanes victory. One was the defeat of Francisco Sa Carneiro, now sadly dead. The other casualty is alive and is called Mario Soares....

Mario Soares: I do not consider myself defeated since after the 14 October press conference I took no further part on the election campaign....

EXPRESSO: That is not what I asked....

Mario Soares: ...I withdrew my support for Ramalho Eanes, for well-known reasons, but I did nothing to hinder my party's support for him.

I confined myself to not putting myself forward as his political guarantor for the socialist electorate. That was the meaning of my silence--none other.

EXPRESSO: In that connection, is it true that several times during the election campaign you were pressed to take a stance in one direction or the other?

Mario Soares: It is true, and in both directions.

EXPRESSO: Pardon?

Mario Soares: Pressed to put in a word for Ramalho Eanes and, conversely, to explain in detail why I came to withdraw (on a personal basis) my support from him.

EXPRESSO: Is that all?

Mario Soares: I was also pressured directly, through personal contacts and through correspondence, and indirectly, through articles that appeared in the press and stances taken on television.

EXPRESSO: Why did you not succumb in the end? For consistency's sake or...

Mario Soares: I maintained my position because I was convinced that it was politically just and moral and because only total silence made sense and was consistent.

EXPRESSO: What kind of Socialist Party (PS) will its secretary general encounter after this Eanes victory?

Mario Soares: The same PS as always....

EXPRESSO: As always?

Mario Soares: I suppose with its potential and weaknesses it is an extraordinarily broadly based party, perhaps too inward looking, with a great, shall we say, clubby sense of its own identity and autonomy.

EXPRESSO: How will it be for you? How will it be from now on? For example, will you return fully to the party and take the situation in hand? Or will you prefer to remain aloof from the disputes, differences, power struggles and so forth which will inevitably ensue?

Mario Soares: I have resumed my party functions as normally as before. As you know, I have never involved myself in power struggles within the party. On the contrary, I have always been the guarantor of its unity, its cement. On the other hand, I assumed the major responsibility only because I was practically obliged to. Not because that was what I keenly desired. I can guarantee you this--I would never be secretary general of a trend, of one part of the party against another part, even a majority part.

Two Books

EXPRESSO: What do you mean by that?

Mario Soares: Either I work as secretary general of the party in its totality and its multiplicity of sentiments, or I devote myself to other occupations.

EXPRESSO: An intriguing reply... What occupations?

Mario Soares: Intellectual or other activities which for some time I have wanted to try my hand at.

In My Element

EXPRESSO: What does that mean exactly, wanting to try your hand? You have a reason for saying that...Is it because you are finding it increasingly difficult to be secretary general of the part in its totality, which you mentioned before?

Mario Soares: No. The situation is that I have been asked by a French publisher to do two books: one on democratic socialism, the other a summing up of the revolution from 1974 to the present day, which would be a kind of continuation of "Portugal Gagged" [Soares book written during his exile in France.] I am tempted, as you can imagine.

EXPRESSO: Certainly. But I would also like to know whether your particular interest in this project reveals a certain disenchantment with political life?

Mario Soares: On the contrary. I am in my element in the complex and difficult situations I meet.....

EXPRESSO: Like now, for example?

Mario Soares: Certainly not as far as the PS is concerned.

I Have Always Said There Are No Permanent Secretary Generals

EXPRESSO: Moving on, is it part of your plans to take up the party presidency after the next congress?

Mario Soares: I am not accustomed to being a figurehead, to taking up purely honorary posts. Besides, I am not old enough for that.

EXPRESSO: But I was not getting at that.

Mario Soares: But if there were a change in the rules, giving the president, directly elected by congress, effective powers--making the secretary general an executive, a manager, after the example of the British Labor Party--it is an idea I would not rule out.

EXPRESSO: That is what I was after.... But where is the person with the stature to possibly take up the secretary generalship?

Mario Soares: It does not need a person of great stature to be secretary general of a party. Take my case....

EXPRESSO: Your case was what prompted the question in the first place. But if you do not want to answer we'll move on.

Mario Soares: But, seriously, remember I have always said that there are no permanent secretary generals in the PS.

EXPRESSO: Let us get down to specific policies. Two hot topics: constitutional revision and electoral law. Can we start with the first?

Mario Soares: With the election of General Eanes the conditions now exist for effecting a sensible constitutional revision through a broadened consensus between the parties with the backing of the Assembly. Obviously the president does not have the constitutional authority to interfere in constitutional revision. It is a matter for the Assembly. But, with dropping of the referendum idea, which has been publicly promised, that sword of Damocles which the majority would have used as a veritable diktat has ceased to hang over the opposition parties.

EXPRESSO: And the electoral law.

Mario Soares: He also guaranteed not to promulgate any electoral law which would jeopardize the essential rule of democratic alternation. These are two guarantees of great importance in terms of the proper functioning of the Portuguese democratic system.

EXPRESSO: It is known that Eanes was going to relinquish the post of chief of the Armed Forces General Staff. As we can see this has not yet happened. What does this mean, in your view?

Mario Soares: This formal promise is actually a product of the agreement, or "accord principles," if you like, made with the PS and the speech made by the president when he accepted his renomination as candidate. According to the military authorities, when he reassumed the functions of chief of staff after the elections he did so with the intention of giving them up immediately on receiving his second mandate, the right moment, perhaps, for naming the new chief of staff.

The Democratic Alliance Must Govern As Behooves It

EXPRESSO: Changing the subject, how do you view the Democratic Alliance at present? I mean, without Sa Carneiro is the Democratic Alliance possible?

Mario Soares: That is very difficult. I would go so far as to say that it is too early to answer that question. Sa Carneiro was the soul of the Democratic Alliance. Will the Democratic Alliance be able to find a new leader, with a new government and, if so, what kind of government? A new internal stability? It is undeniably difficult, but I hope it will. Although I am a firm opponent of the Democratic Alliance--have been, am and will continue to be--I do think that the Democratic Alliance must govern as behooves it, for this was the undoubted vote of the majority of the country on 5 October.

EXPRESSO: Connected with my last question, another question: The possibility of conflict, more or less grave, between two majorities--the Democratic Alliance's governing majority and Eanes' presidential majority. How do you view the possibility of a conflict and its development?

Mario Soares: In my view there is no presidential majority in the strict political sense of the phrase. I have thought that ever since 1977/78 when people began to talk of a presidential majority to find some legitimacy in order to make the PS-inspired government inviable (which subsequently benefited the right). Having dismissed the concept of presidential majority, as in fact Eanes did at the press conference on the morning of the elections, there is clearly no conflict between majorities but institutional solidarity between different organs of sovereignty.

EXPRESSO: But is this solidarity possible? Is Eanes then president of all the Portuguese people?

Mario Soares: Eanes is only "president of all--I said all--the Portuguese people" insofar as he refuses to consider himself head of a specific majority. Because then one might wonder: what majority? Including the communist party and extreme left?

The elections of 5 October and 7 December are not invalid because they are both a legitimate expression of the people's will. On 5 October the people chose a majority to govern, on 7 December a president of the republic with the restricted powers that the constitution confers. They are different and complementary choices, not antagonistic or conflicting.

And we always said that Sa Carneiro had no right, in terms of principle, to threaten to resign if Eanes was reelected. Eanes always said exactly the opposite, that is: if he was reelected he would nominate a new government according to the indications resulting from the 5 October elections. Constitutionally, he could not do otherwise.

EXPRESSO: From what was said the other day on television by a reformist politician, there appears to be a return to the idea of a presidentialist party. Hadn't this idea been finally discarded? Hasn't Eanes himself always been the first to reject it or to say that he would reject it "later"?

Mario Soares: I think, in fact, that to return to a concept of that kind is to expose the president, who needs the protection of able interlocutors in the parties, to dangerous and rapid erosion. Certaintly there are politicaians who would be interested in the possible benefits of a gamble of this kind because it would be a way of gaining power or reaching the anteroom of power without undergoing the ordeal by fire of popular suffrage. But for the president it would be a fatal mistake to embark on an adventure of that kind, as we saw during 1979.

A Central Bloc: Inopportune Aspiration

EXPRESSO: Eanes' political idea was that of a so-called central bloc. What does he mean by a central bloc? Is it possible? How and on what basis would it be constructed? Who would the victims be and who would be chosen to help?

Mario Soares: The central bloc is, at best, an inopportune aspiration.

EXPRESSO: Why inopportune?

Mario Soares: Because what exists today is a rightwing bloc represented by the Democratic Alliance and a front, the Republican and Socialist Front, which claims to appeal to the left and left of center but did not win a particularly large number of votes in that area. The promotion of the idea and even more so the actual creation of a central bloc presupposes first dismembering the Democratic Alliance, which goes against the grain of the popular vote. It would mean immediate problems also for the Republican and Socialist Front. There could even be two dismemberments with all their adverse effects on the complex balance between the parties.

EXPRESSO: Can you explain that better, please....

Mario Soares: I believe that multiparty arrangements must be based on the will of the parties themselves and not on some external paternalism or tutelage. I repeat: the fundamental requirement today in terms of the stability of institutions is that the Democratic Alliance govern as cohesively as possible and that the Republican and Socialist Front, and the PS, of course, act as the opposition, without ambiguities and with respect for the pointers of the popular vote. Otherwise, what would be the point of holding elections? And if we fail to abide by the pointers of one election what reason should we have to respect any others? Just because it is the most recent? What if the circumstances recommended a new interim election and its result (to introduce an absurd hypothesis) confirmed the 5 October election? Would we then (hypothetically, of course) question the legitimacy conferred by the 7 December election? Of course not. OK...?

Defeats Don't Do Anyone Any Good, That's For Sure

EXPRESSO: Is it tough at 55...

Mario Soares:...56: It was my birthday 3 days ago.

EXPRESSO: Is it tough, at 56, to suffer two defeats in the space of 2 months?

Mario Soares: Defeats don't do anyone any good, that's for sure--at 56 or any other age. And I do not like suffering any defeat near my birthday (7 December)....

EXPRESSO: Looking at the national political scene at this moment, what do you see?

Mario Soares: A complex picture, patches of light and shade. That is, bright and dark areas with some surprising light effects. But as in all suspense dramas no one can be sure until the very end what is going to happen. Being a natural optimist, my money is on a happy outcome.

For the good of Portugal, which is so badly in need of luck in 1981.

NEW PSUC EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE COMPOSITION

LD130654 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1230 GMT 12 Jan 81

[Text] Late last night, the new Executive Committee of the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] was elected after a long meeting. The PSUC is the Catalan branch of the Spanish Communist Party. Moreover, it approved a political resolution in which it took note of the party's exceptional situation.

EL PAIS ON PRO-SOVIET DOMINANCE AT PSUC CONGRESS

[Alfonso Quinta report: "PSUC Rejects Eurocommunism as Ideological and Political Definition"]

[Excerpt] Barcelona--By 424 votes in favor of removal, 359 against and 21 abstentions, the Fifth Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] Congress decided in Barcelona last night to remove the expresion "Eurocommunism" from the congress theses. As a result, the word is totally rejected as a valid expression for defining the party's ideology and policy. Outgoing Secretary General Antonia Gutierrez, who had threatened before the vote not to be a member of the leadership if this happened, explained afterward that he would not agree to join the new Executive Committee, but would agree to join the Central Committee.

Outgoing Secretary General Antonio Guiterrez Diaz and Catalonian Workers Commissions Secretary General Jose Luis Lopez Bulla voted against rejecting the word "Eurocommunism." On the other hand, Josep Serradell, who has been for years in charge of organization within the PSUC and a prominent pro-Soviet, voted in favor. The vast majority of the representatives of the Barcelona industrial belt, where the PSUC has a very strong position, and many of the delegations from Barcelona city, Lerida and Tarragona, all of which were dominated by or had a strong contingent of the so-called pro-Soviet, Stalinist or Afghan sector, also voted in favor of rejection.

This was the culmination of an intensive offensive by that sector, which has won constant victories throughout the congress. This sector has become a dominant force within the PSUC within a very few months, whereas it previously had very little influence--the smallest of the four sectors which have been taking shape within the Catalonian communists' party over the last few years.

The radicalization of international politics--of which Ronald Reagan's election is symptomatic--political disenchantment in Catalonia and the skill of veteran party members from the Stalinist era--who are strong in the PSUC through the secretaryship for organization--are the facts which explain this rapid and delicate rise of the pro-Soviets.

The total removal of the term "Eurocommunism" was advocated by the "pro-Soviets" on the grounds that it separated the PSUC from the PCF and the PCP, was being used in a strategy against the Warsaw Pact countries, involved a distortion of the PSUC's historically communist nature and was an "adjective or label which has come to us from outside the party."

Previously, the PSUC Fifth Congress' Credentials Committee had rejected the list of the incoming Central Committee proposed by the outgoing leadership. This rejection was achieved by the "pro-Soviet" sector, which described the proposal as "continuist" and not in keeping with the process of radicalization represented by the congress underway.

Yesterday, the "pro-Soviet" current extensively amended the congress theses. It succeeded in removing the various critical allusions to the Soviet Union which had been approved by the outgoing Central Committee. The "pro-Soviets" victory was far greater than expected and plunged both the outgoing leadership and part of the "Leninist" sectors into sheer confusion. The so-called "white flag" rightwing current expressed through several of its prominent representatives the possibility of withdrawal from the party on an individual basis, and, at all events, their desire not to belong to an incoming leadership corresponding to the ideological stances approved yesterday.

At the initiative of the "pro-Soviets," what was initially a harsh criticism of the Soviet Union was transformed, to cite an instance, into the following text: "The socialist countries' solidarity with and clear support for the countries struggling for their national liberation against imperialist oppression is today one of the most important expressions of internationalism. The confrontation between the socialist countries and imperialism is today one of the principal manifestations of the class struggle at the international level."

Thus it transpired that direct criticisms of the USSR were simply transformed into real expressions of sympathy toward the Soviet Union. In the case of virtually all these amendments, the most representative figures of the outgoing leadership, in particular, outgoing Secretary General Gutierrez Diaz, openly voted against, once more sustaining further public defeats, absolutely unprecedented at communist congresses.

Other surprising occurrences took place in the debate on the theses--always as a result of the drive by the "pro-Soviets," "Stalinists," "historicals" or "Afghans," all of these being names applied to this new dominant current in the PSUC. Thus there was an unambiguous rejection of any kind of nuclear energy and a specific amendment critically assessing in an explicitly negative manner the fact that the communist parliamentarians had voted in favor of approval of the antiterrorist law. The PSUC congress also demanded that this law should not be extended on the previous day. Various "pro-Soviet" speeches had emphasized that condemnation of Basque homeland and Liberty terrorism should not cause that of a fascist nature or certain police actions to be forgotten.

On the other hand, the "pro-Soviets" did not succeed in removing from the congress theses the condemnation of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. Nevertheless, this condemnation will already have been disguised or simply canceled in the outgoing secretary general's report, which was submitted during the first day of the congress with the clear aim of partially satisfying the "pro-Soviets" and thus securing his reelection. Though the Central Committee which he headed had condemned the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, Gutierrez Diaz asserts in his report something as strange as the following: "Others (social changes)," Gutierrez Diaz stated literally, "have represented genuine revolutionary changes, such as those in Afghanistan, South Yemen, Granada, Iran, Nicaragua and Zimbabwe."

Gutierrez Diaz Threatened To Withdraw

In light of the "pro-Soviet" drive, the PSUC's outgoing leadership decided yesterday, according to what a prominent leader told this newspaper, not to run for the incoming leadership if the congress approved the removal of the term "Eurocommunism." This word split the congress again yesterday, as it had already done Saturday. On that day the battle resulted in the ties since the "Leninists, who appear to be playing a center role at this congress, succeeded in preventing a specific vote at last on the presence of the word "Eurocommunism" in the outgoing secretary general's report.

When this battle was averted, the report was approved with over 200 abstentions. The "pro-Soviets" happened to be in favor of approving the report, whose contents were full of concessions to their stance, but, on the other hand, wished to remove the word "Eurocommunism." The outcome of the desire, on the one hand, to approve the report and, on the other hand, to remove the word "Eurocommunism," (Thoughts even some "pro-Soviets" believed that it was not the right time for joining the battle), was the above-mentioned tie situation. However, the polarization had to lean toward one side or the other last night.

Nevertheless, the threat of Gutierrez Diaz and his team to refuse to be members of the new leadership if such a removal [of the word "Eurocommunism"] occurred, was looming over the "pro-Soviets." In fact the "pro-Soviets" wish to maintain and consolidate the positions which they already held in the party's outgoing apparatus, but lack candidates capable of aspiring to the party's secretary generalship of chairmanship. All this, and, in particular, Gutierrez Diaz' threat, makes it possible to make comparisons between the present PSUC congress and the Spanish Socialist Workers Party's penultimate congress which resulted in the resignation of Felipe Gonzalez.

Self-Determination Of Catalonia

In addition to securing at committee level the removal of the term "Eurocommunism" in the theses, the "pro-Soviets" won another sensational victory. In the rules committee they succeeded in the approval of an amendment which would introduce, if approved by the congress in plenary session, the following text concerning one of the duties of every Catalonian communist party member: "The affirmation and expression of Catalonia's national personality by means of the defense of its right to self-determination, within the entirety of the peoples of Spain, in the perspective of a federal republic (sic)." Another pro-Soviet proposal also approved at committee level would oblige communist party members to struggle for the "progressive development and transformation of the constitution." A "white flag" sector source told this newspaper that these amendments to the rules, if endorsed, could even give rise to legal proceedings on the part of the Ministry of the Interior.

Another pro-Soviet victory lay in the relevant committee's agreeing to remove from the draft rules submitted by the outgoing leadership the expression asserting for the first time that the PSUC "is a secular party." In fact the "pro-Soviets" believe that the inclusion of the term "secular," with respect to the PSUC, would mean in "interiorization" of the religious issue, over and above its social significance.

In the debates at the plenary level of the amendments to the theses approved in committee, not only did systematic "pro-Soviet" victories occur, with the voting generally against "Gutierrez Diaz on the important issues, but also these victories occurred in some instances by very small margins of even one or two votes. Thus a very important amendment in the field of international policy, which simply transformed what in its initial wording was a criticism of the USSR into a clear praise of that country, was approved by 353 votes in favor, 351 against and 4 abstentions. Other votes were also very close (for instance, 361 votes to 362, with 43 abstentions).

But the outstanding feature was the offensive tone of the "pro-Soviets" and the defensive tone of the outgoing leadership, as well as the desire of the "Leninists" to attempt to find formulas of agreement, and the stance of the "white flag" sector of simply passing unnoticed or remaining well camouflaged behind the outgoing leadership. For this rightwing or moderate current, it was obvious that this congress is already a disaster.

[Report by our Madrid correspondent: "Gilmour Has 'Frank' Talks On Gibraltar"]

[Text] Sir Ian Gilmour, deputy foreign secretary had what was described as "a frank and friendly" exchange with the Spanish foreign minister, Senor Jose Pedro Perez Llorca in Madrid yesterday over the delay in starting talks on the future of Gibraltar.

Sir Ian indicated that official talks aimed at implementing the Lisbon agreement on Gibraltar would continue. It was agreed in Lisbon last April that talks would begin on the future of the Rock as soon as the border restrictions imposed a decade ago by the Franco regime are lifted.

But the frontier gates have remained padlocked and other restrictions are still in force. Until they are lifted, Sir Ian pointed out on arrival at Madrid on Wednesday, the negotiations cannot start.

DER SPIEGEL INTERVIEWS RALLIS ON EC MEMBERSHIP

[Interview by editors Mareike Spiess-Hohnholz and Kostas Tstsaronis with Greek Prime Minister Yeoryois Rallis in Athens: date not given]

[Text] SPIEGEL: Mr Prime Minister, many Greeks face Greece's membership in the European Community helplessly if not in panic. What are the feelings of the government chief?

Rallis: I believe that Greece will gain only advantages from the membership--economic as well as political advantages. The Greeks will naturally have to change their way of thinking and adapt themselves to applying methods and organizational forms. But that is not a disadvantage, it is an advantage.

SPIEGEL: Your predecessor, the current president, Karamanlis, maintained the standpoint in 1962 when Greece became associated [with the EEC] that all you need to do is throw the Greeks into water and they will learn to swim. Have your compatriots learned to swim in these almost 20 years?

Rallis: Yes, and the water we are now diving into is not cold. It is pleasant to dive into the warm sea in July.

SPIEGEL: But Greece is diving into the sea in January.

Rallis: And yet it will not be a cold shower but a pleasant swim. We must certainly swim, but that has happened to all nations which have changed their way of life as we must now change ours. We were alone, and we have made our decision alone. Now our decisions depend on those of the other nine partners.

SPIEGEL: What has motivated Greece most to become a member of the European Community? Were they political, economic or social reasons?

Rallis: All of these together. We believe that if Europe wants to continue to exist it must form an entity. Greece belongs historically to that entity.

SPIEGEL: For your main political adversary, Andreas Papandreou, the European Community and NATO, to which Greece returned a few weeks ago, are "one and the same syndicate." He threatens, if he should come to power through elections this year, to possibly separate Greece from both alliances through a referendum. Could it be that EEC as well as NATO may have one member less within a short time?

Rallis: If he wins the elections. I think he will not win them. It seems to me that this is much ado about nothing. Many things can happen before the elections--good things and bad things.

SPIEGEL: Do you believe that Papandreou seriously intends to withdraw Greece from the European Community and NATO?

Rallis: Many people say that Papandreou does not want that himself, and that he would not do so if he won the elections. I don't know whether that is the case. A big part of his party thinks so and hopes for it, and if he won the elections he would have to keep his promise.

SPIEGEL: Is not a referendum a blunt weapon anyway? Doesn't the state president have to write out a referendum?

Rallis: Yes, certainly. The president must agree with the referendum. But if Papandreou won the elections, he would not need a referendum, he could implement his intentions through Parliament. Moreover, a referendum is a matter for simple and not complicated problems. One can ask: Do you want to have NATO, or don't you? Do you want the European Community, or don't you? But do you want to enter the European Community and NATO--such a complicated question cannot be asked.

SPIEGEL: One could ask them separately, in two separate referenda.

Rallis: Certainly, one can also have three or four referenda, but then it would no longer be an extraordinary measure, it would be funny in the end.

SPIEGEL: At the time of its entry, Greece is particularly bitter about one European Community partner--the Federal Republic. It is giving Turkey special assistance for military purposes amounting to DM560 million, while Greece is supposed to get only DM60 million, which it turned down with thanks...

Rallis: ...while normal assistance continues, and we continue to accept it. You see, we have not accepted the special assistance offer because we considered it somewhat humiliating. It was very little, compared with the help for Turkey.

SPIEGEL: Some European Community partners fear that Greece has introduced its enmity to Turkey into the European Community.

Rallis: I can assure you that this is not the case. We will keep our quarrels with turkey on a bilateral basis.

SPIEGEL: Does not Greece hope that its new partners will support its position in the dispute with Turkey?

Rallis: We do not need support. We want to clarify our quarrels with Turkey. The most difficult point under dispute is the Aegean problem, the continental shelf, a problem that cannot be solved by talks between the two countries involved. One must find a third party, a judge, an international court. Mr Karamanlis made the Turks such a suggestion 5 years ago. They have rejected it to this date. I believe they will realize in the end that this is the only way to settle the quarrels between Greece and Turkey in a peaceful way.

SPIEGEL: What concrete advantages does Greece hope to gain economically from the Common Market?

Rallis: What all the other countries have also gained. You see, why did they join the Common Market? Because, like in the case of Germany, they gave preference to a community rather than to isolation. It is the more important for us because we are a small country and the small countries need many more friends than the big ones. Moreover, I believe that a market of 260 million is much more interesting than a market of 9 million Greeks.

SPIEGEL: What else, in addition to the European Market?

Rallis: Here for us? In the first year very much help for the development of the Greek province which is poor and needs capital.

SPIEGEL: How high should the help be?

Rallis: I believe that in the end the balance will be plus DM423 million net in the first year.

SPIEGEL: And what will Greece pay into the common budget?

Rallis: I do not know exactly, the balance in any event is DM423 million or just 3 percent of the total volume of Greece's budget, but nevertheless a great help. If we are affiliated with the EC we also expect other countries to make investments here. We need the capital and the experience of the economically better developed states.

SPIEGEL: For nothing you will get nothing. What will Greece's dowry be for the EC?

Rallis: I believe that our geographical location shows great advantages for Europe? We are a bridge to Africa and Asia. We have the best relations with African and Asian countries because we do not have a past which might deter them; that is to say, we do not have a colonial past. What we will contribute to the EC is the Greek merchant marine, which is the third largest in the world. With our accession the fleet of the community has grown spectacularly.

SPIEGEL: What about cultural affairs? During a tour of the province you said a few weeks ago that Greece also contributes its culture to the EC as an important factor.

Rallis: I did not put it that way. What I said was that to Europe, Greece's participation with its old political history constitutes a moral asset.

SPIEGEL: Did the farmers tell you about their anxieties when you were touring the province? The countryside, for instance the tobacco growers, are seized by the apprehension that they will have to destroy their stocks while the apple growers fear they will be inundated by EC apples; two examples of many. Are these anxieties not justified?

Rallis: This is not true everywhere. The farmers have comprehended now that they will get a better price for olives, for example, a bit more than last year.

SPIEGEL: Will you tell the consumers that olives as a result might become more expensive for them?

Rallis: We do have, also, a considerable increase in consumer prices even now; hence the inflation rate of 25 percent.

SPIEGEL: Must you not fear that EC assession will further crank up inflation, say, by higher prices for agricultural produce on the domestic market? At the moment this rate of 25 percent is the third highest among the OECD countries, after Turkey and Iceland.

Rallis: Yes, this is the serious problem of Greece's national economy; we must endeavor to keep the inflation rate down.

SPIEGEL: Another group haunted by worries is that of the middle-class enterprises. In the event of increasing investments by foreign countries and the modernization of large companies, they are afraid that a murderous struggle for existence will ensue in which they might perish. Does the government plan to come to their aid?

Rallis: In my opinion no problems in this respect exist. The small enterprises naturally suffer from the disadvantage that they incur greater costs than those operating with automation. But they also have the great advantage of quality. They supply products which big industry cannot offer. For example, there is no longer any industry for handwoven carpets anywhere in Europe. In Greece, however, the small enterprises will produce such carpets. They are in great demand. We will grant investment bonuses to enterprises of that kind. And we will largely be remunerated for these subsidies by the EC.

SPIEGEL: Are you not afraid that the Greeks will react with a fear of foreign infiltration if the country becomes the springboard for, say the Japanese and Arabs, who indeed can invest massively?

Rallis: This has been the case before, and we only benefitted from that. Besides, I do not believe that the foreigners harbor any illusions about Greece being an El Dorado. Granted, interesting options exist here for foreigners, too, yet we are not the promised land on which the Europeans will swoop down.

SPIEGEL: So there is no need to be afraid?

Rallis: The Japanese may perhaps be dangerous, though I do not believe that one needs to be that greatly afraid of them. And one need not be afraid of the Arabs since they are not developed, meaning they have not made such headway as to allow them to enter into competition. They will be unable to do that for many years to come.

SPIEGEL: But they have the money.

Rallis: Yes indeed, and if they want to give us the money, it would be a pleasure. We will be grateful.

SPIEGEL: The workers in Greece harbor great expectations; they visualize equal wages with their EC colleagues who currently make three times as much as they do on the average. They hope for better working conditions and social benefits, safe jobs. Can this be met?

Rallis: Once industry is better off the situation of the workers, too, will improve automatically. It is clear that the results will not become evident in the first month or in the first year. Wages, however, cannot climb at this fast pace. The wage level is lower than that of Germany, for instance, but so are the costs of living.

SPIEGEL: Aside from that, the Greek balance of payments is chronically in deficit. For the past year you expect a deficit of $2.2 billion. Are you not afraid that the reduction of tariffs and import restrictions might even worsen the situation?

Rallis: We have had trouble for 6 months, but lately the balance has been much better than was thought at the beginning of 1980. What we anticipated was $3 billion; by now we are slightly above $2 billion.

SPIEGEL: Do the social tensions currently prevalent in Greece not appear dangerous to you? The multitude of strikes...

Rallis: They are not at all threatening. I believe that the Greeks have mostly grown bourgeois. Once they comprehend that Papandreou has a Marxist socialism in mind he will have to reckon with losses rather than gains of votes.

SPIEGEL: Mr Prime Minister, thank you for this interview.

MILLIYET INTERVIEWS CENTER PARTY LEADER MAVROS

NC120725 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 6 Jan 81 p 3

["Exclusive" statements made in Athens to MILLIYET correspondent Nilufer Yalcin by Greek politicians Mavros and Kanellopoulos--date not given]

[Excerpts] Union of the Center Party leader Mavros, who was the first foreign minister in the first Karamanlis administration in 1974, made this exclusive statement to MILLIYET on Turkish-Greek relations: "Detente between Turkey and Greece who could afford to be close friends in the past, is definitely imperative, particularly in view of all the dangers haunting our area. We are both confronted with the same perils. Under these circumstances, it is indeed preposterous that we should continue to arm ourselves competitively and to harbor hostility against each other. Friendship is essential, and as far as we are concerned, no difficulties will be put in the way of the Greek Government. Therefore, this friendship can become a reality if Turkey cherishes the same intentions."

According to Mavros, Turkey consented to Greece's reintegration into NATO's military wing "as a result of current international developments. It had no other alternative from the point of view of its own defense."

Yorgo Mavros blames the arming of the islands "on the speeches and behavior" of certain Turkish politicians. Mavros interprets these speeches as "preparations for the Turkish invasion of the Greek islands," but he maintains that "such a conflict could be catastrophic." Mavros further maintains that the military field on the island of Limni "is part of NATO defense installations and has nothing to do with an operation against Turkey."

Mavros continued: "The disarmament of the islands can only be possible when threats from Turkey completely disappear, when mutual confidence is restored, and when the reasons that led to their arming no longer exist. Unless this is done, no Greek Government can pass such a decision into law."

Stating that he did not see anything complicated in "the Aegean airspace issue," Mavros gave this explanation regarding Greece's decision to maintain Greek territorial waters in the Aegean at 10, and not 6, miles: "For the time being, Greece does not intend to extend its territorial waters to 12 miles. However, we deem it useful to preserve this sovereign right."

When asked what he thought about the Cypriot issue, Mavros, who still remembers every word of the Geneva deliberations in 1974, responded: "Cyprus is no longer a bilateral issue; it is an international issue. This is why the intercommunal negotiations are being conducted under UN auspices. An understanding between Ankara and Athens is of no significance. Moreover, I do not think that a positive result will emerge from these negotiations because they have dragged on too long without yielding anything fruitful. No negotiations can be carried out on the basis of equality as long as Turkish troops are there. The north is under foreign occupation. Denktas, leader of the Turkish Cypriot sector, has no authority to negotiate on behalf of Cyprus. Such negotiations can only be held between Ankara and Kiprianou.... For a true federation to be concluded between both sides, there must be freedom of movement and of relations between both sides as well as free people. This is not possible as long as the island is under military occupation, nor is it possible economically. The Cypriot dispute could be resolved in matter of hours provided that Turkey withdraw its forces from the island. As a matter of fact, both communities are not hostile to each other."

PASOK leader Papandreou and leader of the main opposition with 94 seats in the Greek Parliament declined to see me, advancing such excuses as "I do not approve of exclusive interviews with the press" and "I am very busy."

EVREN FETES VISITING PAKISTANI PRESIDENT ZIAUL HAQ

TA122120 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 12 Sep 81

[Text] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren has given a dinner today in honor of visiting Pakistani President Ziaul Haq at the Cankaya Presidential Mansion in Ankara. In a statement during the dinner, General Evren recalled that relations between the two countries are based on historic friendship and cooperation. Pointing out that, during official talks to be held in Ankara, international and regional issues and prospects for the further promotion of Turkish and Pakistani relations would be reviewed, General Evren said that he was convinced that these deliberations would produce concrete results.

Referring to recent developments in the Middle East, General Evren said that the Arab-Israeli dispute continues to threaten peace and stability in the region and leaves the Middle East vulnerable to foreign intervention. Evren continued: This problem can only be solved by the Israeli withdrawal from all Arab lands--including Jerusalem--that it occupied following the 1967 war, and by its acceptance of all legal and inalienable Palestinian rights, including the right to form a Palestinian state.

Reiterating that traditionally Turkish foreign policy is based on respect for independence and sovereignty in international relations and for territorial integrity as well as noninterference in the internal affairs of other countries and not resorting to force or threats, equality of rights and the peaceful solution of international disputes, General Evren said: We believe in the duty of all countries, large or small, to abide by these guidelines so that peace, security and stability reigns in the world at large. Evren said that violation of these principles would threaten global peace and security and would create a climate of insecurity among countries. Pointing out that it was within this framework that Turkey assessed and reacted to the intervention in Afghanistan--with whom Turkey is linked with historic ties of friendship and brotherhood--he added that it is imperative to seek a political solution that will permit the realization of the process of self-determination for the Afghan people.

Referring to the continuing military conflict between Iran and Iraq, General Evren said that this causes concern in Turkey. He said he sincerely hopes for the peaceful solution of this problem between two Islamic countries.

In his statement, the Pakistani president expressed his happiness over his visit to Turkey. Recalling that relations between Turkey and Pakistan were rooted in history, the visiting president said that the struggle waged by Ataturk for the creation of a new Turkey has led the way for many countries, including Pakistan.

In connection with the Cyprus issue, President Haq said that the Pakistani people have always supported their Turkish brothers and that his government appreciated the efforts exerted by the Turkish Cypriot community for its just cause.

Referring to Afghanistan and the war between Iran and Iraq, General Haq said he hoped that the Islamic summit to be held this month would find a peaceful solution to disputes in the Islamic world.

OZAL LEAVES FOR LONDON TO DISCUSS BANK DEBTS

[Text] State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal flew to London today to hold talks on Turkey's debts to international commercial banks.

In a statement at Ankara's Esenboga Airport before his departure, Ozal recalled that Turkey has agreements rescheduling its debts to international commercial banks and that he is going to Britain in order to adapt these agreements to Turkey's conditions. Pointing out that the talks to be held in London constitute the first meetings to be held with international commercial banks [presumably as opposed to meetings with governments], Ozal expressed the hope that these meetings will be concluded with the agreement preventing the amassment of debts in the next few months.

In his statement, Ozal also commented on Turkey's exports and workers' remittances. Noting that compared to last year exports increased by 20 percent in September, 32 percent in October and 54 percent in November, Ozal said that December exports are expected to amount to $500 million and that this is a record for monthly exports. Explaining that workers' remittances have exceeded previous estimates, the deputy prime minister noted that foreign currency transfers are being conducted in a very positive manner.

SECURITY FORCES CAPTURE 204 'COMMUNIST' MILITANTS

[Summary] "Security forces have captured 204 high-ranking officials of the militant illegal Revolutionary Path organization [Dev-Yol] that is responsible for killing 25 persons and wounding 30 others. According to information obtained by the Ankara Security Directorate, 13 Soviet Kalashnikovs, 5 automatic weapons, 80 pistols, 12,400 rounds of ammunition, a shotgun, antiaircraft ammunition, dynamite sticks and assault and defense bombs were seized in operations conducted by the security forces. It was discovered that the organization set up businesses in many fields and that it rented luxurious apartments in numerous districts.

"According to the Directorate's information, the Dev-Yol organization can be traced to the illegal organization called the Turkish People's Liberation Party Front [THKP]. The THKP was established by Mahir Cayan and his followers. In operations conducted during 1971-72, many of the organization's members were captured. These operations were a great blow to the organization, which consequently lost its effectiveness and was dispersed."

Militants from the Ankara Association of Higher Learning [AYOD] and the Istanbul Higher Education Association [IYOD] that identified with the political views and action strategies of Mahir Cayan established an organization called the Turkish Revolutionary Youth Federation [DEV GENC]. The founders of this organization were militants who had been sentenced during 1971-72 but had later been released as a result of the general amnesty in 1974. Due to differences among its members, the organization later split into two organizations. The Ankara wing of the organization continued to function under the name Dev-Yol, whereas the Istanbul wing took the name Dev-Sol, the Revolutionary Leftist Organization. The goal of Dev-Yol was to establish a communist administration through an armed people's revolt.

About 3 months ago, security organizations planned a series of operations to expose this organization. The Hacettepe University hospital branch of the organization was chosen as the first target of these operations. Akif Akuzum, the militant responsible for this branch, and 14 of his fellow members were detained.

Based on information given by these militants,many of the organization's documents were seized. Subsequently, Metin Bakkalci, an intern responsible for the civil servants section of the organization, and Yasim (Kesenoglu), responsible for the Ankara [word indistinct] committee, were captured.

It has also been discovered that the organization was running an engineering firm in Ankara's Kavaklidere district. In a raid on an advertising agency, again run by the organization, three more militants were caught printing Dev-Yol posters. Meanwhile, businesses set up by the organization to finance and cover its operations were also discovered.

The high-ranking members caught during raids on the organization's safe houses included: Cahit Akcam, a high-ranking administrator; Mustafa Oncler, regional administrator; Murat Cavusoglu, who was responsible for the Middle East technical university; and Mehmet Ali Yilmaz, a Dev-Yol high organizational committee member and the person responsible for Ankara and Cukurova Provinces. Following the evaluation of information provided by the organization's armed struggle unit members, weapons buried in various Ankara districts were seized.

In addition to the engineering and advertising firms run by the organization, its commerical activities included marketing firms, a firm marketing fire extinguishers, accounting firms, real estate agencies, a foundry, an insurance agency, a perfumery, a coal depot, a grocery store, a recording studio, a green grocer, a quilt workshop and a nursery. Profits from these enterprises were being used to finance the organization's subversive activities. Another source of income was armed robbery.

According to information obtained from Ankara Security Directorate officials based on the confessions of the captured militants and other evidence, the organization is responsible for killing 25 persons, wounding 30 others, bombing 29 houses and business premises, three cases of arson, organizing armed robberies, forcing citizens to emigrate, and raiding offices and security force vehicles.

OIL RESERVES NEAR NUSAYBIN--An oil field has been discovered near Mardin's Nusaybin District. Minister of Energy and Natural Resources Serbulent Bingol said that oil was found at a depth of 1558 meters during oil prospecting that began on 1 October 1980 at a site 43 kms northeast of Nusaybin. He added that a further 61 meters were drilled in a layer composed of oil. He noted that work is continuing to drill deeper. Bingol said that since known oil layers in Turkey do not exceed 50 meters and since the current drilling promises a layer thicker than 61 meters, it is believed that this region has significant oil reserves. New drillings will be carried out in the region to determine the amount of the oil reserves. [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 10 Jan 81 TA]

VAN DER KLAAUW COMMENTS ON QATAR, KUWAIT VISITS

[Rob Meines report: "EEC Middle East Action Only Meaningful With Recognition of PLO"]

[Text] Schiphol, 6 January--A European initiative for peace in the Middle East has no chance of success if the EEC does not recognize the PLO as the only legal representative of the Palestinian people. Foreign Minister van der Klaauw returned to The Netherlands this morning with this message after a visit to the Gulf states of Qatar and Kuwait.

From the attitudes of these by Arab standards moderate states it seems that the EEC has made no progress with its Middle East initiative since Luxembourg Minister Gaston Thorn was sent by government leaders on a mission through the area last summer.

Nevertheless Minister van der Klaauw considers that he must go through with the European action. Now that he is chairman of the European Council of Ministers, he must travel through the Arab countries again. "You could ask what the point of this is. I would answer that it is good to get an accurate picture of what questions are important in the Middle East, what is expected of us and what is the meaning of all the terms used in the discussions, such as the Palestinians' 'inalienable rights'."

The minister admitted this morning at Schiphol that not much was to be expected of the European actions in the Middle East. "Europe is not coming with a peace plan. We cannot possibly do this and it would not be desirable," Van der Klaauw said. Also, there is at present no EEC country intending to recognize the PLO. Van der Klaauw: "That would also be in conflict with all Western policies in this field. We have said that the PLO must be involved in the negotiations; the organization is after all a fact."

In Kuwait and Qatar the European stance has led to a situation in which the authorities received the EEC chairman in a friendly manner, while at the same time the newspapers published unfriendly commentaries, strikingly similar and undoubtedly inspired from high, of the EEC stance.

Later in Qatar, Amir Shaykh Khalifah ibn Hamad Al Thani himself made it clear to The Netherlands minister that his country adheres in full to the resolutions from the Arab summit in Amman, namely: recognition of the PLO, withdrawal from the occupied areas and the restoration of Jerusalem as an Arab city. And Qatar does not even belong to the so-called Arab solidarity front, comprising Syria, Iraq, Algeria, South Yemen and the PLO.

In Kuwait and Qatar Van der Klaauw was told what for years has been the Arab position. The EEC statement that the PLO must be involved in the peace talks is seen in the Arab states merely as a first step. Van der Klaauw himself does not know if he will take a second step. "My mandate will not be fixed by the EEC until this month," he said this morning.

CORRESPONDENT ANALYZES HAIG'S POLICY PRINCIPLES

[Thomas Kielinger editorial: "The World Political Mandate"]

[Text] Alexander Haig, as the future U.S. secretary of state, will enrich the American understanding for political qualities and requirements with a few basic lessons. In this man political and military experiences converge to a synthesis suited to make him an historic secretary of state, as was said to him already by Howard Baker, the Republican floorleader in the Senate.

Haig's appearance before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee excelled, above all, in its diplomatic-dialectical brilliance. Thus, he dwelled largely on the Soviet threat and its potential consequences: that it might veritably paralyze Western policy. But when the senators assailed him with questions on whether the Europeans were doing too little for jointly counteracting the danger, he dodged the temptation and instead came out with a defense of the alliance partners unheard of in Washington for quite awhile. Europeans must be grateful to him for that. On the other hand, when he has requests to pass on to the allies, this will allow him to be more convincing in that he not only can properly assess their actual contributions, but also fairly represents these contributions to the American side.

Europeans will be making a mistake if they rest and feel safe against future American demands in the belief that for the future they have an important expert on their worries and political conditions in the State Department. Haig will not grant them this comfort. His strategy is plainly visible. He is trying to eliminate from the internal alliance debate everything that exhausts itself in fruitless frictions--for example, who is doing more or less than the other by a specific date. Instead, he concentrates fully on the long-term prospects; namely, what he refers to as the "management" of Soviet power, then the need for economic coordination, the joint duty to ensure the raw material bases in the Middle East and so forth. It is especially because he knows the European scene, because he was trained in Europe in the modes of thinking of the old continent, that Haig is aware of the alliance partners must be confronted with the strategically important issues instead of dissipating one's energies in petty quarrels.

It is indeed not flattery that matters. Rather Haig wishes to maintain maneuvering room in Europe and the good will of the Europeans because he starts off with hard truths. There will be no headway in the disarmament talks for a long time. The Soviets will be confronted with an iron rule of international behavior: mutuality. Aggressiveness will no longer be rewarded with lucrative technology deals.

Regarding a philosophical substantiation, Haig has oriented himself via the early Kissinger, author of "Big Power Diplomacy--The State Art of Castlereagh and Metternich" (1960). There is a sentence right in the beginning which Kissinger had to experience bitterly as the secretary of state: "Every time when the preservation of peace ... was the supreme aim of a state or a group of states, the fate of the international system depended on the most reckless member of the international community." Haig goes on to say: "It does not help our commitment to peace much if we leave the right of taking military action to the most reckless member of the international community... There are more important things than "being at peace."

This is one of the explanations why Kissinger will not necessarily play the role in the new government which one prematurely attached to him abroad. Henry Kissinger is considered a politician who pushed aside the clairvoyant insights of his early academic life in his political years in office, agreeing with the Russians on a detente concept that was based more on the illusion of good conduct than on factual guarantees. Haig was not always in harmony with his mentor Kissinger. They had a sharp dispute over the Vietnam issue. The general advocated at an early stage a harder and more determined approach.

Haig did not call for the priority of military policy over diplomacy at all. On the contrary: "Diplomacy is the core of American effectiveness abroad," he said, adding that "our military foundation supports our credibility." "Our credibility is based on a daily reliable depiction of our policy on an international level."

Reliability is equally valid for the allies, the Third World and the adversaries. It encourages (existing and potential) friends. And it deters adversaries from adventures. Haig shows no hurry to achieve agreements with the Soviets. The basis of such agreements, one's own strength, is more important for him at present. That will create some headaches for the NATO partners.

To this new strategy belongs the admission that America can no longer carry along the burden of responsibility, that it must weld together a consensus of the free nations, including the authoritarian regimes of the Third World which the Carter administration though it could discard 4 years ago as being "strategically insignificant."

After the confusion of the Carter years and the frequent abrupt changes, a team will appear now which is united with regard to strategic perspective. UN Ambassador Prof Jeane Kirkpatrick, Al Haig, Security Adviser Allen--these personalities represent the world political mandate Ronald Reagan acquired on 4 November for his policy.

DEVELOPMENT AID PROGRAM FOR PRC CONTEMPLATED

[Text] Bonn, 13 Jan (DPA)--The Federal Government is planning, for the first time, a development aid program for the People's Republic of China. Rainer Offergeld, federal minister for economic cooperation, told the press in Bonn on Monday evening that talks on a framework agreement on technical cooperation are now taking place between the two sides. He said that Bonn is not thinking of capital aid because Beijing is quite able to raise necessary funds on the money markets outside the framework of development aid.

Offergeld said that Bonn has already promised Beijing 100 long-term and 30 short-term grants for Chinese students in the Federal Republic. There are also "initial, non-binding agreements" to help China establish a patents system. A scheme for experts to support the Chinese State Planning Commission and to assist the Chinese with a management center is also planned.

About a year ago, the OECD's Development Committee included China in the list of developing countries. At the same time, the OECD stated that aid programs for Beijing must not be at the expense of other developing countries.

PREMIER RAYMOND BARRE SPEAKS AT COLLOQUIUM

Defends Economic Policies

[Excerpts] "The year 1981 will be difficult.... The crisis is neither French nor even European, it is worldwide. It is not a superficial and short crisis. It is a profound and lasting crisis," Mr Barre stated at a colloquium organized by L'EXPANSION on 8 January.

"Faced with this situation," he continued, "all our partners have decided to fight inflation as a matter of priority and gradually to improve their external accounts. They have all rejected the idea of engaging in a policy aimed at stimulating economic activities which would be dangerous and whose consequences would in the short run be catastrophic. This is why you cannot expect any improvement in economic activity in the Western World before the second half of 1981 and maybe not even before the beginning of 1982.

"Price increases gradually will moderate. A considerable slowing down of increases in nominal incomes will be a prerequisite for this," the premier added. "Uncontrolled wage increases during the second quarter of 1980 will have badly affected price fluctuations. I believe that in 1981 the increase in the total amount of wages paid--with manpower at a constant level--should under no circumstances outstrip price increases, and this is deemed to be a maximum."

Mr Barre detailed what inspires him with confidence in the future: The energy program, modernization of industry, development of agriculture, progress in the scientific and technical spheres, reduction in excessive liquidity in the economic spheres, control of public finances, setting social security to rights, workers' effectiveness and moderation and firmness of the franc.

"I feel sure that France has taken a decisive turn for its future," Mr Barre also stated.

Should a much harsher economic policy have been pursued since the March 1978 parliamentary elections? The premier replied negatively to this question and explained his attitude:

"What is the problem any French Government has to face? It is the problem of the arrival on the labor market of 250,000 able persons every year. When you talk about strict measure, you mean deflationary measures. It is not difficult to take deflationary measures. You can always restrict public expenditure and increase taxes. What would be the unavoidable consequence of this? A large-scale increase in unemployment. It is impossible to inflict on France a deflationist cure, which will make France's problems of unemployment much worse."

Mr Barre later explained that not only did he not take any deflationary measures but that, on the contrary, he has systematically tried to support economic activity and encourage the creation of jobs. "This policy has a drawback. Its result is that the rate of price increases has declined much more slowly than we might have expected. Iy should be realized that, in my opinion, it would have been possible to reduce the rate of price increases by two points, that is from 9.5 percent to 7.5 percent, if we had pursued a much stricter policy with respect to economic activity. Therefore, I am willing to accept the criticisms directed at myself that our policy has not been harsh enough. But, I repeat, it should be realized that unemployment would have become even worse as a result."

Comments on Libyan Oil Deal

[Text] Questioned during L'EXPANSION's forum 8 January about ELF-Aquitaine's prospecting and production contract in Libya, Raymond Barre replied:

"What has happened? A French oil company, ELF-Aquitaine, is seeking to diversify its supply sources and, of course, is trying to obtain prospecting permits in the most diverse regions of the world. Such prospecting can be carried out in Libya and the ELF-Aquitaine company has applied for permits" which falls within "the framework of the company management's responsibilities."

However, Mr Barre added, "these permits have been granted at a time when the situation in Africa is prompting the French Government to ask a number of questions and to show some reservations. That is why the French Government wishes to examine the problems and to reserve its judgment on the particular question of these permits."

POLL SHOWS BARRE 'HARSHLY' ASSESSED BY PUBLIC

LD140907 Paris LE MATIN in French 9 Jan 81 p 5

[Excerpt] Some 61 percent of the French people would not like to retain Raymond Barre as premier if Valery Giscard d'Estaing is reelected for a further 7-year term. This opinion poll, which was carried out 20-26 November, involved 1,000 people. The French people interviewed by SOFRES on behalf of L'EXPANSION harshly assess the policy pursued by the premier since 1976. They believe that it is in line with "capitalist" (33 percent), "conservative" (25 percent) and "planned economy" (23 percent) principles.

The majority believes that the situation has deteriorated in the past 4 years--especially with respect to employment (80 percent), prices (85 percent), economic growth (59 percent), standard of living (58 percent) and even the franc (42 percent).

However, many people believe that further development has been achieved in pace-setting sectors and technologies in France. Asked what measures, in their opinion, will be the most effective in dealing with the crisis, 70 percent of the French people interviewed stated that they believe that prices should again be frozen, total freedom of prices being deemed "rather ineffective."

NATIONAL NAVY SET TO HELP TRAIN, EQUIP SAUDIS

[Excerpts] The French Navy temporarily is to second 165 regular officers to ensure the implementation of an agreement concluded with Saudi Arabia in October, providing for the supply of 6 ships and 24 helicopters to that country.

In the latest edition of the National Navy weekly COLS BLEUS, Chief of Staff Adm Jean Lannuzel emphasizes that "the National Navy, whose role in negotiations concerning this agreement is of determining importance, is to play an essential role in its implementation. The navy will have to carry a large burden as a result...but if is a question for France of a major industrial and commercial program whose consequences will be beneficial to our country and its navy."

Estimated at FR14.4 billion, this naval agreement between Saudi Arabia and France was negotiated by Mr Gerard Hibon, director of the International Affairs Department at the Defense Ministry, with the active assistance of Rear Adm Roger Sabatier, the present chief of the Equipment Department of the Navy General Staff.

The Franco-Saudi agreement provides for the purchase of 4 frigates equipped with Otomat surface-to-surface missile launchers (with a 160 km range), 2 oil supply ships and 24 Dauphin helicopters equipped with AS-15 air-to-surface missiles.

A proportion of the total amount of the agreement--estimated at FR1.2 billion--has been earmarked for the training of Saudi crews and of the technical personnel who are to operate the equipment acquired by Riyadh.

The French Navy plans temporarily to second 45 officers (that is, 1 French naval officer in 100) and 120 petty officers, who are naval NCO's (that is, 1 petty officer in 240). This means that the National Navy, in fact, is responsible for the creation of a Saudi navy.

CONTRACT SIGNED TO SELL 30 ALPHA-JETS TO EGYPT

[Text] The signing of a contract to supply Egypt with 30 Alpha-jet twin-jet fighter planes was announced in Paris on Friday 9 January by the private Dassault-Breguet company.

Egypt will be the ninth country to use the Alpha-jet, a French-West German-built two-seater plane which can be used for advanced pilot training and for giving ground troops tactical support. The Egyptian Alpha-jet, at the client's request, will have a strengthened structure and wings to carry weapons (guns and rockets).

The deal was won by the French industries (Dassault and the National Aircraft Engine Design and Construction Company) despite strong competition from the British who were offering their Hawk aircraft. Egypt already has 28 Mirage-III fighter planes whose purchase was financed by Saudi Arabia.

So far, excluding the Egyptian order, the Alpha-jet has been sold to France (175 planes), the FRG (175), Belgium (33), Morocco (24), Nigeria (12), the Ivory Coast (6), Qatar (6), and Togo (5). It now is being offered to the U.S. Navy which plans to purchase training aircraft.

LE MONDE ON LIBYA'S 'VEILED ANNEXATION' OF CHAD

[Editorial: "What Security in Africa?"]

[Text] Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi probably did not expect the plan for a Chadian-Libyan "merger" to spark off such a storm of protest in the West and in Africa, even after Tripoli's troops intervened in the streets of Ndjamena. After all, previous union experiments launched by the Libyan Jamahiriya have never succeeded and Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi's interference in the internal affairs of African and Arab "fraternal states" has succeeded only in alienating partners who have quickly become reticient while costing him a great deal of energy and money.

This time, and this explains, at least partly, the strength of the reactions, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi is trying to unite his country to a sub-Saharan state in the most vast and vulnerable part of the continent. Unification, which would be difficult to impose on structured states with rich traditions like Tunisia or Egypt, smacks strongly of annexation when "proposed" to a crippled southern neighbor which is in no position to refuse. In these circumstances, whatever Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi says, it is a threat to the security of states already grappling with their ethnic problems and the fragility of their borders.

In this part of Africa, it just takes a gentle push to spark off "destabilization" and Libya can easily look like a giant here. In January 1977, a mere group of mercenaries led by Bob Denard made the Benin People's Republic tremble by launching a raid on its capital. The following year, the same adventurer, heading just 50 men, succeeded in overthrowing Ali Soilih's regime in the Comoro Islands.

With the possible exception of Nigeria, which formerly succeeded in overthrowing the bloody Biafran war of secession and which is a military-oil complex, no independent African state can feel safe from foreign military intervention based on a local rebel faction's frequently dubious claim to "legitimacy."

The OAU, which will discuss the Chad situation again in Lome on Monday, has made several attempts to police the continent by setting up a pan-African deterrent force. However, this plan, drawn up by weak and divided states, has never taken shape.

When they deem it necessary, the OAU member states therefore resorted to allies outside the continent, in some cases France, in others Cuba or the Soviet Union, whose respective interventions could only further divide the continent's "sister nations." Indeed, each country has tried to obtain its guarantees wherever it could.

In revealing his ambitions rather too openly--ambitions observed by many African countries--Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi has demonstrated that an OAU member state, equipped in addition with a big arsenal, can take advantage of a set of circumstances--and in the case in point, of the inconsistency of French policy--to install himself in a neighboring country in the throes of anarchy.

"By what right is France talking about Chad?" Tripoli asks in the communique with which it made a strongly-worded reply to its "condemnation" by Paris. Many African states are asking the same question about the attitude adopted by a fellow African state, namely Libya. However, the precedent set by the "unions" in which Libya has gone astray should not worry them inordinately and they know that the principle of the inviolability of borders consecrated by the OAU will be dealt a harsh blow by the veiled annexation of Chad by the Libyan "big brother."

AFP REPORTS EXPLOSION IN NUCLEAR POWERPLANT

[Text] Paris, 13 Jan (AFP)--An explosion occurred today at the Tricastin nuclear power station south of Lyons, central France, but caused "no serious consequences," the French Nuclear Power Authority announced.

The explosion occurred in an annex working on only chemical by-products and not uranium, the operating company Eurodip said.

First tests showed that there were no atomic leaks or contamination, Eurodip added, stating that there were also no casualties and that the plant continued to function normally.

It is too early to determine the cause of the accident, a Eurodip spokesman said.

KIDNAPPED JUDGE D'URSO PROVED STILL ALIVE

[Text] Rome, 13 Jan (AFP)--Just 20 minutes before the expiration of their latest deadline, the Red Brigades provided proof today that kidnapped Judge Giovanni D'Urso was still alive late yesterday. The proof came in a handwritten message from the judge found in a dustbin (garbage can) near the Chamber of Deputies in central Rome after a telephone tip-off to the newspaper L'AVANTI.

The undated message, covering three pages and wrapped in a copy of L'AVANTI, [word indistinct] the publisher of the socialist daily newspaper for printing statements by terrorists in the maximum-security jails at Palmi and Trani. The Red Brigades had demanded general press publication of the statements in exchange for the judge's life.

In the message, Judge D'Urso said he had seen and heard his daughter, Loredana, Monday night as she read the communiques on television.

He also wrote: "If I am killed, kiss my wife for me."

Antiterrorist police forces had seized the message, sources at L'AVANTI said, and the newspaper did not have the text of the letter. L'AVANTI, in publishing other messages, went against a government hard-line policy.

Observers considered that the latest message was not necessarily another gesture toward the press to get newspapers to publish the communiques, in that a message from kidnapped former Christian Democrat Party Chief Aldo Moro had been sent to his wife five days before his assassination on May 9, 1978.

Judge D'Urso, 49, a high-ranking Justice Ministry magistrate with responsibility for jailed terrorists, was kidnapped near his home on the evening of December 12.

The deadline of 1300 GMT today, set yesterday, threatened his "immediate execution" if the Red Brigades' conditions were not met. It passed without any further communication from the judge's captors.

When police picked up the latest message, the Radical Party radio was continuing the uninterrupted broadcast of a recording of Loredana D'Urso's television appearance last night.

Speaking in a strained monotone, tripping over certain words or phrases, Miss D'Urso read out the communiques of the prisoners at Palmi, including phrases such as "the butcher D'Urso, justly (?sentenced) to death."

PCI LEADERS REPORT TO CENTRAL COMMITTEE SESSION

Napolitano 7 Jan Report

LD131141 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 8 Jan 81 pp 8-9

[Unattributed report on PCI Secretariat member Giorgio Napolitano report to the PCI Central Committee on 7 January: "The Party's Problems in the Present Political Phase"]

[Excerpts] The connection between the reform and development of our own organization and a positive solution to the crisis undermining the democratic institutions now strikes us as clearer and more pressing, Napolitano said.

First, the question of terrorism has returned to the forefront. Despite the harsh blows dealt to the armed party and the breaches which have appeared in it, the subversive attack on the democratic regime and on civilian life has been resumed in savage forms which are also based on underlying political calculations, to exploit the mistakes and uncertainties which have developed among the political forces. The government's decision to give way to the initial demands made by Judge D'Urso's kidnappers was a grave matter. General Galvaligi's life was brutally ended; the kidnapped magistrate's life has been tied to unacceptable blackmail. A new and deep disquiet has spread among public opinion.

However, the eruption and interweaving in reality and in the minds of millions of Italians of the moral question, the question of the south, and the state question prompted us to indicate forcefully, as the precondition for saving the republic, the need to give the country a new political leadership and to define a real democratic alternative. We were guided by our acute perception of the present dangers of perpetuating a system of power which is already the source of such serious failures--the conviction that it is impossible to remedy those failures and avert those dangers by proposing simple compromises in the method of government and alternations in the main government responsibilities while remaining within the framework of the old political solutions and concepts.

To prevent the emergence of authoritarian suggestions and maneuvers to distort the Constitution, it is essential to make an effective change in government methods, in the method of conceiving and exercising power, and in relations among the parties, state and society, while fully reaffirming the Constitution's principles and line and introducing reforms and measures capable of guaranteeing the correct and efficient running of institutions.

The Alternative We Are Proposing

Napolitano remarked that with regard to these requirements the DC has once again adopted reticent and negative attitudes. Hence the PCI's extremely clear condemnation of DC's inability to ensure the improvement and reform of public life and political leadership in our country, and hence the proposal for a government which no longer hinges on that party which now lacks the political and moral authority necessary to seek the nation's mobilization and effort in a period of acute tension and difficulty and to reestablish the relationship of trust between the people and the democratic institutions.

The alternative which we are proposing, Napolitano said, is not based on the prejudiced exclusion of any possibility of change in the DC nor on a crudely simplified view of the reality which the DC represents, but on the conviction that the party's aspiration to maintain a dominant position and impose its own preclusions must be opposed practically and with determination.

Therefore, we are acting, in opposition, as the vital reference point for preventing the legitimate and deep disquiet which has spread throughout the country from turning into a rejection of the democratic system; we are standing as the guarantor of critical opposition to and struggle against the degeneration which has arisen in our political system; we are portraying ourselves as the "instigators and best guarantors" of a new government composition; and we are introducing a strong element of initiative and dynamism into our party's policy. In other words, we feel we must take action to prevent the Italian situation from becoming deadlocked and being exposed to serious regression, and to open it to new developments in democratic dialectics and to new government solutions.

Whatever our existing and future parliamentary position, that does not mean that we exempt ourselves from joint responsibility by all the constitutional forces in affirming basic democratic principles and values, in defending our institutions and freedom against terrorism, and in ensuring the democratic system's proper functioning.

Forlani needed to remind others, not us, of this joint responsibility. Splits and divisions emerged in the majority and the government following Judge D'Urso's kidnapping. The underhand and petty maneuvers in the southern earthquake zone have come from DC groups, while our party has from the start been committed and remains more than ever committed to behaving responsibly and in a unified spirit.

However, the task which we have set ourselves is that of working for a democratic alternative according to the line laid down by the Directorate and the Central Committee.

We must know what that involves for our party. We must highlight and assert our originality and our best qualities in order to safeguard Italian democracy's originality and future. We must contribute to a new combination and unity of leftwing and democratic forces on the basis of a joint commitment to change, since this is the only way to exert pressure on the DC, without being subjected to the preclusions, dilatory tactics and the reactionary positions which are constantly taken by that party and its leadership group, in order to implement the hypothesis of a new government composition.

However, this is not an easy path. Our party must make an effort comparable to the effort made in the most difficult and significant periods through which we have lived. This must above all be an effort aimed at increasing our capacity to make policy, to advance proposals and to govern ; and increasing our presence and activity among the masses and in relations with other parties, people's movements and organizations, and with various social and cultural circles. In doing this we must link moral questions and policy questions, and points in programs on which to seek substantial convergence, in keeping with the Central Committee's indications in early November which have already partly been translated into specific initiatives.

Such an effort implies checks, corrections and innovations with regard to the present state of our party. In addition, we must constantly be able to pose the problem of the "coherent relationship"--as Comrade Natta defined it many years ago--"between the historico-political moment, the tasks it requires and the party." Today this task is precisely the need for the party's consistent adaptation to this particular grave historico-political moment in which we have to act in Italy and the world, the new developments our strategy is assuming and the task which we have decided to take on. The essential characteristics of the "new party" defined by Togliatti remain stronger than ever for us--its national impact, the commitment to positive, constructive government action and not merely criticism and propaganda, its mass and people's orientation.

However, it should be pointed out that, with regard to the building of Togliatti's "new party," unprecedented and far-reaching problems have built up and are now arising--problems connected with the choice of "Eurocommunism," and with the affirmation of our party as an integral part of the European left and a force which can make a decisive contribution to avert a crisis in the republic and democracy in Italy, to break the deadlock in the political situation and to open up new government prospects.

More than 18 months ago the 15th congress defined a wide framework for these problems and a line which is still fully valid. Since then the serious developments in the international situation and in relations between the two superpowers, the result of the U.S. presidential election, the risks of the arms race being stepped up and bloc politics becoming more rigid, and the effects that might have on Italian politics, have given greater importance to our commitment to and cooperation with the other European leftwing forces in favor of detente and a more autonomous position and initiative from Western Europe. Our task here, in connection with the new and complex developments and changes in society and the Italian political situation, has also become more urgent in every respect.

In this connection, we intend to check the extent to which the lines laid down by the 15th congress, with regard to the party's organization among other things, have been implemented and how new progress can be made.

All the democratic parties, Napolitano stated, ought now to express a strong spirit of seeking and of a real readiness to reform and improve themselves. The stakes are very high. The crisis in relations between parties and masses, the electorate and society, cannot be irresponsibly disregarded or underestimated and must be tackled without petty attempts at self-preservation. It is true that we are facing a campaign which attacks the parties' role in an indiscriminate and destructive way, blaming them for all the country's ills, and aimed at falsely involving the PCI in a harsh picture of the so-called party system. This leads to concealment of the responsibility of economic forces and the various power centers; and at the same time an attempt is made to confuse and merge all the parties in the coarse and deceiving categories of "establishment" or "state" --a faceless and unlimited state.

However, it is impossible to respond to this campaign, fueled by the real degeneration which has occurred in public life and by the government parties' tendency to hide it, merely with accusations of scandal-mongering, and by adopting a persecuted attitude as the DC is doing; and we do not intend to react solely by dissociating ourselves from that degeneration.

We are not only concerned with refuting the distorted attitude taken toward us but also with contributing to a proper revival of the role of parties in general as a vital element in the continuity and development of democratic life. And we are invoking not only our party's moral qualities but also its other special characteristics, in order to use them in the general interest of surmounting the complex and insidious crisis being experienced by our democratic system.

Furthermore, some of our "special characteristics" are being tested by the changes that have taken place in the Italian situation, and our party must manage to draw innovative conclusions from these changes, by what it is and what it does.

Napolitano pointed out that the crisis of relations between the parties and society, or the crisis of particular party experiments or "models", is linked not only to degenerative phenomena and not only to the Italian problem. The issue of democracy--and of the relationship between democracy and social change--is an open one throughout the West.

Moral Issue and Parties' Crises

Indeed, there have been particularly serious tendencies in Italy--the Defense Intelligence Service-Pecorelli affair provided a disturbing emlbematic synthesis of these--to idenity the ruling party of over three decades with the state apparatus; and for the DC and--to differing extents and in differing circumstances--its government allies, to make arbitrary use of power, with serious consequences. These are seen in out-and-out corruption, in the decline of local administrations and the pollution of the state's most delicate bodies, and in the alteration of constitutional balances, and the relationships among the various democratic powers, primarily to the detriment of Parliament's role.

Moreover, these degenerative phenomena are closely linked to the proliferation of power currents and groups within certain parties, primarily the DC, and to the extreme virulence that has developed in factional struggles.

These issues demand moral reform and revision by parties or leadership groups which have hitherto held a profoundly distorted view of politics and of the administration of public affairs. And of course, beyond the hesitant acknowlegements and undertakings from DC or other party leaders which we have seen so far, there must be a change in the country's leadership.

Changes which Parliament can adopt in various fields are also important--such as introducing new and more incisive controls over the public financing of the parties, which could become an important tool for moralizing their internal life.

We can state that another important element is the example, the stimulus and the battle of our own party; this is the contribution that we are already making by virtue of some of our undeniable characteristics. Nobody can deny the significance of the existence of a major party not split into opposing factions, not torn by struggles among currents and not affected by the attendant degenerations; but committed, within total autonomy and honesty--despite the lies which reappear from time to time--to a major effort to be self-financing.

Nevertheless, Napolitano added, the crisis of the parties, which has now been a topic of debate for many years in all democratic Western countries, is now much more widespread. It is linked to the major issue of governability and democracy, the formation of consensus and decision-making in a "complex society", and more specifically now in an advanced capitalist country forced to come to terms with the new contradictions that have emerged in economic development on a national and world scale following a long period of intensive expansion and growth of the "state of prosperity."

Napolitano said that the ideological force of attraction that has always characterized our party is now entrusted essentially to its ability to bring to life the most lofty elements of the theoretical and historical heritage which we invoke, in the battles that we are waging here in Italy and in the prospects that we are indicating for our country. We know that in other periods the influence, attraction and inspiration that emerged from battles waged elsewhere and from the successes of what we used to describe as the "socialist camp" were so great as to obscure our own organization's shortcomings and defects especially in southern Italy. Now we cannot rely on stimuli and appeals of that kind.

Regeneration of Working Style

On the other hand, in view of the decline of any kind of, not only mythical but even simplistic and static, view of the reality of the socialist countries, we must--partly through our party's mass education activity--work toward a full assimilation by Communist Party members of our method of analysis, of our historical and critical judgements on those realities and of our reflection on the history of the communist movement. We must express a broader and more open view of socialism, within which to place not only the transformations carried out in those countries and not canceled out by the contradictions and distortions which accompanied them, not only the results of the major revolutionary and national liberation movements, but also--and on an equal footing--all the gains in terms of liberation and progress achieved by the Italian, European and Western workers movement.

For some time we have been pursuing a new internationalism, no longer restricted to the ideological confines to which some others would still like to restrict it, but based on the major inseparable objectives of peace, disarmament and the development of the countries long subjected to imperialist exploitation and now grappling either poverty and famine. Our party is committed to contributing to action for these major objectives with full autonomy and with intensive international initiatives. Our initiative takes place primarily in Western Europe, in our quest to find here, in accordance with the Eurocommunist inspiration, new paths for transformation in a socialist direction; it takes place specifically on the political plane within the European Parliament to which, as Italian Communists, we make a contribution that is too little known and acknowledged by our party as a whole.

But what must be changed and renewed in the nature and methods of our organization, so as to increase the party's attractiveness, especially among young people? We must tackle these problems, Napolitano said, while always bearing in mind the situation of our sections, their present difficulties, and taking care to open the way to an extension of the active framework and to a real development of the section's role. It is on this that the growth of the party and of its policy depend. And the line to be pursued is that of a determined regeneration of working habits and leadership methods at all levels, the elimination of confusions and overlaps in party structures, the elimination of stifling forms of ritualism and bureaucratism, and a qualitative leap forward in the development of the party's democratic life. These are the pointers that have emerged from the debates conducted at the many meetings of the Central Committee's Fifth Commission and at several regional and provisional meetings and from the pages of RINASCITA, since November.

We are tackling these problems without fear, Napolitano pointed out, because even now we do not fear comparison with other parties; political debate takes place within our ranks not only in absolute freedom but without being influenced or distorted by the logics and struggles of currents. Despite the shortcomings which we ourselves emphasize, sour party has a broader grass roots democratic life than any other party and our organization, starting with the conduct of our enrollment campaign, is transparent and open to outside observers and to the researchers who are involved, with our help, in a quest for knowledge and effort of critical investigation parallel to our own.

It is with great objectivity and sincerity, therefore, that we say that we must free ourselves from everything which impoverishes and constricts party life, threatening to devitalize debate within our ranks and hindering the circulation of ideas, information and experiences and the prompt taking of decisions and initiatives. There must be a vigorous shift in the approach to and conduct of meetings and discussions in various forums, in the approach to section meetings, and in the functioning of the leadership bodies. I say "shift," Napolitano added, because I have in mind the strength of the inertia that prompts the party to continue with old habits and schemes and that over the past 18 months has delayed the implementation of various indications issued by the congress concerning our organization.

Of course, it is a matter not only of working habits but also of party structures, the formation of cadres and democratic will. Nevertheless, working habits are important, as are the pointers concerning methods. Indeed, there must be an out-and-out-effort to apply the rules.

New Methods at Meetings

The repetitiveness of meetings, the prolixity and generality--in fact the inconclusiveness of discussions, and the abstractness and abstruseness of a jargon which entirely fails to reflect any effort of cultural research, discourage many forces from becoming involved in party life and even party membership, prevent us from using skilled energies, which we certainly do not lack, and deflect us from our objective of a broader development of our political and mass initiative. In all forums--except at congress times and other times of general analysis and reflection--we must aim at restricted and specific agendas and cogent reports and speeches, which will permit real comparisons of ideas, opinions and proposals, avoiding long-windedness and time wasting. This must apply to section meetings but also to meetings of leadership bodies, among which I will mention the federation committees, many of which betray signs of erosion and neglect--and not by chance.

Even the connection between debate and action can be correctly resolved only if debates are made truly conclusive--and only thus can the implementation of decisions subsequently be verified. All this undoubtedly prompts a reflection on how we have selected our cadres and composed our leadership bodies over the years.

Regeneration in this field--including officials among the cadres--and throughout the party has been very broad and there is no need to emphasize the positive contribution it has made. Nevertheless, some imbalances have occurred, which in part still have to be resolved and which stemmed from problems which we underestimated to some extent--imbalances in the social and professional composition of the leadership bodies and apparatus, especially in the south, tending toward a reduced representation of workers cadres and more generally of cadres connected with production or with a production background, and imbalances in relations among different generations and experiences, among which the necessary harmony has not always been guaranteed.

Napolitano said that regional committees must concentrate their efforts of ideological formulation and active intervention in certain fields characterized by an unquestionable regional dimension--economic policy and planning pointers, agricultural policy, health, and other areas to be indicated by the Central Committee--and in these fields direct links with the zone committees must be attempted, without any duplication of working committees or relative officials at federation level.

This must also be borne in mind in links between the center of the party, the regional committees and federations. Furthermore, an examination must be made--perhaps by the Central Committee's Fifth Commission--of the party center's funcional methods in relation to the partial reorganization suggested by the congress and adopted following the 1978 elections. Indeed, certain problems have remained unresolved and satisfactory solutions have not yet been reached with regard to both the division of leadership work between center and periphery and the coordination of work at the center itself. Of course, this examination must not exclude the functioning methods of the national executive and leadership bodies and the relations established among them.

Next, Napolitano noted that it is not difficult to see the close correlation that exists between the simplification of structures and the regeneration of working habits and methods and a more substantial development of the party's democracy. Let us reassert in this connection, he said, certain pointers issued by the congress, whose implementation must be verified and fully guaranteed; a correct relationship between executive and leadership bodies, preventing the former--federal secretariats, for instance--from depriving the latter of authority; a correct relationship among leadership apparatus and bodies and among officials and other cadres, making best use of those who opt for full-time party activity and involve themselves in an effort to improve both political and cultural aspects of their own work, but also aiming at an increasing contribution from voluntary cadres, without limiting within the apparatus the process of selecting and promoting new party leadership forces. However, these matters must be placed in a more general context. The time has come to take an overall leap forward in the party's democratic life.

Indeed, we believe that a stronger upward flow has become essential, partly in order to obtain contributions of information about and acquaintance with the country's situation and what is happening within a varied and multifaceted society such as ours, which otherwise is in danger of being lost to the party center. We believe that the involvement of an increasing part of our organizations and members in the process of forming the party's political decisions has become a precondition for an enrichment of our policy and for its real development in terms of initiative and specific and consistent action. The experience of the period after to the 1976 elections shows this clearly.

The necessary consensus with the party's policy and a combative mobilization of our forces, a firm and tenacious commitment to combat the resistances and reactions prompted by our policy, and a contribution from the best energies at our disposal--all this cannot be achieved now if the policy line appears to originate from above, if the support of the party grassroots is only sought after the fact, and unless the debate is transformed into a form of involvement in the decisionmaking machinery.

This issue must be dealt with without demagoguery but with courage and effective measures. We propose that, on the basis of the innovations introduced into the rules by the congress, especially the article which stresses the right of every party organization "to adopt a stance on all domestic and foreign policy issues," a campaign be waged to make section meetings end with the approval of brief documents, and that the examination of these documents first by the zone committees and federations and the communication also to the central party bodies, of the resulting stances and proposals be guaranteed. We propose that--while acknowledging the need for the Directorate and Central Committee to adopt without delay all stances of a pressing nature--in other cases a special form of consultation be tried out, submitting a proposal to debate first by simultaneous special meetings of all the federal committees and then to the Central Committee for a decision.

The broader and more substantial development of our party democracy is bound to mark a new phase in our conception and practice of democratic centralism.

Gramsci himself taught us to see democratic centralism as a "formula" which has not unexpectedly lent itself "to many interpretations"--how different our party's interpretation from that of other communist parties--and that it must be "interpreted and continuously adapted to requirements." It is a formula designed to govern the life of a major mass party of struggle such as ours, not an ideological badge, and we are now keen to emphasize its democratic content.

A real expansion of involvement in the process of forming our policy and decisions will enable us to approach more forcefully and with a greater chance of positive results the questions of conduct and the sense of responsibility, commitment to and discipline in action and conduct to be observed by individual members and party organizations.

The very conduct of an efficient and incisive leadership by the national leadership bodies, such as to lead to a real and broad mobilization of the party, demands more widespread involvement, which in turn demands a more flexible debate within our Central Committee and prompter action by it with respect to problems as they arise.

For a long time we, unlike other communist parties, have been publicizing our debates; but their specificity and transparency would definitely be greater if we managed to define their terms and to return more often and by less general approaches to a number of issues, presenting alternative proposals on certain points. We cannot be satisfied with the way in which the Central Committee still functions, despite the quality of many of our debates, or with the very way--inevitably so broad after over 4 years--in which we are forced to deal with party problems.

Our rules specify that the federal commissions and Central Control Commission must report annually on the state of the party, as they do and as they should, going into the merits of situations and supplying information and the fruits of critical reflection; but the federal committees and the Central Committee should not wait years before returning to these issues. By dealing with them more frequently they could from time to time isolate and thoroughly investigate some of them.

We must move toward this method in connection with all topics and make the Central Committee set an example of how to debate more incisively and to reach conclusions even without a unanimous vote, while at the same time excluding any kind of splittist degeneration and facilitating a better acquaintance throughout the party with the decisions taken or still to be reached.

Attilio Esposto Address

[Unattributed report on PCI Central Committee Member Attilio Esposto 8 January address to Central Committee]

[Text] It really is to be hoped, Attilio Esposto said, that this Central Committee and Central Control Commission session will begin the realization of the "shift" so fully discussed in the opening report. This poses a question of method concerning what supervisory functions we want to and must exercise so as to lend operative substance to the conclusions reached following broad political debate. The problem of supervision and control, of the correspondence that must be achieved between pointers and realizations is still a problem of political leadership. And now more than ever, it is a key aspect of the validity of the criteria of democracy which we say we must make the foundation of our existence as a party and of our approach to politics.

The tasks of supervising what we are now discussing and deciding must be included among the broader guarantees of the leap forward in the party's decisionmaking process for which we are hoping. In this connection, one particularly delicate and in any case very important matter is the Central Committee's performance of its duties, already discussed at the 15th congress, which is now fully evident within an overall assessment of the party's problems.

In this connection, I would raise a point concerning observance of party rules--which is not merely a formal matter but one which, moreover, embodies aspects that can be regarded as connected with guaranteeing relations between the center of the party and peripheral organizations, between the Directorate and Secretariat and Central Committee, and, at the same time, with the transparency in Italy of our party's relations with the other political forces and other organizations of society and, outside our country, with the other workers and communist parties and with parties, movements and organizations of the European left.

We have had to note more than once that the Central Committee's specific tasks have not been carried out and the Central Committee's collegial responsibilities have either not been exercised or not exerted promptly enough. I am among those who approve the stances of the 27 November Directorate resolution, which I consider a logical development of our general policy and, at the same time, new regarding the terms of a most important turning point and of a further extraordinary struggle and political initiative effort. But this does not mean that decision had to be presented, discussed and taken by the Central Committee.

In gaining innovations in the way the party is and acts, we have a duty to wage a battle to surmount the opaque and indecipherable areas of the political debate, especially among certain party leaders, which have been and still are an element of unclarity or of laborious mediations that have delayed and not infrequently prevented the effective exploitation of the party's full mobilizing potential as defined by the congress.

Pietro Ingrao Address

[Unattributed report on PCI Directorate Member Pietro Ingrao 8 January address to PCI Central Committee session in Rome]

[Excerpt] I will try to make some suggestions. At Central Committee meetings, there could be reports concentrating on various reasoned options on which an explicit "yes" or "no" is sought. Reports could be accompanied by documentary material made available previously or published beforehand by our press, perhaps with contributions and analyses of data, experiences and arguments. In some cases, there could be an extension of the method pursued by this Central Committee meeting, namely for the discussion to be preceded by debates in our press. Or in other cases, Napolitano's suggestion of rapid general consultations of grassroots organizations could be adopted.

In short, I wish to emphasize two requirements: the need for widespread and thoroughly discussed preparation of the subject for debate and the need for clearly defined options, that is, defined also with respect to other hypotheses. Unless I am mistaken, there are not only serious delays but also incongruities on our part here. We have worked to make our party an organization which discusses things freely. Today, we talk about "several kinds of Marxism" or indeed about different systems of thought that can be compared within our party with a view to forming policy. We have educated our members to discuss things every day with other people in the belief that there can now be no separate "workers' culture." Every day, we can see the combination of cultures, indeed sometimes the very contradictoriness of the needs reflected in individual workers.

This being the case, we need all the more a Central Committee, a federal committee or a leadership which openly will discuss alternative answers too. In my opinion, we need them all the more so to really lead, direct and unify. Of course, I am well aware of the need for unity, discipline and cohesion in a class struggle which is very harsh. I understand the alarm in view of the threat of currents which would split the party and, above all, could create other power groups within the party itself. And too we are aware of the resulting dangers to the state's life.

I believe, however, that the habit of unanimous voting and even the "conservatism" which sometimes makes us hesitate to talk about changes retain a conception of dissent which fails to convince me and which I consider transcended by our experience. I am referring to a conception whereby dissent always seems negative, in other words whereby it can be accepted but is nevertheless harmful. I believe, however, that a strategy and culture of socialist transformation, based on a broad bloc of political and social forces, on a mass socialization of politics and on building "elements of socialism" right away, must acknowledge the frutifulness of explicit dissent, the usefulness of problematical aspects and the great value of options and decisions based on a comparison of alternatives. I believe that this is not an unimportant point for communicating with a world of young people demanding clear options and arguments.

In short, I would like to stress something more than the democratic right of every one of us to debate. If it is true the important things for the strategy of socialist transformation which we have set ourselves are links with the entire wealth and every part of modern areas of specialized knowledge and, at the same time, a capacity for synthesis and reassembly which will enable us to come to terms with these truths, partial and often contradictory revelations, then it seems to me that we must improve our approach--in a more explicit and organized manner in our party's life and even within the top leadership bodies--to the aspect of the comparison of views and possible dissent, even in voting, so as better to lead, direct and prepare the party for the new phase.

In this report, Napolitano talked about expanding the channels for conveying wishes upward through the party from below. This depends, however, on the opportunity for real and prompt acquaintance with problems and their alternatives and consequences, especially in a party such as ours, whose aspect of central leadership is, by virtue of ancient tradition, so strong. I also believe that the grassroots organizations must make their desires felt more within the leadership bodies, which are theirs, but the extent to which they will make themselves heard and felt will depend on how much we leaders help them to do so.

PCE AIDE ACCUSES PSUC OF WEAK LEADERSHIP

LD131557 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 7 Jan 81 p 12

[Joaquina Prades report: "Sanchez Montero Accuses Antonio Gutierrez of 'Weakness'"]

[Text] The "pro-Soviet" current's triumph over the Eurocommunist current at the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] congress has started an unprecedented crisis in the PCE's relations with the Catalonian communists. This victory, "which is not in keeping with the 20 percent of Catalonian voters who gave the PSUC victory precisely because it was a Eurocommunist party"--to quote [PCE Executive Committee member] Simon Sanchez Montero--was attributed yesterday on a personal basis by that PCE leader to "the weakness and ambiguousness" of Antonio Gutierrez--until yesterday secretary general of the Catalonian communists--and of the people close to him.

In Simon Sanchez Montero's opinion, the cause which made the "pro-Soviets'" victory possible should be sought in the "misunderstood democracy" applied by the former secretary general in the PSUC, "which, with a highly dangerous ambiguousness, was adopting resolutions in which there was room for everything, the white and the black, and this gave enormous scope for maneuver to that Afghan current which has always been in a minority in the PSUC." Simon Sanchez Montero's harsh words about the outgoing secretary's conduct were the most authoritative comments which could be obtained yesterday, since PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo could not be found all day.

Other sources consulted by EL PAIS took analysis further, and stated that, over and above ambiguities, the PCE is currently in a political predicament which is increasingly "eroding" the party internally. According to these sources, the PCE has been practicing since its legalization the same political line of moderation and defense of democracy in preference to radical whims. This continuity (the Moncloa Pacts, the government of concentration and now the coalition government with an agreed program) is not "profitable" in the short term, and this has exasperated many grassroots members who, disenchanted and frustrated by this constant approach to power, "without succeeding in attaining it," have opted to leave the party or to become radicalized. "We are now paying for the consequences of that decision which Fernando Abril made when he was deputy prime minister--the isolation of the PCE," one of the sources, belonging to the Eurocommunist current, stated. "They wish to turn us into a ghetto, into a tokenist [testimonial] and radicalized party, so that the right can eat us up," he added, "and I do not believe that the Soviet Union is unconnected with the maneuver."

The USSR's support for the Afghan current was also mentioned by Simon Sanchez Montero, who admitted clearly concerned, the gravity of the situation now posed in the PCE: "We do not yet know what could happen," he said, "but it is obvious that the agreement of mutual respect and of practicing a Eurocommunist political identity, which existed between the PCE and the PSUC, no longer exists, and the rift has not been on our part, and so we will see what we can do."

In principle, the Eurocommunists will intensify the internal debates in each party group. "We will intensify analysis of the current political situation, to ensure that each party member is aware what the correct path is, whether it is the Eurocommunist path or the pro-Soviet path, so that when we reach the 10th congress, everybody will have clear ideas," the sources added.

With respect to the possibility of reaching an agreement between Eurocommunist PCE and the pro-Soviet PSUC, both Simon Sanchez Montero and the other Communist leaders consulted were in agreement that this is not possible, at least on something as important as the ideological definition. "The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan can be either supported or rejected, but no halfway stances are possible," they summed up.

Irreconcilable Stances

In addition there is the obvious fact that the Eurocommunist policy and the pro-Soviet policy are totally irreconcilable, and this will be the central feature of the PCE's 10th congress, scheduled for July: "At the next congress we will have the continuation of the policy of Eurocommunism at stake," they stated, "and that is the really important thing. The issue of collective leaderships and other controversies between Tamames and Carrillo are unimportant in comparison with such a fundamental issue as the adoption of a specific political line."

At the PCE's ninth congress it was Simon Sanchez Montero who was charged with defending the Eurocommunist definition, and in fact the present PSUC secretary who most fervently supported the retention of the word "Leninism" in the rules. On that occasion 968 delegates voted in favor of the victorious thesis, 248 declared themselves in favor of Leninism and another 40 abstained.

More PCE Comments

[Text] The PCE Executive Committee believes that the bases of cooperation between the PCE and the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] were broken at the PSUC's last congress. The PCE Executive Committee met yesterday.

Moreover, the PCE believes that the PSUC congress represents the abandonment of the policy followed to date and means a serious reversal in the positions of the Catalan communists with very negative repercussions in Spain and even in Europe.

The PCE Executive Committee considers that the result of the PSUC congress is a general offensive against Eurocommunism based upon objective factors like unemployment, the economic crisis and international tensions which is aimed at a return to traditional positions which have already been overcome in the party.

PSUC Statement

[Text] The Executive Committee of the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] tonight issued a political statement in which it attempts to answer the opinions expressed by the PCE with regard to the result and consequences of the Catalan communists' fifth congress.

The PSUC statement contains two fundamental points which express the PSUC's surprise at the PCE's categorical opinion in the sense that the fifth congress means, the executive's statement says textually, the abandonment of the policy followed up to now by the PSUC and the PCE.

In this sense, the Catalan communist party understands that it is more consistent with reality to consider that the holding of the fifth congress has created an exceptional situation which is derived from the approval of contradictory elements in essential aspects of the party's policy [as heard].

The congress and subsequently the elected Central Committee, it adds, gave full ratification to the plan for the revolution of the majority, for the struggle for socialism in democracy and pluralism, as well as the determination of policy and joint action with the PCE and independence within the communist movement.

The second point of the statement says that the Catalan communist executive committee considers that in these times of division within the party it is essential to develop a wide-ranging debate linked to political action which might permit a clarification of the contradictory elements which arose at the fifth congress, and which might also permit cohesion in the party with regard to the strategy of socialism and liberty and the revolution of the majority. In this way, it is believed that the PCE proposal to continue talks between the two parties should allow them to state clearly the situation in which the PSUC finds itself and, in this way, to rebuild internal unity and create the political conditions which would allow the present exceptional situation to be overcome.

SOCIAL DEMOCRATS DISCUSS NUCLEAR MISSILES

[Per Nordrum report: "Social Democrats Discuss Nuclear Missiles"]

[Text] Amsterdam, 11 January--"SALT III negotiations at some time in the future should not be used as an excuse for failure to do something as soon as possible to bring about negotiations intended to prevent the deployment of medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe."

This view was central to the informal talks which Labor Party Chairman Reiulf Steen and Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg had with party colleagues from The Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg and Denmark in Amsterdam on Saturday [10 January].

All agreed that negotiations should be started as soon as possible between the United States and the Soviet Union on these new arms, Steen told AFTERPOSTEN after the talks. The NATO nations have made a decision to deploy such arms, with effect from 1983 at the earliest. The Soviet Union has been busy for several years with the deployment of SS missiles, each with three warheads.

Such consultations between social democratic parties are in themselves nothing new. However, what was special about Saturday's Amsterdam meeting was that it was designed to be the first meeting in a warning process [advarende prosess] which the parties hope to start, the Labor Party chairman said. The next meeting, which will discuss the worrying trend in nuclear rearmament in the East and West, will probably take place in Oslo in 4-5 weeks' time.

Both Steen and Stoltenberg stressed that there is no desire to form a bloc comprising the small nations within NATO. In the present context it is merely a question of pure cooperation between parties. Socialist International Chairman Willy Brandt will also be invited to the next meeting in Oslo.

The social democratic parties in the small NATO nations are trying to bring about the followup of the NATO double resolution in December 1979. NATO then approved a program of nuclear arms modernization as a response to Soviet rearmament. But at the same time great importance was attached to making offers of negotiations to the Soviet Union in the hope of achieving limitations or making the deployment of these medium-range missiles completely unncessary, Stoltenberg explained.

The Soviet Union and the United States had a month of preparatory talks in Geneva in November and December last year on these questions, which are not included in the other agreement on strategic arms limitation (SALT II). The United States has not ratified this agreement because of the invasion of Afghanistan. However, the medium-range missiles may be included in a future SALT III agreement. As long as the fate of SALT II is uncertain, it is important to get results from negotiations on the new nuclear arms as soon as possible.

"An agreement on medium-range arms is urgently needed, partly because the discussions on whether they are to be deployed in Belgium and The Netherlands must soon be concluded," it is said.

In Belgium it is chiefly the Socialist Party under Karel van Miert which has postponed the decision on deployment several times. The socialists are opposed in principle to the deployment of the new missiles on Belgian territory.

"However, we would accept the consequences of the SALT III agreement which will have to come," Van Miert told AFTENPOSTEN.

In The Netherlands opposition to the medium-range missiles is growing, but there is at the same time a solid political base for the country's continued role within NATO's nuclear defenses.

TEMPORARY REDUCTION IN SOVIET GAS DELIVERIES

LD140700 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 13 Jan 81

[Text] The Soviet Union has temporarily reduced the volume of natural gas delivered to Finland. According to information from Neste the reduction is slight, amounting to some 300,000 cubic meters per day. Before this reduction, the Soviet Union was delivering to Finland about 2.8 million cubic meters of natural gas per day. The reduction is evidently linked to the winter months and it is likely that normal deliveries will be resumed later in the spring, according to Neste. Neste notes further that the reduction in the volume of the natural gas deliveries will not greatly affect the operation of Finnish enterprises using Soviet gas. The Soviet Union previously announced similar reductions in natural gas deliveries to Austria [words indistinct].

PRIME MINISTER KOIVISTO ON NORDIC COOPERATION

[TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA report: "Mauno Koivisto: Extend Nordic Cooperation"]

[Excerpt] Helsinki--"Livelier economic cooperation in the Nordic countries is desirable," Finnish Prime Minister Mauno Koivisto said in a TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA interview.

"One problem is that our economies are not complementary enough to make wide-reaching intergration easier; but there is a great deal which can be done."

"First the question of cooperation between companies can be made easier by means of interstate agreements and measures, such as common research and common commissions."

Behind Koivisto's argument lies the consideration that the Nordic countries have a similiar industrial structure. Outside the Nordic countries they act as fierce competitors, instead of making use of the opportunities for cooperation that exist within the timber and metal industries, for example.

According to Koivisto such collaboration could increase the Nordic countries' trade both on the world market and in the Third World.

[Question] Is increased Nordic energy cooperation also justified?

[Answer] Yes, if such cooperation could help to assure supplies and keep costs within reasonable limits. The extent to which oil and gas cooperation can be developed is now dependent on Norway's attitude, but energy is not an isolated part of Nordic cooperation. [answer ends]

STEEL PREDICTS SOME LABOR MPS WILL LEAVE PARTY

[Tony Conyers report: "Steel Forecasts Defections by Labour Dissidents"]

[Excerpt] The Liberal leader, Mr Steel, predicted yesterday that some Labour Mps would leave the party soon after its special one-day conference at Wembley on 24 Jan.

He called on Labour moderates to "stop hawking their consciences around the country" and reach a decision. He was speaking at a Commons press conference to launch a Liberal Party 10-point programme for economy recovery.

By last night three Labour MPs--Mr John Horam (Gateshead West), Mr Neville Sandelson (Hayes and Harlington) and Mr Tom Ellis (Wrexham)--had announced support for the Liberal document.

Mr Steel admitted that the plan--"which could be implemented tomorrow by a government with the will and imagination to put country before party"--constituted existing Liberal Party policy. And he stresses that it was not "a bartering" programme.

The document has been sent to 420 Mps, the TUC, the CBI [Confederation of British Industry] and Chambers of Commerce. Other recipients include Mr Roy Jenkins, the former Labour cabinet minister who is known to favour a new grouping within the Labour Party.

The only Mps who have not received copies are government ministers and members of the leftwing TRIBUNE group.

But Mr Steel said it had not been produced for the purpose of coming electoral pacts.

Mr Steel made it plain that in his view Labour moderates must soon show their hand. He said: "I feel very strongly that they have to reach a point where they stop hawking their consciences around the country, TV studios and newspapers and actually come to a decision about what they are going to do.

"I hope that decision will come within a few weeks of the Labour special conference.

"Then, I think, there will be a small group of Labour Mps who will leave the Labour Party.

"There is a spectrum of dissident Labour Mps, a small group in single figures I have had direct discussions with, and there is also a larger group associated with them who do not feel they can move quite that far. There is no degree of coherence among Labour dissidents."

He said the basic reason for the pamphlet was that the prime minister was fond of repeating that there was no alternative to present economic policies.

"We reject that view entirely and think that those who dissent from government policies have a duty to produce an alternative to show she is wrong in that firm, dogmatic assertion."

Nor, he said, was a coherent programme being put forward by the official opposition on a basis acceptable to the country.

The pamphlet calls for a positive industrial strategy, a "new deal" in industrial relations with changes in attitude from unions and management, a long-term incomes policy, expansion of small businesses and lower interest rates. It also urges reduction in the exchange rate of the pound, the use of North Sea oil surpluses to re-create capital assets, a big energy conservation programme, expansion of youth training and international cooperation.

TO VIMA WARNS AGAINST REVISING U.S. AID RATIO

[Unattributed commentary: "Inequality in Aid"]

[Text] The issue of U.S. military aid to Greece and Turkey is simple: It is important for Greece that this aid be given in such a ratio that a basic military balance between the two countries is maintained--a balance which, when the sizes are disproportionate, always becomes precarious. This was the meaning of the settlement that in recent years has envisaged that military aid to the two countries would be given at the ratio of 7:10. However, if the issue is a simple one, at the same time it is also significant: For Greece the maintenance of military balance with Turkey constitutes a primary national need and consequently is a prerequisite for any other kind of negotiation with the United States and certainly for the new agreement on the bases. If the U.S. Government now intends to change its military aid ratio, it should consider this: There is no Greek Government that could conclude a new agreement on the bases while, through a U.S. initiative, a basic prerequisite for the agreement is eliminated.

KIPRIANOU CONTINUES DISCUSSIONS OF CYPRUS ISSUE

Confers With Karamanlis

AT130800 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 12 Jan 81

In this connection the Office of the President of the Republic issued the following statement: President of the Republic Konstandinos Karamanlis today received President of the Republic of Cyprus Spiros Kiprianou who briefed him on the latest developments in the Cyprus issue. The president of the Greek Republic expressed his active interest in the course of the national issue. One hour earlier, at 1730, Kiprianou was visited by former Prime Minister Panayiotis Kanellopoulos. It has been learned that political leaders will visit the president of the Republic of Cyprus tomorrow.

Papandreou, Kiprianou Statements

AT141205 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 13 Jan 81

[Text] After their meeting this morning, Messrs Papandreou and Kiprianou made statements to representatives of the press. Papandreou said:

[Begin recording] First of all, I am particularly glad because I was able to welcome the president of the Republic of Cyprus to Kastri, where he also has old and touching memories from the battle which Hellenism was waging at that time against the Turkish imposition on Cyprus.

I must admit that I am also touched because we once again find ourselves here, at this place, after so many years. We have had the opportunity to hold an in-depth conversation on the phase through which the Cyprus problem is passing. The president of the republic of Cyprus informed me, he briefed me in detail on the progress of the Cyprus issue, on the problems it is facing and the prospects.

I must stress that we have had an extremely sincere exchange of views, and we without a doubt both understand and support the handling [of the problem] by the Cyprus Government and particularly by President Kiprianou. At the same time, we must stress, PASOK must stress, the role of the democratic West at this moment--and I include the entire Western area. It has played a very negative role, we believe--I believe--in the development of the Cyprus issue, particularly because it [the West] has embraced the Turkish military dictatorship and has entrusted to it its hopes for solutions to national problems as well as the Cyprus issue, which it had not entrusted to the democratic governments [of Turkey].

PASOK and I believe that it is time that Europe should once again discover balance in the area and that it must cease to support a stark military dictatorship which in our opinion threatens not only Cyprus on a long-term basis, but also simultaneously threatens the Helladic national territory.

I close by stating that I honor and respect the president of the republic of Cyprus. I have expressed to him the desire we all have, I believe with no party differences, to strengthen the difficult struggle which he is waging. We have also stressed that we will support this struggle until the end, that is until the time when Cyprus is independent, integral, demilitarized and nonaligned and until the time that all refugees return to their homes. It is only then that the Cyprus issue will close for us. [end recording]

Kiprianou then said: [Begin recording] It is a fact that I was particularly touched emotionally to meet the leader of the majority opposition, Andreas Papandreou, in this office. A great many things took place in this office in the past. We both lived through them under different capacities at that time.

The conversation we have had was extremely useful. We discussed the Cyprus problem in depth together with all the aspects of the Cyrpus problem and its handling. As Mr Papandreou has told you, there is absolutely no disagreement on the question of handling.

I explained all the difficulties which we have, the problems which are appearing and I analyzed why the climate which had originally been created, that is that something was about to happen in the proper direction, did not take place and that the Turkish side is once again appearing as intransigent as always. Despite this fact we will continue our efforts with good will for an honorable solution of the Cyprus problem. [end recording]

There is no doubt that this will continue to be the case in the future. The main aim of our states is to increase our nations' prosperity and happiness. I believe that we have extensive opportunities that we can use bilaterally to achieve our aims. It is possible to increase our bilateral trade, to diversify our barter, to cooperate more extensively in the fields of communications, science and technology.

It is a fact that the fast changing world political and economic conditions make it necessary for us to increase the solidarity and cooperation between our two countries. FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE VIEWS WEINBERGER'S POLICY

[Adelbert Weinstein editorial: "Hormuz and Hamburg"]

[Text] For the future Pentagon chief, security policy will be an element of foreign policy. Caspar Weinberger holds particularly the contradictory action of the outgoing government responsible for the slackening defense preparedness of America's allies. Had the NATO partners considered America a reliable ally, they would have been more prepared to cope with their commitments vis-a-vis the alliance. The lack of American determination in matters of foreign policy and Washington's insufficient will to prevail within NATO, have created the present insufficient situation. That is the core of Weinberger's assessment of the strategic situation outlined in the hearing of the Senate Defense Committee. It was a harmless "interrogation" he had to undergo. But the benevolent official game of questions and answers sufficed to permit insight into this man's thinking. The strategic line became evident, the line the Pentagon will follow in the next 4 years.

NATO will have to deal with a sober secretary of defense. Weinberger's understanding words for the alliance are not flattery. They are an invitation in mirror writing: under the prerequisite that Reagan's America will take its NATO leadership role seriously, the Pentagon chief expects considerably more contributions by the others. Weinberger's thesis is that no country is able to bear alone the financial burdens for the common security. The Senate hearing indicated that he wants to use the dollar carefully. Spending money is for him just one side of security policy. He does not want strategy to be considered solely as "finance strategy," to produce security through the purchasing of more and more expensive arms. In the Pentagon, he wants to insist on sensible planning ahead. New arms systems are to be acquired if demanded by the situation, but not to keep the industry going or to cope with fantastic wishes of experts. Weinberger will demand a just distribution of costs in NATO. But he thinks nothing of arithmetics with figures in percentages. For him, the criteria of strategy is the effect of the military apparatus on foreign policy: the transformation of military strength in political action.

It can be taken for granted that this secretary of defense will dispose of more dollars than all his predecessors. But he will handle them more economically than the allies hope and his American Republican friends assume. If he will pay for the alliance, he will urge NATO to pay too. He will pursue a national policy in this matter, not only due to responsibility vis-a-vis the American taxpayer, but also as a reaction to the European trend of giving the welfare state priority over security.

Weinberger left no doubts that America and the West must pursue a firm Middle East strategy. He said that America so far has made a right beginning, but the American military strength does not yet suffice to alter the situation in the Gulf region to the advantage of the West. He believes that this will be changed by President Reagan. The significance attributed by the designated secretary of defense to safeguarding the strategic zone in southwest Asia permits a conclusion: The NATO allies will have to realize, whether they like it or not, that the same strategic importance will be attributed to this "second front" as to the front in central Europe. Hormuz and Hamburg are equal in value.

The slogan of the current American security policy--NATO first--belongs in the past. It was turned out in the second phase of the Carter government with the establishment of the strategic fire brigade, the American "rapid deployment force" (RDF), that Europe will hardly be able to reckon with American reserve units. The RDF is slated for the Middle East. Had NATO understood the signs of the time, it would have begun 2 years ago to mobilize its own reserve units. American conventional reinforcements will be held back also in the future for the "second front." Should American troops be stationed in the vicinity of the Middle East crisis zone, as Kissinger suggested a few days ago, Europe must expect that the U.S. 7th Army will be temporarily involved as a strategic Middle East reserve.

A word remains to be said about the approach of the future Washington secretary of defense to the military use of the atom. He wants generally to increase the firing capacity of the U.S. Armed Forces. Firing power has a wide range for him. It reaches from precision arms with conventional explosive effect to the destruction mechanism of nuclear arms. But for Weinberger, the atom is of political-strategic value only if the possible enemy is convinced "that we are prepared to use the strength we dispose of." These are the premises of his plan to catch up with the Soviets in the field of strategic arms. His yes to SALT is a no to the current imbalance.

NEWSPAPER COMMENT ON GENERAL ALEXANDER HAIG

[Text] The editorial of Freiburg's BADISCHE ZEITUNG says in part: We Europeans who suffered through the world war believe we learned that peace is the important thing, the supreme treasure and prerequisite for a life of comfort. Is this to change now that Ronald Reagan is to wield power in the United States and Alexander Haig will determine foreign policies? Should detente, the basis of the unstable state of nonwar, cease to be the requirement and should instead national strength, national security rank priority? The smart appearance of the general before the Senate makes us shudder. He who plays with words in this topic of war and peace may easily misjudge his hand.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU notes: Bonn currently is devoting meticulous study to what the U.S. Secretary of State-designate Alexander Haig has said for the record in Washington about the future U.S. foreign and security policies under Ronald Reagan. Much of it meets with undivided acclamation, such as the favorable appreciation of the German defense effort. Other things, in contrast, elicit concern. This starts with Haig's contemplation of redefining, meaning expanding, NATO's area of operation as a countermove to the Soviet policy of expansion. But what alarms Bonn much more is the basic tendency of Haig's train of thought, namely, turning the policy toward the Third World into a mere function of the East-West relationship; that is to say, basing decision-making on the criterion of whether these decisions are helpful in the controversy with the Soviet Union. Fundamental differences of opinion are discernible on this point.

The editorial of the Muenster WESTFAELISCHE NACHRICHTEN states in part: No doubt, Haig is the most sparkling but surely also the most potent personality in the new president's team. Just like Haig's military past, his answers now make it clear in no uncertain terms that he does not want peace at any cost: no trace any longer of Carter's timidity, but neither of any martial tone despite the strong statement that there are more important things than living in peace. Washington, he said, if necessary must ensure access to oil militarily; nuclear power gains a deterrent effect if one is prepared to use it. These are tones which probably will entail insecurity especially in Bonn in view of the changed situation, in view of the farewell to the dream of detente.

In this connection, Bonn's GENERAL-ANZEIGER writes: In its attempt to salvage from detente policy what can still be salvaged, Bonn must heed the new sensitivities of Washington. What matters is to dispel the suspicion that the Federal Republic is the unstable section in the Western defense front. Yesterday the Soviet party mouthpiece PRAVDA again discovered German revanchists, simultaneously denouncing Washington's plans of counterarming. The revanchists always are brought up whenever the Federal Republic is to be put under pressure. The Soviet Government has not given up its attempt to drive a wedge between Bonn and Washington by appealing to German egotism. Finding the proper course between Washington's expectations and Moscow's pressure is part of the laborious tasks the chancellor has to cope with upon his return to Bonn.

SAUDIS REPORTEDLY TO GRANT FURTHER CREDITS

[Article signed BAR: "Saudis Grant Credit to Bonn"]

[Text] Bonn--This year again, Saudi Arabia intends to make large amounts available for financing the federal budget. Horst Schulmann, state secretary in the Finance Ministry, in talks with economic, finance and currency experts in Riyadh gained the impression that Saudi Arabia, which is the most important oil supplier of the Federal Republic, wishes to remain interlocked with the German national economy, also by way of capital traffic.

Last year, Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer contracted direct credits in Saudi Arabia in the amount of DM5.5 billion. An unknown amount included in the roughly DM10 billion which the Federal Government borrowed through international credit institutes must be added to this sum. Presumably, the Saudis have hinted they plan to invest at least as much in the FRG in 1981 as they did in 1980. As in the past, the conditions are to be strictly adapted to market conditions.

DGB INVITES POLAND'S LECH WALESA TO VISIT

[Text] Duesseldorf, Jan 14 (DPA)--The DGB expects Lech Walesa, the Polish trade union leader, to visit Duesseldorf during the first part of February. The chairman of Solidarity has confirmed the DGB's invitation and it is hoped that a final date for the visit can be fixed soon, DGB Chairman Heinz O. Vetter told journalists in Duesseldorf today.

The DGB hopes that it will very soon have the opportunity of talking to "this outstanding man" directly on the situation of the country's employees and the conclusions to be drawn from this. He further announced that on the sidelines of a trade union congress in Hungary other Polish trade unions also were invited to the Federal Republic. The aim is to get a view of the situation through direct talks.

The development in Poland can and should not detract from the policy of detente in Europe and the world, which is recognized as the right one. The march of Soviet troops into Afghanistan was a severe setback and a similar event in Poland would certainly mean the end of this policy.

FRENCH FLEET PUT ON ALERT FOR CHAD SITUATION

[Text] Concerning the effects of the Libya-Chad merger, the tone is rising in various parts. Tripoli was officially condemned by the 12 African countries meeting in Lome. For his part, Colonel al-Qadhdhafi announced a strengthening of the Libyan forces in Chad in response to the strengthening of the French forces at the border.

France may intervene at the request of African states if Libyan troops advance southward beyond the borders of Chad. Paris has delivered a very firm warning to Tripoli. It has been learned that the French fleet in Toulon is in a state of rapid alert and is ready to set sail at any time.

MILITARY MANEUVERS PLANNED FOR END OF MARCH

[Text] Marines will soon disembark on the Provence beaches while paratroopers will be dropped in the hinterland. Important maneuvers of the foreign intervention force will take place right here in the Aix-Marseille region at the end of March and in the presence of the head of state. These maneuvers are particularly important because the troops participating in them are those placed under alert by France with a view to helping, if need be, the African countries.

[Begin (Plilippe Real) recording] These maneuvers will include disembarking a portion of the 31st Brigade, recently formed to strengthen the operation potential of the foreign action forces. This important unit, based at Frejus and Perpignan, includes the 21st Marine Infantry Regiment, the 2d Foreign Infantry Regiment and squadrons of AMX-10 (?RC), the new armored vehicle which can be airlifted and which was not available at the time of recent operations. This unit will disembark on the beaches of Provence near Cavalere and will be supported on one side by the Mediterranean naval force, based in Toulon with the aircraft carrier Clemenceau and the new super Etendard bomber planes of the Aero-Navale, equipped with tactical nuclear bombs. On the other side, the unit will be supported by the air force, in particular by the Jaguar squadrons also based in the region. Several paratrooper regiments belonging to the 11th Airborne Division will be dropped in the hinterland. The 27th Alpine Division will be entrusted with the defense of the strategic missiles in the Plateau d'Albion and the other units of the 5th Military Region will have to protect the rest of the territory from the aggressors.

The head of state will attend the final stage of the maneuvers and there will be a big parade in one of the three towns of the region. [end recording]

ELF-AQUITAINE POSTPONES CONTRACT WITH LIBYA

[Summary] ELF-Aquitaine has postponed the implementation of its contract with Libya to prospect for oil. This was done at the request of the French Government.

It is an unpleasant event which apparently was not foreseen by the French Government services and which has made obvious something which many people already knew, namely, a certain incoherence in the politicomilitary-administrative organization in charge of Africa. Incoherence in this organization is bound to lead to incoherence in action.

This is the main observation which can be made from the French viewpoint with respect to the celebrated "merger" between Libya and Chad.

The dramatization which observed in France with reference to this seems to be connected with election tremors rather than with any sudden deterioration in the situation in the heart of French-speaking Africa.

It should be realized that there is no solution likely to ensure political stability and economic balance for Chad. That country, which is 2.5 times as large as France and has a little more than 4 million inhabitants, is divided among Arabs, Arabized people and blacks and among Muslims, animists and Christians. Some 160 languages or dialects are spoken within its borders. The union between Libya and Chad recently announced, only by Tripoli, looks more like a manifestation of Al-Qadhdhafi's permanent dream than like a concrete fact. Silence prevails in Ndjamena--a sign of confusion and internal quarrels in a coalition theoretically in power.

Since things are what they are, what should France do?

It should take preventive measures to be able in any case to prevent any spread of the disorder prevailing in Chad and Libyan hegemonism beyond Chad's borders, especially with respect to Niger. This is the objective of the decision to strengthen the French military presence south of Sahara, which was announced yesterday.

It should reassure black Africa and also (why not?) the Maghreb about the strength of France's determination to support its friends and allies. With reference to this, the Quai d'Orsay communique which we published yesterday marks the beginning of a response. It will be insufficient because determined and, occasionally, ruthless French action in Africa has been followed, especially since Bokassa's downfall, by apparent vacillation or, in any case, circumspection. Hence, a series of misunderstandings which, in the end, now represent the most negative feature of the situation.

It also should adopt an uncompromising attitude toward Al-Qadhdhafi, a complex individual, attractive in some respects but now spurned nearly everywhere except in circles where Libyan petrodollars flow. It appears that this also is one of the axes of French diplomatic action.

At one time, France avoided getting bogged down in Chad but it has not avoided the absence trap. A recovery is called for but this is no reason for falling into a third trap, that of undue haste and inconsistency.

CGT SECRETARY COMMENTS ON VISIT TO POLAND

[Text] After a 1-week visit to Poland, the CGT delegation arrived back in Paris this Sunday evening. The three national secretaries Pierre Gensous, Gerard Gaume and Joannes Galland answered journalists' questions.

Pierre Gensous remarked in particular that the situation in Poland is complex and changing and that the CGT delegation noted a desire among all Poles to overcome this situation themselves. In reply to a question, he stated that some people in France do not seem to know that there is trade union pluralism in Poland: Solidarity, the "branch" trade union coordinating body and other structures at present being set up.

On the subject of "free Saturdays," Pierre Gensous confirmed that "this question is causing some tension but also a broad debate among the workers." From their visit to the Katowice region, the French trade unionists were able to see for themselves that some grassroots trade unions organizations have appealed to people to work this Saturday.

With regard to "counterrevolutionary" elements, Pierre Gensous stated: "We are not naive. We know that there are people who want to destabilize the country. However, the vast majority of workers advocate socialism, which they want to make more democratic."

Regarding the meeting with Solidarity, Pierre Gensous noted "Lech Walesa's desire to have contacts with the CGT, his wish to take account of the national situation and his attachment to self-managing socialism."

Finally, the delegation expressed satisfaction at the diversity of contacts it had in Poland and the desire of all its interlocutors to implement this summer's agreements.

NEW POLL SHOWS GISCARD, MITTERRAND RUNNING EVEN

[Text] Paris, 14 Jan (AFP)--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and Socialist Party leader Francois Mitterrand were running even in a tightening presidential race that will be decided in May, according to a new poll released today.

The poll, commissioned by the weekly magazine Paris MATCH and involving interviews with 1,000 eligible voters, showed the two tied in a hypothetical runoff if no candidate wins a majority in the first round.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing led Mr Mitterrand 52-48 percent in a similar survey published by Paris MATCH last month. But despite closure of the gap, today's poll showed Frenchmen believe by a 52-21 percent margin that the incumbent will be re-elected.

The latest poll reflected Mr Giscard d'Estaing's drop in popularity over the last two months and the closeness of a contest once virtually conceded to the right-of-center incumbent as he seeks a second seven-year term.

A poll published last weekend in the Sunday magazine of the newspaper LE FIGARO showed that only 47 percent of those interviewed approved of the president's performance, as opposed to 53 percent in December.

On January 4, a poll published by the newspaper LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS showed Mr Mitterrand leading Mr Giscard d'Estaing by 51-49 percent, a sharp reversal from the 58-42 percent margin the president enjoyed in November.

It was the first time an opposition leader led in a voter survey in 15 years. In 1974, a poll showed Mr Mitterrand and Mr Giscard d'Estaing tied a month before the election. Mr Giscard d'Estaing won by 51-49 percent.

Meanwhile, Mr Giscard d'Estaing today confirmed that the election campaign will officially open on April 10, when the constitutional council will formally announce the list of candidates.

The first round of voting will be held April 26 and the second round--a near certainty given the crowded field of candidates--will take place on May (?8).

Mr Giscard d'Estaing announced the dates at a meeting of his cabinet at which he expressed the hope that "all will be done" to enlighten the French people on the facts they need to choose the fifth republic's new president.

REPORTS OF JUDGE D'URSO RELEASE PROVE UNFOUNDED

[Text] Rome, 15 Jan (ANSA)--As of early this morning, Judge Giovanni D'Urso had still not been released by his Red Brigades kidnappers as they had announced in their communique Wednesday. The announcement, which did not indicate when and where they would release him, was contained in the tenth communique the Red Brigades issued since the December 12 kidnapping. The communique, planted in a garbage bin near the Rome Opera House, was followed by a spate of rumors that alternately raised and dampened hopes of the magistrate's safe release.

Unconfirmed reports of the judge's release were on some wire services just an hour after the communique was found. D'Urso was saidto have been found on the outskirts of Rome near the Gemelli hospital. He was said to have been admitted to this hospital for a checkup and his wife, his daughter and public prosecutor Domenico Sica were said to have hurried there.

The report soon swept through newspapers and Parliament, where a debate on terrorism was about to begin in the Lower House. The false report, however, began with an anonymous telephone call to the D'Urso home. A person identifying himself as a member of the Red Brigades gave instructions for the place where D'Urso could be found. Hundreds of newsmen and photographers rushed to the scene where a watchman said he had seen an ambulance take a man towards the Gemelli hospital nearby.

At this point the rumors and false reports got completely out of control. Some hospital personnel said they had seen D'Urso's wife arrive, while journalists standing outside the D'Urso home said no one had left the building.

Meanwhile, the first reactions to the reports started pouring forth. The Vatican said it was relieved to hear that the judge was safe.

Radical Party Leader Marco Pannella claimed that the liberation was a direct result of his party's initiative in favor of publication of communiques from Red Brigades members jailed in the Trani and Palmi prisons. The state television network interrupted programs to report that D'Urso had been released.

At 1546, ANSA, which had not carried the reports, issued a denial. But the rumors persisted to the point that the police chief personally went to the hospital to ascertain that D'Urso definitely was not there.

Forlani Defends Government Actions

[Text] Rome, 14 Jan (ANSA)--Premier Arnaldo Forlani today upheld the government's handling of the D'Urso case, stating that despite polemics and differing interpretations of the affair, his administration had acted with [word indistinct] and with care both to save the life of the kidnapped judge and to safeguard the good of the nation and the law of the land.

Forlani addressed the Parliament as an important debate on terrorism was about to begin. His speech lasted only around twenty minutes but touched on the closure of the Asinara top security prison, the problem of publication of terrorist documents, and the visit of radical parliamentarians to the Trani jail. He reiterated that the decision to close Asinara had been contemplated for a long time, way before the Red Brigades demanded this in exchange for D'Urso's life. He [words indistinct] that government in no way let itself be influenced by terrorist demands.

The premier voiced understanding both for those papers which decided not to publish terrorist documents and those who decided to do so for humanitarian reasons. Forlani said he was sure that whatever stance was taken the decision was made after long, and sincere soul-searching on the part of editors in chiefs and journalists.

Forlani admitted that within the government itself, opinion was divided, but that this is to be expected in a political system where dissent is tolerated, he stressed. "Only by imagining differing political systems, can one expect to see absolute uniformity in thought and behavior in the face of every circumstance," he said.

Forlani said that the Justice Ministry was investigating the legality of the Radical Party's actions. With reference to the radial MP's visit to the Trani jail, he said that responsibility for this "distorted use" of their presence within the jail rested fully on them. In any case, Forlani stressed that the processes of disintegration can be combatted not through polemics but by responsible and determined government action. The parliamentary session was recessed after his speech and will be resumed later this evening.

Meanwhile, the Christian Democrats, the Socialists and the Social Democrats voiced their satisfaction over Forlani's words. The Republican Party made no comment. The radicals also voiced satisfaction, while criticisms were launched by the Communists and the "MSI" neofascists on the opposition benches.

NAPOLITANO SUMMARIZES PCI CENTRAL COMMITTEE DEBATE

[Unattributed report on PCI Secretariat member Giorgio Napolitano's summing up at 8 January Central Committee session in Rome: "Comrade Napolitano's Conclusions"]

It has been said that the political debate within the Directorate is insufficiently transparent. Though it must be said frankly that at recent Central Committee meetings it has been difficult to understand the significance of the debate that has opened up with the topmost leadership group, I believe that in some cases the Central Committee can be better acquainted in objective terms with the various demands and arguments compared with in the Directorate before reaching a particular conclusion.

If, however, there were a public accentuation in personal terms of the differences among individual Directorate or Secretariat comrades, it might become difficult to avoid counterpositions and crytallizations throughout the party.

It is therefore a matter of finding a point of balance between demands for a transparent debate and clear conclusions and unity. We must be aware that this is not easy. A unitary dialectic demands moderation and a real effort to achieve a synthesis, not viewed as a confused juxtaposition of divergent and irreconcilable theses, but primarily as the result of a commitment to mutual attention and serious consideration of the demands and opinions expressed by everyone.

PRESIDENT RAMALHO EANES INVESTITURE SPEECH

[Speech by President Ramalho Eanes at his investiture at the Assembly of the Republic in Lisbon--live]

[Excerpts] Mr Speaker of the Assembly of the Republic, Mr Prime Minister, Mr President of the Supreme Court, councillors of the revolution, honorable deputies, Portuguese people:

The circumstances in which this investiture is taking place are very different from those that existed at the outset of my first mandate. Then uncertainty and insecurity were probably the most marked characteristics of our political system, even if disguised by our democratic hope and by the belief that only democracy would enable us to resolve our grave national problems.

Despite the fact that a period of relative economic and social stability then followed, there continued to take place attempts to radicalize the political process. But the institutions stood firm and the election results of 7 December finally consolidated them. We now have gained experience and acquired certainties. We have the proof that the achievements of a democratic system are its best defense.

For this reason I find the first and most important result of my reelection in the clear expression of the wish of the Portuguese people to continue without interruption the democratic process begun on 25 April [1974] and reiterated in 25 November [1975]. In recognition of the democratic conduct, responsible realism and fidelity to the spirit of 25 April that I sought to observe throughout my first mandate, my reelection imposes upon me a commitment--which cannot be refused--to the democratic regime and to the future of pluralism, of an open and free society, of justice and tolerance, stability and progress. Such have been the ever-present criteria for my decisions and will remain the guiding lights of my action, both by virtue of my conscious undertaking and as a result of the imperative wish of the Portuguese people.

I do not interpret my reelection as a personal victory. In democracy there cannot be personal victories. Even though in presidential elections there is no contest among political parties or government programs, victory in such elections represents the victory of a set of ideas and concepts shared by many political leaders, democratically expressed and practiced by organizations and institutions, and which are in keeping with the aspirations and feelings of the majority of the Portuguese people.

The main political values that have really emerged victorious are those of pluralist democracy and the guarantee of a free and open coexistence of differentiated concepts and interests. It is important to keep their significance in mind for, as is known, pluralism and the freedom of expression of various social interests are values permanently under threat.

In democracy, pluralism and the freedom of expression are absolute values. But they are also indispensable premises for meeting crises and for achieving modernization and development. There can be no real and consistent collective effort based on exploitation and oppression. There cannot exist creative ability if our democratic regime does not remain open to the debate of alternatives, to the possibility of criticism, to the expression of differences. Only thus will we be able to choose the most effective course and identify the sacrifices that we agree to bear.

The election results have dispensed with authoritarian assertiveness and with schemes for the formal concentration of political power which pay no heed to pluralism, which block the principle of alternation in power, which threaten democratic continuity and which sow division among the citizens. Also dispensed with are those sets of ideas based on the concept of a political or social vanguard, be they aimed at revolutionary goals or at restoring old privileges.

Reflecting the advocacy of consensus and of pluralism, of legality and of [word indistinct], the expressed will of the electorate also represents the victory of the legitimate conditions for the revision of the constitution.

The political significance of my reelection derives from my past political action and from the program which I submitted to the country. I thus deem it imperative, on this solemn occasion of my investiture when I am taking my oath of office upon the constitution, to reiterate the framework of criteria that guide my actions and upon which are based the political responsibilities which I am assuming before all Portuguese people.

Pluralist democracy is the supreme principle to which the state, the political system and the basic framework of social relationships are subordinated, in the acknowledgment that only the expression of differentiated political and social interests makes possible the total realization of human freedom and dignity, the responsible assertion of the rights and duties of the individual, the permanent guaranteeing of the ties of solidarity that unite and mutually commit all citizens.

Freedom is the incontrovertible value ensured by pluralist democracy. It assures everyone without exception of the right to free expression, free association and to real access to opportunities for personal realization in the framework of the responsibilites laid down by the norms of democracy.

Social solidarity is the value that stems from the fact that each citizen is part of the national community. It requires full satisfaction of the demands of life in a free society, such as ensuring the conditions of assistance, security and support to which all are entitled in a society that rejects oppression and exploitation.

The authority which the president of the republic derives from having been elected by direct and universal suffrage enables him to be, in effective terms, the guarantor of the regular functioning of the institutions, the systems ultimate point of reference, the ultimate point of reference, the ultimate safeguard in moments of crisis or emergency.

However, the coexistence of organs of sovereignty elected by the same method demands, in a semipresidential system more than in any other, the existence of institutional solidarity. The latter should not be viewed as a permanent identity of concepts and views, rather as a strict and rigorous commitment to mutual respect among the president of the republic, the Assembly of the Republic and the government in the context of their respective constitutional jurisdictions, and to concerted action among them above and beyond any differences that may exist.

The president of the republic will not fail with his institutional solidarity and the support which it entails. A government is only conditioned by the requirement of democratic legitimacy. Once this requirement is satisfied, any government is entitled to the means to govern, and is dutybound to do so, guided solely by the collective interest.

The president of the republic will expect of the government, of any government, no parties nor persons excepted--correct attitudes, loyalty, crystal-clear methods and respect for the norms that regulate the relationships among organs of sovereignty.

The president of the republic will exercise his mandate without ever overstepping the bounds of his jurisdiction or usurping the powers of others. But he will never relinquish the right to exercise his constitutional authority as required by specific circumstances and needs.

Having achieved the goal I set myself in 1976 of normalizing the situation in the armed forces, I will not henceforth add to my political role any military functions other than those stemming from my capacity as supreme commander of the armed forces. I have thus decided to hand over power to a new chief of the armed forces' general staff no later than the end of February.

In a strict interpretation of the meaning of the defense and of the guaranteeing of the stable development of the constitutional regime, I will exercise my mandate, as I have done in the past, with the ever-present goals of ensuring peace, freedom and security, with the firmness required by the democratic legitimacy of my investiture.

Likewise, within the sphere of my jurisdiction I will continue to seek to achieve the political and social consensus which is a factor of stability and consistency, to pursue the resolution of disputes by means of negotiation, and to encourage cooperation among different interests such as will contribute to strengthening social solidarity.

The constitution stipulates that the president of the republic has no specific role in the process of revising the constitution. The responsibility for revision rests entirely on parliament invested with constituent powers. However, within the boundaries of his jurisdiction, the president of the republic will ensure respect for the norms by which the forthcoming revision of the constitution must abide.

The president of the republic has no direct role in the area of the executive. But he has the duty to elucidate the coordinates for the interpretation of given situations, playing a guiding role in our political life and creating conditions which will make possible the resolution of major national problems through a concerted effort. The present crisis, in which external and internal factors are interwoven, requires that the political leaders should not deviate from the course of realism, prudence and calm that has been pursued in the last few years. We have succeeded in finding the bases for political stability, ensuring the conditions for alternation in power and having found, at least with regard to essential questions, significant areas of consensus. This is an important contribution toward enabling us now to face with determination the demands posed by democracy, by modernization and by development.

The ideological debate is important for the creation of a collective consciousness well apprised of the existing alternatives. But it must not take place at the expense of necessary tasks or of the opportunities within our grasp. In this context the same realism imperatively needed in economic decisionmaking,namely, looking courageously to the future without remaining tied to sterile considerations about the past, also requires that the imperatives of social solidarity and of the satisfaction of the legitimate expectations of the Portuguese with regard to security, justice and well-being, be accepted and acted upon.

Modernization and development will not be achieved if the realities promised remain situated on the far horizon, thus unable to motivate the effort required in the present and the immediate sacrifices being demanded. Thus the participation of all components of the economy, be they employers or workers, technicians or investors, of all social groups, in debating and outlining general economic policy, must not be an empty promise. But, on the other hand, the political commitment to protecting and supporting those least capable of pressing their claims, and thus deprived of the benefits of development, must not be forgotten.

The mass media have a decisive role to play as an instrument of the utmost importance in creating a collective consciousness and will.

The mass media, radio and television in particular, must not be used as instruments for illegitimate political pressures, nor for the deliberate distortion of news or of the motives behind given decisions. Instead they must always be outlets for the pluralistic expression of alternatives and concepts. Otherwise, the mass media will be betraying their democratic responsibilities, will debase those who work in them and will prevent an essential instrument in the weaving of the fabric of modern society.

Now more than in the recent past, when the basic concern was to promote political clarification and stability, it is important that the debate of the alternatives confronting us in outlining a policy of progress be enriched by honest, truthful and responsible mass media. This is what is expected, as a consciously accepted premise, of all those in positions of responsibility in the mass media and of each and everyone of those who work in them.

Our democratic state is advancing toward full consolidation. [passage indistinct] Sound strides have been taken in the last few years, and will continue to be taken, along the path of decentralization and of respect for the autonomy of our archipelagos, recognizing the legitimacy of the [word indistinct] interests that exist there. Far from weakening the state or reducing its efficiency, these conditions have increased its capacity to meet the needs of the populations and have given a (?sounder), more flexible consistency to national unity.

The basic outlines of our foreign policy have been clearly defined with regard to the (?USSR), to the Atlantic alliance, to the states of Africa and Latin America to which we are united by strong historic ties and by mutual interests, and to the Arab countries.

We have started a process aimed at giving due enhancement to the communities of Portuguese emigrants scattered throughout the world. This process is still incomplete and far from satisfying the understandable expectations of the emigrants and the real interests of Portugal.

Mr Speaker, honorable members: It is in this context of hope and responsibility that I hereby wish solemnly to pledge, before this house and before the country, as president of all the Portuguese people, to defend and guarantee our open democracy expressed in its dimensions of political participation, economic development, social solidarity and cultural creativity, meeting the challenges of the present and building a future of progress and fraternity.

The difficulties in our way show that we are living in demanding times. By virtue of the opportunities it has to offer us, of the experience gained and of the conscientiousness and calm that we will be able to maintain, the future presents us with unlimited prospects for accomplishment and for affirmation of our collective destiny. May we all prove worthy of our history and of our future. May we prove worthy of our people and thus we will fulfill Portugal. [applause]

BELGRADE TELEVISION INTERVIEWS RAMALHO EANES

AU141545 Belgrade Domestic Television Service in Serbo-Croatian 1900 GMT 8 Jan 81

[Interview granted by Antonio dos Santos Ramalho Eanes, president of the Republic of Portugal, to Zarko Bozic, Belgrade Radio and Television permanent correspondent in the Iberian Peninsula; in Lisbon, "The Day Before Yesterday"--recorded in Portuguese with superimposed Serbo-Croatian translation]

[Text] [Question] During the process of very deep and very important changes in the last 6 years Portugal has had and still has various problems and there have also been political crises at times. In your opinion, what are the causes of that?

[Answer] The causes are multiple and diverse. However, I believe that the most important of the causes is the one that has originated in and emanated from the cycle of political trends in the last few years, the years that have been filled with visible changes. As you know, we have moved from a dictatorial regime toward a democratic system. It can best be said that it has been a transitional period, years of adaptation, learning and overcoming of various difficulties. I believe that now most of the difficulties are behind us and that there is sufficient stability to ensure the road of consolidating democracy outlined by the April 1974 events.

[Question] You belong to no political party. How do you appraise the role and the activities of parties during the past period and do you think that role can be improved in the future?

[Answer] You know that in Portugal we have political pluralism and that the essential thing to say under these circumstances is that a free organization of parties is evident. The significance of their roles in the country's political life emanates from that fact. I am especially convinced that the political parties, as autonomous political bodies, are capable of seeking ways to realize their goals and, at the same time, to contribute to realizing the national goals. Naturally, all that requires necessary mutual adaptation.

[Question] The armed forces, which played a decisive role in the 1974 and 1975 process of changes, represent a special part of Portugal's political life. What do you think about that role now and how do you foresee that role for the future?

[Answer] Either as chief of the general staff of land forces or as commander of the armed forces or as president of the republic, I have always tried to achieve a relationship within which the armed forces play no political role whatsoever. I have tried to create within the armed forces the conditions for their complete subordination to political authority. I think that these conditions have already been created in practice and that the forthcoming consitutional changes will ensure that our armed forces will have an identical institutional role with the armies of other European countries.

[Question] Mr President, we are at the beginning of a new year. In Portugal there is a newly elected president, a new government and new hopes. In your opinion, what is Portugal's main goal this year?

[Answer] First of all political and institutional stability must be maintained, the stability that in a democracy makes possible a realistic approach to unsolved problems and difficulties resulting from and intensified, especially this year, by the international economic crisis.

[Question] The great and long history of Portugal has left its imprint on the world's history and that imprint is still felt on many continents. [words indistinct] Culture are present in Latin America, Africa and Asia. Is that fact reflected in your country's foreign policy today and to what extent?

[Answer] Any foreign policy, whose creators aspire to make it contemporary and noticeable, must take into account the traces of the past. Since 1976 our foreign policy has been determined in a certain sense precisely by traces of the past periods, traces that, in the process of creating new relations, suggested on its own Portugal's rapprochement and integration with Europe. In this connection, all efforts have been made in every respect to maintain contacts and cooperation with the Portuguese language countries in Africa and Latin America. It is thanks to that, in the period of crisis, of world transformation in this time in which we live that bilateral relations based on cultural and historic traditions can become all the more comprehensive and effective.

[Question] Yugoslavia watches the events in Portugal with great interest. The memories of your meetings with President Tito are still alive. What can you say about the relations between our two countries and about the future prospects of those relations.

[Answer] President Tito was an exceptional personality among all legendary statesmen, a personality who impressed me the most by the granite-like strength of his convictions, the immense grandeur of his political achievements and the strong determination with which he fought for the unity and independence of the Yugoslav peoples and nationalities. He made a strong impression on me by his lucidity with which he approached complicated world events filled with dangerous seethings and, at the same time, by his devotion to striving to solve the acute problems of small countries, the problems among which the issue of independence has a special place on a worldwide scale. It was thanks to his efforts that comprehensive cooperation has been developed between Portugal and Yugoslavia and that ways have been found to deepen the good relations between the two countries. I am convinced that the foundations on which the relations between the two countries have been built are firm and that the friendship between the two peoples will deepen in a manner that is in accord with the interests of the two countries, especially because the mutual interest in and the political will for achieving that exist.

INTERVIEW WITH PSUC SECRETARY GENERAL FRUTOS

[Enrique Canals interview in Barcelona with Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia (PSUC) Secretary General Francisco Frutos: "To Say That the Party is Pro-Soviet Would be Mechanical Simplification"--date of interview not specified]

[Text] Barcelona--Francisco Frutos, a 42-year-old Catalonian, leader of the Catalonian Workers Commissions and new PSUC secretary general, believes that the battle over the removal of the term "Eurocommunism" has arisen artificially since the concepts of socialism in freedom and revolution of the majority remain defined in the party's programs. "To say that the PSUC is pro-Soviet," he asserted, "would be a mechanical simplification."

Question: What is your assessment of the congress which you have just closed?

Answer: In the first place, I believe that it demonstrates the real independence of the PSUC, which, as a national party, has its own activity in the country and needs nobody to formulate its policy from outside. I also believe that there has been a thorough self-critical reflection on what the necessary policies to be followed at each moment are. At certain points the PSUC leadership has been unable to debate all the issues existing in everyday reality. This has not been done and has caused tensions and confrontations. There has been a lack of coordination between the grassroots and the leadership.

Question: The term "Eurocommunism" has been eliminated from the theses.

Answer: This is a word which has prospered publicly but has been deemed ambiguous. The battle over its removal has arisen artificially, since there are no substantial changes in our policy in the overall content of the theses. The term "Eurocommunism" was aimed at embracing the concepts of socialism in freedom and revolution of the majority, with all the forces of progress, which is what we have defined in our programs.

Question: PSUC leaders belonging to the "social democratic" or "white flag" current have stated that the removal of this term marks the beginning of a stage of "perversion of the PSUC." PCE leader Simon Sanchez Montero has spoken in this connection of a rift between the PCE and the PSUC.

Answer: I do not believe in this "perversion". What has emerged from the congress is a reflection of the problems and of the possible alternatives to the present situation. Nor do I see any possibility of holding a special congress. These sectors should accept the results of the congress and struggle within the party. It is correct that they should express their opinions and struggle if they believe that there are things which are wrong. There should be debate, and then democratic centralism should be applied. With respect to Sanchez Montero's statements, these are on an individual basis, and he is fully entitled to express his opinion. The idea of all communists is that we must maintain relations of fraternity with the PCE and of thorough debate when there are disagreements, as happened last October.

Question: Do you believe that the strengthening of the "pro-Soviet" current within the party could harm the PSUC's public image?

Answer: I do not believe so. To say that the PSUC is "pro-Soviet" would be a mechanical simplification. Our political line is leftwing, within a communist outlook, but there is no leftist radicalism of "pro-Soviet" line. A line of independence is being maintained, and this is clear from the critical stance adopted with respect to the issue of Afghanistan. All this while also demanding the social progress which has taken place in the socialist countries. Nor do I believe that there will be a loss of electoral image. I hope that the people will judge us by the policy which we conduct at each moment. In short, I believe that one can speak not of a change in the party's policy but of important shifts of emphasis.

Question: What are these shifts of emphasis?

Answer: Principally in the methods and approaches in implementing this policy, which remains the same. At the municipal level, pacts of progress, preferably with the socialists. At the level of the Catalonian Parliament, also the same policy of opposition to the right, and seeking unity with the leftwing forces. What the congress has done is to accept as a whole our policy against the crisis and unemployment and on preserving jobs.

FRUTOS, CARRILLO DIFFER OVER 'SPECIAL CONGRESS'

LD141315 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 10 Jan 81 p 7

[Excerpts] PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo yesterday afternoon in Madrid conveyed to the new Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia (PSUC) Chairman Pere Ardiaca and Secretary General Francisco Frutos the desirability of holding a special congress of the Catalonian communist party to review the theses approved at its fifth congress last weekend.

The 4-hour meeting at PCE headquarters was planned following a telephone call from Francisco Frutos to the PCE secretary general to exchange information and views on the course and outcome of the congress, which has brought about, among other things, the abandonment by the PSUC of the term "Eurocommunism".

At the conclusion of the lengthy conversation it cannot be asserted, judging by the impressions received from Francisco Frutos' statements, that a rapprochement between the PCE and the PSUC has occurred, rather that the differences centering on the PSUC secretary general's rejection of a special congress and the differing interpretations of the theses approved at the fifth congress persist.

An Important Change

In a brief conversation with journalists, the PSUC secretary general stated that during the meeting Santiago Carrillo maintained his stance that the Catalonian communists' fifth congress represented an important change in the policy approved at the PCE's last congress. The PCE secretary general informed them that the PCE Executive Committee will meet next Monday to make an official pronouncement on the decisions adopted at the PSUC's fifth congress. The PSUC secretary general said that, in his opinion, there were important shifts of emphasis, but the line of socialism in freedom, which has been described as "Eurocommunism," has not been changed at all. "In all the theses," he added, "there was, if possible, a more emphatic assertion of the principles of socialism in freedom, through democracy, acceptance of the democratic institutions and cooperation with other progressive forces." He emphasized that "the documents of the fourth and fifth congresses should be consulted to see what Eurocommunism and pro-Sovietism there is in them, and it will be observed that the differences are not so great."

Francisco Frutos added that, following this meeting, "the way has been left open for continuing the discussions, without a date for our meeting again having been set at present." The subject matter of these future talks will be further clarified following the PSUC Central Committee meeting and once the PCE has also defined the significance of our relations and a stance on the fifth congress' resolutions has been adopted. "In the theses approved at the congress as a whole there is clarity in stating the independence of our debates--both those of the PCE and those of the PSUC--and their respective independence in their approach to international policy."

Francisco Frutos was emphatically opposed to holding a special PSUC congress: "What I want now is normalization of the party's internal life. Henceforth, it will be the organization as a whole which will decide on the desirability or otherwise of that special congress."

When pressed about the rejection of the term "Eurocommunist," the new PSUC secretary general stated that the issue should not be viewed mechanically and ambiguously: "You should read the theses and be specific. In our theses there is a criticism of the policy of pacts which are not subsequently carried out, as happened in the case of the Moncloa Pacts." In light of an antipeople policy of the Suarez government and the Jordi Pujol government [of Catalonia], he argued, greater dynamization of the people's forces is necessary. To this end he suggested cooperation with the progressive forces, although he took the opportunity to criticize the socialists for what he regarded as a traditional antiunitary policy.

Referring to information from PSUC party members themselves suggesting that the operation against the Eurocommunists in that organization was financed by the Soviet Union, Francisco Frutos derided and denied these statements, sarcastically saying that he was not present when that money was handed over: "Let everybody take responsibility for his own statements," he stated.

With respect to the election of the PSUC Executive Committee, he stated that this was a peripheral issue in the conversation with Carrillo, and that he is in favor of "the various interpretations of our program, although not our currents," being represented in its composition.

PEREZ LLORCA MEETS WITH ARAB LEAGUE OFFICIAL

[Text] Chedli Klibi, secretary general of the Arab League, has arrived in Madrid. According to a clarification which Foreign Minister Perez Llorca made when he was receiving Chedli Klibi, the Tunisian secretary general of the Arab League, Spain is not going to establish diplomatic relations with Israel, as some Spanish groups and politicians requested.

At Barajas Airport the secretary general of the Arab League said that the refusal to allow the Palestinians to have their own state--a subject which will dominate the talks in Madrid--is a problem of tension for the Arab countries and for the other countries of the world because of the international imbalance which is provoked by its continuation. He said that at the next Arab summit these countries will study important economic and political support for the Palestinian people.

While Mr Klibi was expressing gratitude for what he described as brave stances by Spain in the Arab cause, we asked the secretary general of the Arab League what would be the consequences if Spain were to establish diplomatic relations with Israel. Could Spain play a role in any Middle East peace plan? The question and answer--which attracted the attention of those present--gave the Spanish foreign minister the chance to state categorically that the possibility of relations with Israel is not going to materialize. The reply to the same question by the Arab representative, the translation and the clarification by the Spanish minister are as follows:

[Begin Klibi recording in Arabic with superimposed Spanish translation] I do not believe that such recognition is foreseeable because such a stance cannot be inferred from the repeated statements by the Spanish Government and the highest Spanish authorities. This stance is also not foreseeable if we look at the excellent relations and the deep links which historically unite the Spanish people and the Arab people, so I do not want to answer a question which is only a very remote possibility and which, as far as I can see, has no possibility of materializing.

[Perez Llorca] I should like to add that this possibility, this eventuality, is not going to materialize. [end recording]

The secretary general of the Arab League who will be in Spain for 3 days on an official visit, will be received in audience by King Juan Carlos and will meet with Prime Minister Suarez and Foreign Minister Perez Llorca.

IRAQ'S 'IZZAT IBRAHIM DEPARTS AFTER 3-DAY VISIT

[Excerpts] Here is a report from Barajas Airport:

The official visit by 'Izzat Ibrahim, vice chairman of the Revolution Command Council of Iraq, who has been in Madrid for 3 days, came to an end shortly after noon today. The Iraqi deputy prime minister was seen off here at the airport by Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez and other ministers, while an air force squadron performed a flypast.

Among the matters discussed with Spanish officials during his stay in Madrid was the Iran-Iraq war--a conflict in which Spain wishes to maintain a neutral position, though closer to the Baghdad regime.

Furthermore, he brought a message from President Saddam Husayn indicating that Iraq is prepared to sell more oil when Spain requests this if the supply situation requires it.

At the same time it is being said that Spain is likely to make proposals to increase its traditional exports to Iraq and maintain its presence through housing projects, supply of railway equipment and telephone equipment, among other things. However, Iraq does not see oil as the way of paying for these as it considers that energy should be treated separately.

It looks as though Spain might in the future continue its sales of conventional weapons at a time when Iraq no longer wishes to extend its military activities on Iranian territory for fear of finding itself beaten by Iranian human military power and thus failing to attain the political objectives of the war.

NORWAY

AMBASSADOR MEVIK ASSESSES CSCE RESULTS, PROSPECTS

[Morten Fyhn interview with Norwegian CSCE Ambassador Leif Mevik: "Small European Deten e Hopes"]

[Text] "I believe that there is a widespread Western view that there is good reason to be satisfied with the first part of the Madrid CSCE followup conference," Ambassador Leif Mevik told AFTENPOSTEN. The conference's second phase begins 27 January, and then the proposals for a European disarmament conference will be central issues. Mevik warns against too much optimism in the short term and believes that we must view the possibilities of reaching agreement on such a conference in the near future with great sobriety and realism.

[Answer] Western satisfaction is due first to the fact that the West was successful in pressing its point that we will continue to have fundamental scrutiny if the future of whether the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act are being adhered to and that this is an important part of the CSCE process. We see these meetings as a sort of control station in the continuing process. It is important that we are able to sound one another out in order to preserve the CSCE's credibility. In Madrid we had enough time for critical step-by-step scrutiny, despite considerable Eastern opposition.

Second, we have had reason to direct attention at central problems in East-West relations especially such a violation of the Final Act's provisions as the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and violations of human rights.

Third, we have been able to focus broadly on the arms situation in Europe and the need for confidence-building measures and disarmament; Mevik said, stressing that it has been possible to bring about a new East-West dialogue despite the cold international climate. This must be seen as something positive.

Criticisms in Madrid have in many ways been more pointed on the West's part than at the previous Belgrade meeting, and this still did not lead to confrontation.

[Question] Has strong Western criticism of the Soviet Union had any other objective apart from satisfying opinion at home and irritating the Russians?

[Answer] The CSCE process would lose its credibility in Western societies if commitments are entered into and not honored. It is very important that we speak our mind when commitments are not being adhered to.

But it would be naive to expect the Eastern European states to alter their social systems as a result of the criticism--nor is this the objective--but we can hope that in the long run this criticism could perhaps lead to a gradual change in the attitudes of the Eastern countries, so that we could reach a much greater degree of common understanding of how the Helsinki Final Act's provisions can best be honored.

[Question] So, the Russians have sat and listened to tough criticism for several weeks. Does this mean that they want to continue the CSCE work despite everything?

[Answer] They probably realize that this debate has come to stay. It is a price they must pay for their participation in the CSCE process in Europe. Also their tolerance threshold for criticism seems to have been raised over the years.

In the CSCE work the Soviet Union has attached great importance the whole time to the "forward-looking" aspects; that is to say that they attach the greatest importance to discussing new proposals and less importance to discussing how the Final Act has been observed. For the Russians, the proposals for a conference on military detente and disarmament are of crucial importance. Great importance is also attached to the proposal for an expansion of economic cooperation. We must also assume that the Russians see the CSCE as a useful forum in which to further their general interests. [answer ends]

Mevik said that the issue of a conference on confidence-building measures and disarmament in Europe will be of central importance when the conference reconvenes 27 January. There are five different proposals: A French proposal supported by the NATO nations, an Eastern one put forward by Poland, and the Swedish, Romanian and Yugoslav proposals. In addition, Finland has sketched out a disarmament program for Europe.

"The French proposal involves a new concept of confidence and security in Europe based on the adoption of a number of confidence-building measures of real military significance. They are to be binding and verifiable and apply to the whole of the European continent, right up to the Ural Mountains in the Soviet Union. It is of particular importance that one of the CSCE countries, that is the Soviet Union, should not occupy a privileged position as regards its territory. If this proposal leads to positive results it will then be decided whether a conference on military disarmament should take place.

"The Polish proposal also embraces two phases, but the confidence-building measures have a more traditional character and are vastly different from the type included in the French proposal. The Eastern proposal is also vague on a number of points and is probably intended to lead to a discussion of controversial questions such as renouncing first use of nuclear weapons and not expanding the existing military alliances in Europe," Mevik said.

[Question] How do you rate the chances of reaching agreement on such a conference in some form or another?

[Answer] Norway attaches great importance to the question, and we are working actively to bring about a conference. If we succeed CSCE will acquire a whole new dimension. So far disarmament questions have not been on the agenda. However, we must face the fact that East-West relations are particularly complicated and in some respects subject to crises. Under these circumstances there is every reason to view the possibility of a disarmament conference with great sobriety and realism. However, we must be optimistic, if we are to work on these questions, even though I am not optimistic about the chances of achieving results in the short term.

[Question] And what of the chances of reaching agreement on a new followup meeting in the CSCE process?

[Answer] I firmly believe that there will be a new meeting. Romania has formally proposed that it be held in Bucharest and Belgium has proposed Brussels. If we do not achieve any results today, we must keep the machinery working and the communication channels open. I do not believe in confrontation and breakdown, but we will encounter many difficulties in Madrid when we try to reach agreement on new measures before 5 March.

CARRINGTON INTERVIEWED ON HORN OF AFRICA SITUATION

[Ilfat al-Qattami report: "Lord Carrington: 'The Situation in the Horn of Africa Is Serious'"]

[Text] Cairo, from ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT bureau--British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington and the Egyptian officials have agreed that the situation in the area of the Horn of Africa is deteriorating. Whereas Egypt praised France's military role, Lord Carrington strongly criticized it.

Replying to a question by ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT as to whether his expression of Britain's anxiety about the instability in the area could lead Britain to play a direct role like the French role in Chad or to move its naval vessels in the gulf in order to tip the balance in favor of the moderate states, Carrington said that France has interests in Chad which is a former colony. He added: We believe that the best way to maintain stability in the Horn of Africa is to give advice and aid to the states in the area. American forces are stationed in Somalia and they are prepared to move whenever it may become necessary.

Replying to another question about the possibility of Britain taking advantage of the military facilities in Egypt in the near future, he said: I do not believe that we need to do so unless the situation changes and we cannot predict this now. He added: It is the presence of foreign forces in the area that has led to the instability.

Lord Carrington then spoke about the European initiative to resolve the Middle East crisis, confirming its importance. He said that PLO participation in the peace efforts is necessary.

JOURNALIST DISCUSSES INCOMING U.S. ADMINISTRATION

[Richard Beeston article: "Reagan Rides in With the Sun on His Back"]

[Text] With only a few days to go before the new Republican administration takes office, Americans on the whole seem rather relieved with the prospect of having Ronald Reagan in the White House. Even many who voted for Jimmy Carter are now not sorry to see him return to Georgia and there is a growing feeling that Reagan, if not the most brilliant of America's presidents, may just have the instinct and the judgment to lead the nation through the difficult four years ahead.

It is a tribute to Mr Reagan's skillful election campaign, and a fairly flawless and good-natured period of transition, that the image of the pistol-toting B grade movie actor and likely warmonger is now being transformed into that of a reassuring father figure who will be 70 next month. President Eisenhower is the most popular analogy for the new president and many Reagan supporters hope he will turn out to be another Ike, who will run the nation like a chairman of the board, relaxed, able to delegate but with an instinct for the right decisions.

In Eisenhower days America was incontestibly number one and her problems less complex than those facing Mr Reagan in the 'eighties. Like President Carter, Mr Reagan can expect a honeymoon period with his electorate and Congress--but it may be a short one.

The bad economic situation was the main cause of Carter's downfall. It was summed up in Carter's own words as "the misery index" of inflation plus unemployment, a phrase which Reagan used in the campaign. Now it is the new administration's biggest domestic challenge and success or failure in dealing with it will determine to a large extent Reagan's relations with Congress.

The administration will need to hold unemployment below 8 percent and inflation below 15 to keep Congress reasonably loyal. So far, it is resisting advice to declare "martial law" on the economy with a wage and price freeze to head off what one leading Republican Congress member has warned could be "an economic Dunkirk."

The first big test of Republican economic principles may well be over whether to subsidise Chrysler or risk letting the ailing giant automobile corporation go down the drain. Yet, generally, while the incoming administration is extracting publicity from the economic mess left behind, it will take the same austere road as Mrs Thatcher.

Reagan's economic team has turned out to be more imaginative than might have been expected, given his close ties with orthodox Californian businessmen. His treasury secretary, Donald Regan, head of the nation's largest brokerage house, Merrill Lynch, and his budget director, David Stockman, are both innovative and flexible, supporting an unorthodox policy of tax cutting and tax benefits which was the core of Reagan's election campaign.

Donald Regan, in his Senate confirmation hearings, has predicted "a major improvement" in the economy within 15 months but has already conceded that the administration's 1983 target for a balanced budget had now slipped a year.

The American hostages in Iran is another problem that Reagan looks like inheriting from the Carter administration unless the present last-minute round of negotiations should succeed by Friday--the final deadline set by the president. "What is flat, answer "Tehran, if Reagan wins," was a joke current during the election. Reagan said in the campaign that he had "some ideas" of his own about freeing the hostages, but now no one expects him to cut the present dialogue with Tehran, if it is still alive when he takes over, or substantially change the negotiators.

As long as the wellbeing of the hostages remains the first priority, Reagan will have to take the same road as Carter. But if negotiations break down, or there is a move to put the hostages on trial, Reagan will certainly take a tougher route. He had earlier hinted that he might set a deadline for the hostages release with unspecified consequences for Iran if it is not met and would certainly demand tougher sanctions against Iran by Britain and America's other allies. The hostage issue will be raised during Mrs Thatcher's visit to Washington next month, if it is still current.

The president-elect and his supporters, who once saw Mrs Thatcher's monetary policies as a shining example of a bold new way to go, now believe that the British experiment is going to the bad and are looking for ways to avoid getting into the same situation. There is also dissatisfaction in Washington over the lack of unity within the NATO alliance, with the "wets getting wetter," and for the need for more unity in the face of the Soviet threat to Poland.

Mrs Thatcher, however, of all the allies, is seen as sharing the closest views on foreign affairs with the Reagan administration, while the new American secretary of defence, Mr Caspar Weinberger, is a declared anglophile.

Mr Reagan's choice of Gen Haig, former supreme commander of NATO, as secretary of state should help the alliance through what experts believe may be an ominous period ahead. With the new president lacking in foreign experience, Haig may become the most powerful foreign secretary in many years--and a likely future contender for the Presidency.

There are some who predict dangerous tensions developing between Haig and his former patron who brought him to the White House in the first place, Dr Henry Kissinger. Kissinger has the star rating, the contacts and the intellectual background that Haig lacks. At the moment, apparently the doctor also has the ear of Mr Reagan.

Kissinger's recent tour of the Middle East and Africa, where he spoke more like a secretary of state than a private individual, could be the start of a tense relationship with Haig, particularly if Kissinger tries to upstage Haig after he takes office. Kissinger once tried to acquire a role for himself in the Reagan administration during the Republican convention in Detroit and his moves are being watched with considerable suspicion by the State Department and by Richard Allen, Mr Reagan's national security adviser who was ousted from a White House job by Kissinger during the Nixon administration.

Another controversial person who will have some "input" into the new administration is Mr Nixon himself. Now emerging from the shadows of Watergate, Nixon was the one who urged most strongly Haig's appointment as secretary of state. Mr Reagan's top adviser Edwin Meese said recently: "I think that the president-elect views Mr Nixon as a valuable adviser whose advice is very welcome and very much appreciated."

The "continuing challenge of reading Soviet intentions," as the outgoing Secretary of State Edmund Muskie put it recently, will continue under Reagan to be one of the gravest problems facing America. In his confirmation hearings Mr Weinberger repeatedly referred to a gap in the strategic balance between America and the Soviet Union which he said would have to be closed before the new administration could resume negotiations on limiting strategic weapons.

Since the invasion of Afghanistan, American-Soviet relations have reached one of their lowest points for years and the Reagan administration's preparedness to abandon, if necessary, detente, and "link" any agreement the Soviet Union seeks to the Kremlin's behaviour in the world, is going to test allied unity. In his rejection of the long-negotiated SALT II treaty, Reagan said during the campaign that Russia's policy of aggression would in future be linked to any arms control pact, and that America cannot negotiate about arms "and pretend the Soviet Union is not invading Afghanistan."

The Reagan administration is committed to a new build up in American military strength and Weinberger has announced that it would be "a good six months" before America would be ready to discuss any new arms agreement with Moscow. To put things in persepctive Reagan observed recently that the Soviet Union itself is "not all that invulnerable," adding that "maybe it's time to stop thinking of the Soviets as being ten-foot tall."

OFFICIALS MEET WITH ARAB LEAGUE'S KLIBI

[Text] London--Arab League Secretary General Chedli Klibi yesterday met with Douglas Hurd, British minister of state at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, at the Foreign Office. They discussed Arab-British relations, the Arab-European dialogue and the European initiative. Official sources described the meeting as "important."

During the meeting, Klibi emphasized the significance of the PLO's role in any future peace talks, asserting that no just and comprehensive solution can succeed without PLO participation and approval and that Reagan's new administration should take this matter into consideration if it wants a just and comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

Klibi also met with Denis Healey, Labor Party deputy leader and shadow foreign secretary. The discussed British-Arab relations and the role which the Labor Party can play to establish a just and comprehensive peace in the area.

Klibi will meet with Labor Party leader Michael Foot today, Tuesday.

PASOK ACCUSED OF UNDERMINING NATIONAL DEFENSE

AT141450 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 14 Jan 81 p 1

[Text] Indirectly but firmly yesterday the government accused PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou of undermining the country's defense by trying to force a government statement on the existence or nonexistence of nuclear weapons in Greece. The government considers such a revelation damaging to national defense. Under this light the government spokesman yesterday simply reiterated an older statement by National Defense Minister Averof in the Chamber of Deputies in which he refused to reveal the existence of nuclear systems on Greek territory, citing the country's security. By contrast, the chairman of PASOK, both in his original statement and in a counter statement on negotiations on the U.S. base issue, considered the existence of nuclear weapons in Greece as a fact and asked that the people should be informed on the matter.

The statement by PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou was as follows:

"Negotiations continue between the Greek Government and the United States on the preparation of a new defense agreement on U.S. bases in Greece. It is already well known that the U.S. goal is not only to make the presence of its bases in Greece permanent but also to get full acceptance from the Greek Government on the following:

"1. Expansion of the operating radius of these bases beyond the NATO alliance area.

"2. Decisive overthrow of the balance of military forces between Greece and Turkey in the Aegean.

"3. The final demarcation of operational control zones in the Aegean at the expense of our national sovereignty.

"Until now the government has not considered it its duty to brief the Chamber of Deputies which, according to the Constitution, is the only appropriate body to rule on agreements for the stationing or transit of foreign military forces through Greek territory.

"Unfortunately the governments of New Democracy have not even told the truth to the Greek people because during repeated debates on national issues in the Chamber, they have maintained that there are no U.S. nuclear weapons or systems in Greece.

"I sincerely regret because I am forced to denounce these allegations as lacking in truth. This is because over and above the nuclear weapon potential available to England and France in the European area, there is also another number of European countries--West Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, Italy, Turkey, Greece, Portugal--which have U.S. nuclear systems on their territory under a "double key." This means that missiles for launching nuclear warheads are stationed in these countries together with the nuclear warheads themselves. The nuclear warheads, however, are under U.S. control.

"This is a critical issue because the presence of nuclear systems on Greek territory presupposes our country's fate and the fate of our people in case of a worldwide clash."

Replying to the statements of PASOK Chairman Papandreou, a government spokesman stated: "The Greek Government has stated it is negotiating with the United States on an agreement on U.S. bases with the interests of Greece as the only criterion. Only the other day the Greek Government also stated it will present this agreement to the Chamber of Deputies for ratification. The chairman of PASOK, therefore, is concerned in vain.

"As to nuclear weapons, the minister of national defense repeatedly stated in the Chamber of Deputies that whether he announces the existence of nuclear weapons in the country or whether he denies their existence, he would in either case undermine the country's security.

"It is in vain, therefore, that the chairman of PASOK attempts to draw the government into making a statement which is so harmful to the country's defense."

In a counterstatement A. Papandreou said: "The fact that the Greek people will know that nuclear weapons do or do not exist in Greece allegedly undermines the country's security. This is a peculiar viewpoint because the Greek people are the only ones who do not know. I refer both the minister of national defense and the prime minister to a U.S. administration publication (dated 27 Oct 1980) under the title, "NATO After Afghanistan."

This publication was submitted to the U.S. House Committee on Foreign Affairs. On page 19 it maintains that U.S. nuclear systems are stationed on Greek territory. If the minister of national defense does not know of this publication then it would be better for him to resign. If he does know of it then he is deceiving the Greek people and the representatives of the nation in the Chamber."

Answering Papandreou, National Defense Minister E. Averof made the following statement:

"I know of the U.S. publication. It is of no particular interest to me. What is of interest to me is what the government, being responsible for the country's defense on the basis of the peoples' mandate, will say. I do believe that the country's defense as well as its negotiating ability will be impaired whether I state that nuclear weapons do exist in the country or whether I state that they do not exist."

KIPRIANOU MEETS WITH OPPOSITION PARTY LEADERS

KKE-Interior Leader

141235 Athens I AVYI in Greek 14 Jan 81 p 1

[Excerpts] The support of the KKE-Interior to the defense of the rights of Cyprus remains absolute. This assurance was given to the president of the Republic of Cyrpus by the KKE-Interior delegation, made up of B. Dhrakopoulos and L, Khirkos, which visited Spiros Kiprianou yesterday afternoon.

The president of the Republic of Cyprus yesterday also met PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou, leader of the Center Front G. Mavros, secretary general of the dogmatic KKE Kh. Florakis and EDA Chairman I. Iliou.

The secretary of the Central Committee of KKG-Interior made the following statement on the meeting between B. Dhrakopoulos and L. Khirkos:

"We have had an extremely interesting and friendly discussion and exchanged views on the progress of the Cyprus problem. President Kiprianou firmly insists on the line of the Makarios-Denktas and Kiprianou-Denktas agreements which are the line of course acceptable to all Cypriots. We assured him of our absolute support in the defense of the rights of Cyprus, we underlined that the United States, under its new leadership, will multiply its pressures in an effort to enforce unacceptable solutions and expressed the hope that all patriotic forces in Cyprus will strengthen their common front for a just solution by averting the dangers created by severe disagreements between them.

"During the conversation, President Kiprianou stressed that the Government of Cyprus will never accept faits accomplis."

Answering the question, the chairman of PASOK said that "it is not enough that Greece supports Cyprus theoretically. It must consider the Cyprus issue as the number one national issue and it must mobilize all the forces of Hellenism."

On his part G. Mavros stated there is no justification for any optimism over the development of the Cyprus issue and that the new intercommunal dialogue will have the same fate shared by the previous eight rounds of dialogue.

EDA Chairman I. Iliou stressed that a solution of the Cyprus issue is still distant because of intensified Turkish intransigence while Kh Florakis supported the internationalization of the Cyprus issue and the continuation of the intercommunal dialogue.

KKE-Exterior Leader

AT141330 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 14 Jan 81 pp 1,9

[Excerpts] The full support of the KKE for a just solution to the Cyprus issue which guarantee an independent, sovereign, integral and demilitarized Cyprus was once again reiterated by the secretary general of the Central Committee of the KEE, Comrade Kh Florakis, in a statement made after his meeting yesterday afternoon with President of the Republic of Cyprus Spiros Kiprianou at the Grande Bretagne Hotel.

Comrade Florakis stated: "I would once again like to reiterate that the KKE firmly supports every effort of the Cyprus Government toward a just solution to the Cyprus issue. When I say a just solution I mean an independent sovereign, integral and demilitarized Cyprus.

"President Kiprianou underlined for me that the Cyprus issue is at a very difficult phase and we agreed on this estimation. The state of the Cyprus issue is as sufficiently difficult and complicated as the general international situation is complicated and tense, particularly in the east Mediterranean area where Cyprus occupies an exceptional strategic position. Without in any way trying to diminish an inviolable principle of our party, in other words non-intervention in Cypriot domestic affairs and our respect of the right of the Government of Cyprus to establish its policy and its tactical handling of the Cyprus issue, I would like to express certain thoughts because after Greece's reintegration into NATO's military wing we have a new situation. It is obvious that particularly today and as a result of the intensified cold war policy of the U.S. and NATO imperialists they are all demanding, with every increasing strength, a more NATO-oriented Cyprus whether it is either in or out of NATO. We believe this is connected to the indisputable fact that the leaders of the Turkish Cypriots have again hardened their position at the intercommunal talks to a great degree.

"All this demonstrates that we must view the Cyprus issue not simply as a domestic Cypriot problem but as a problem which has an international character. Consequently, the efforts for intercommunal talks must be related to the internationalization of the Cyprus issue which, according to our viewpoint, will be the basic support for the defense of the just demands of the Cypriot people."

After his meeting with Comrade Florakis, the president of the Republic of Cyprus made the following statement: "I have had a very interesting discussion with Florakis. I was given the opportunity to brief Florakis on all the latest developments of the Cyprus problem. There is a coincidence of views that the Turkish Cypriot side has hardened its position. There is also a coincidence of views that although an internal Cypriot dialogue is being conducted, the Cyprus problem is basically an international problem of vast dimensions and that its internationalization must not be abandoned. Perhaps at this moment it is necessary to have additional efforts for the further internationalization of the Cyprus issue which, I must agree, will be a support for the Cypriot cause and the people of Cyprus."

Constitutent Assembly Plan

[Head of State Gen Kenan Evren's public address in Konya on 15 January--recorded]

[Excerpt] Since the day we came to power we have been saying that we will pursue correcting the present state of affairs, that we will return to the democratic system. We even announced our plan that we would first struggle against anarchy, that we would then set up the constituent assembly which would in turn pass the important laws such as the new constitution, the election law, the law on parties and the necessary laws that will prevent the country from falling into a similar situation. Then, we said, we would hand over the government to an administration loyal to the Ataturkist principles. [cheers, applause] That was the word of honor of a soldier.

The constituent assembly will be established on a date between 30 August and 29 October. However, let me point out, the National Security Council will not remain outside. The National Security Council, if I may make a comparison, will carry out the duties of a senate. [cheers, applause] The laws that come from the constituent assembly will come to us. If we change the laws, they will be put into effect in their amended form--not as in the old days, when the law would go back to the assembly if it was changed by the Senate. In other words, if we approve a law approved by the assembly it will go into force. If we change certain parts of a law approved by the assembly, then the law will go into force in its changed form.

We have constantly been asked when the constituent assembly will be established. I am stating it now: Unless there is a big obstacle, the constituent assembly will be set up on a date between 30 August and 29 October. We are now in the process of preparing the relevant laws.

Let me point out something more: We will not allow any of the parties into the constituent assembly. [applause and cheers]

They should not have high hopes: We will not leave the country in the hands of people who caused this sad state of affairs. [cheers, applause]

It is being claimed that it is difficult to raise politicians, that it is not easy. Very big politicians will be raised in this country. Very big men have emerged from this nation, do not worry. [applause, cheers]

PAKISTANI PRESIDENT ENDS VISIT, LEAVES COUNTRY

BA141602 Karachi Domestic Service in Urdu 1500 GMT 14 Jan 81

[Excerpt] President Mohammad Ziaul Haq has said that Pakistan and Turkey hold fully identical views on all bilateral and international issues.

Addressing a news conference in Ankara today, he said that not only do the two countries share the same views, but they also share common values. He described his talks with the Turkish leaders as an extremely friendly exchange of views and said he was fully confident that the relations between the two countries will continue to remain most friendly.

When the president was asked if there was any discussion of a defense agreement between the two countries, he replied in the negative.

Replying to a question, he said Pakistan has special relations with China. He said friendship with the Islamic countries and China is the most important feature of Pakistan's foreign policy.

Referring to the Iran-Iraq war, he wished that the two countries would end the war and initiate a dialogue to resolve their dispute.

Regarding Afghanistan, the president said Turkey fully agrees with the Pakistani proposal to settle the Afghanistan crisis through negotiations. He said Pakistan has always enjoyed Turkish support on the Afghan problem. Replying to a question he said Pakistan's proposal for a dialogue under UN auspices does not suggest any shift in Pakistan's policy on the issue. He said it is not tantamount to a fresh effort and that Pakistan adheres to its stand and the principles on which it is based.

Regarding his talks with the Turkish head of state yesterday, he said they also discussed the possibility of forming a common point of view for the Islamic summit in Jidda.

[Excerpt] The president has said that by forming the proposed federal advisory council he is trying to provide for maximum popular participation in the running of the affairs of the country. Addressing a news conference in Ankara, Gen Mohammad Ziaul Haq said the people have already selected their representatives at the local, district and divisional levels throughout the country. He said a system of government will eventually be formed in Pakistan that will be in accordance with Islamic principles and that will be liked by the people.

The president said he and his colleagues are determined to run the administration of the country according to their [word indistinct] capabilities until such a government is formed. He added that the people will be included in it as much as possible in this regard. He said he is trying to expand the federal cabinet, which will comprise the members of the armed forces and various civilians.

Replying to a question, he said elections are not ends in themselves, they are means to achieve ends. He said patriotic people from all walks of life agree with me that the present situation in the country is not suitable for elections.

Answering a question regarding the settlement of the Afghanistan crisis through negotiations, the president said that Pakistan's call for a dialogue on the issue is aimed at securing the implementation of the resolutions of the Islamic foreign ministers' conference and United Nations on Afghanistan. Replying to a question on the Afghanistan situation, the president said that Pakistan has become a frontline state as a big power is its neighbor. He said Pakistan respects the Soviet Union and desires cordial relations with it.

Replying to a question on the Kashmir issue, the president said Pakistan wants to achieve a friendly and cordial settlement of the issue. He said Pakistan is determined to resolve the issue according to the UN resolutions and the Simla agreement. Though there have been differences between the two countries on the Kashmir issue, Pakistan is trying to establish friendly relations with India and other neighboring countries, and that is why we are in favor of settling the Kashmir issue, he added.

MINISTER OZAL BEGINS FINANCIAL CONTACTS IN BONN

The Turkish and FRG delegations were about to complete their talks when this newscast was prepared. Tomorrow, Ozal will meet Vice Chancellor and Foreign Affairs Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Ozal will brief him on the latest developments in Turkey, and they will discuss general world issues, mainly the Middle East question.

VOTCP WARNS AGAINST U.S. MIDDLE EAST PLANS

[Station commentary: "The Town Is Flooded"]

[Excerpt] NATO generals, U.S. diplomats, imperialist businessmen and the despotic administrators of monetary organizations like the IMF are uninterruptedly arriving in Turkey in great numbers. This rush continues despite floods, rains, and snow and regardless of the time of the year. They are arriving on civilian or military planes as well as on fighter planes--the fastest ones.

NATO Southern Europe Flank Commander U.S. Admiral Crowe suddenly appeared in Ankara 2 days ago. He apparently had very urgent matters to settle. He met with the leaders of the junta. The junta did not issue any statements in connection with the meetings, which were held in camera. As always, these talks were concealed from the public. However, U.S. sources do not heed this secrecy. The English-language DAILY NEWS, which is published in Turkey, let the cat out of the bag and said that Crowe held talks on problems regarding NATO agreements. According to well-informed sources in Ankara, however, during the talks, Admiral Crowe sounded out the junta and pressured and influenced it to drag Turkey into the U.S. imperialist adventure of expansionist plans in the near and Middle East and the Persian Gulf. In other words, Crowe forced Turkey to interfere in the internal affairs of its neighbors. This is (?part of) the U.S. and NATO pressure flood. Furthermore, the President of the United States has been changed. Carter was replaced by Reagan. There is no difference between the two. Reagan appointed former NATO Commander Haig as secretary of state. Haig used to visit Cankaya [the presidential mansion in Ankara] constantly. Even before assuming his office, Haig is talking about atom bombs. He is talking aggressively about bombing and destroying. He says that all past U.S. administrations have supported fascist, military and reactionary regimes and dictatorships and the Reagan administration will continue to do so. The man is clearly stating that he is opposed to peace and detente.

Expansionist U.S. imperialist circles wish to pressure Turkey through such a plan. This constitutes a way to destruction. Complying with such a U.S. plan would be fatal to our people. As long as Turkey remains in NATO, this danger will continue to threaten us.

This threat will persist as long as U.S. NATO bases continue to exist on our soil and the bilateral slavery agreements are not torn up. Our crisis cannot be overcome without the establishment of a progressive and democratic power paving the way to socialism. If the current situation continues, our people will continue to sing the song "The Town Is Flooded." However, they will be able to sing only if the Pentagon's nuclear arsenals do not burn our soil and turn us into ashes.

AUSTRIA WILLING TO TRANSFER U.S. HOSTAGES PAYMENT

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "Payments for Hostages to Tehran via Vienna?"]

[Text] Vienna--Austria has declared its readiness to help in the financial transactions necessary in connection with the release of the U.S. hostages detained in Iran, if this should be required. A report to this effect was discussed at the last cabinet meeting on Tuesday, after Algeria which mediates between the United States and Tehran had asked the Austrian Government if it were ready to accept a U.S. cash and gold deposit for implementing the payments.

The Austrian Government has answered in the affirmative, provided that the United States requested such services. The United States has been informed of Austria's positive reaction and has gratefully acknowledge it without, however, directing such a request to Austria to date. To be prepared for any contingencies, a small technical committee has been set up at the National Bank that is to prepare the necessary financial operations.

SOCIALIST PARTY APPROVES GOVERNMENT RESHUFFLE

AU151159 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 15 Jan 81 pp 1-2

[Summary] At a meeting in Vienna on 14 January, the Austrian Socialist Party [SPOe] National Executive Committee approved Chancellor Kreisky's proposals for a government reshuffle, and nominated Health Minister Herbert Salcher as new finance minister to succeed Hannes Androsch, who is to become a director of the nationalized Creditanstalt Bank; Nationalrat Deputy Kurt Steyrer as new health minister, to succeed Salcher; university professor Hans Seidel, head of the Institute for Economic Research, for the newly created post of state secretary at the Ministry of Finance; and Minister Fred Sinowatz as vice chancellor, succeeding Vice Chancellor and Finance Minister Androsch.

After the SPOe Executive Committee and Presidium sessions, Chancellor Kreisky declared that Androsch was expected to resign from his government functions next Tuesday, 20 January, and that the new cabinet members could be sworn in the same day. He added that for this year no further changes in the cabinet were planned but that there might be another government reshuffle next year.

Brandt En Route to Berlin

[Excerpts] Berlin, 15 Jan (DPA)--Berlin Mayor Stobbe's plan to reshuffle the Senat came to grief in the Berlin House of Representatives today. According to information current in Schoeneberg town hall this afternoon, Stobbe intends to relinquish the post of governing mayor in favor of Science and Research Senator Peter Glotz. In the elections necessitated by the government crisis following the collapse of the Bautechnik KG building firm, the four candidates nominated by the SPD for the post of senators failed to secure the necessary majority of the 135 representatives, with 70 voted for and 64 against and one abstention. After the vote, the leader of the CDU group, Diepgen, called for Stobee's resignation because his Senat had failed. The reaction of the SPD leadership in Bonn to the defeat of the Berlin Senat has been one of dismay and concern. The spokesman of the SPD executive, Schwartz, said that after the negative vote--which speaks for itself--Party Chairman Willy Brandt has decided to examine the present situation in Berlin in person. Brandt this afternoon was on his way to Berlin.

DEFENSE MINISTER COMMENTS ON ARMS EXPORTS, PLANNING

[Text] Bonn, 15 Jan (DPA)--In the opinion of Federal Defense Minister Apel, there is no need for the Federal Republic to become the world's number one arms exporter. In a discussion on German TV tonight, he also showed his annoyance at the "shortsighted" version presented by Government Spokesman Becker of a cabinet meeting on the subject of pacifism. According to Becker's account, Apel had complained about increasing pacifist trends in the Federal Republic. He, Apel said, wanted a discussion of the conditions for safeguarding peace. It was difficult to make it clear to laymen how the various elements of security policy fit together. The Bundeswehr is serving peace.

Apel made it clear that there must be an assured equilibrium of military forces. If the West could bring this home to the USSR it certainly would show an interest in arms limitation. Apel assured the United States of Europe's solidarity and said he is pleased that the new U.S. Government will have politicians who know what Europe thinks and needs. Apel said that allegations that the Bundeswehr's arms planning shows a deficit of DM10 billion are incorrect. The problem is that what has been ordered must be made payable. He however cannot agree to a new tactical strike plane for the 1990's. Ships also require new thinking.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU ON U.S. LATIN AMERICA POLICY

[Karl Grobe editorial: "Vietnam Once Again?"]

[Text] The dictators of El Salvador can still rely on big brother. In the last week of his varicolored term, U.S. President Jimmy Carter sends "U.S. advisers" to the civil war theater and thus buries for good the fine intentions of human rights policy and the moral claim with which he won the election 4 years ago, indeed quite some time ago.

The transition to the policy which successor Ronald Reagan proposes to pursue and which his choice of secretary of state, General Alexander Haig, has so clearly called by its proper name, is proceeding smoothly.

According to Haig, the interests of the United States rank higher than treaties such as the OAS charter. The denominator to which he has reduced his policy as he would like it is anticommunism. The concept dating back to cold war times shines through, a concept which the John Foster and Allen Dulles brothers followed: Each partner is welcome provided it turns against Moscow. There is a free world in which, so it follows, any terror is allowed if it is not done by reds. It is permissible to conclude alliances with despots like Syngman Rhee in South Korea (his heirs today are possibly even harder dictators) and Ngo Dinh Diem in Vietnam, the main thing being that they are not communists. In Vietnam, this policy was followed by a war whose devastations have not yet been overcome by the country. In this war, the United States fought with all arms palliatively called conventional, and yet it lost. It managed to have the Lao-Dong party prevail as the only alternative and to win out in the end, just as the Soviet Union, by its intervention in Afghanistan, probably will cure the central Asian mountain country of socialism for good.

The focus of U.S. foreign policy is narrowing dangerously. Some planners only see the surroundings through the observation slits of tanks, as it were. All there is left are enemies and conspirators and anyone who stands up against U.S. interests, therefore, right away is bound to be a communist. The moral memento which some idealists wrote into the U.S. Constitution some 204 years ago that all human beings are equal and that they have the basic right to freedom (also from colonial dependence) and to happiness has been overcome. There is an East-West conflict and that's that.

But what are the interests of the United States? By Central America it is possible to show that bananas are meant when the talk is about freedom. Nearly everywhere, it is the control over raw materials and, naturally, also markets that matter and not such moralizing rubbish as the human rights of which an ambitious politician from Georgia once spoke before he changed. Two decades ago, it dawned on another U.S. President that there is another world-political interconnection which might be briefly described as the North-South conflict. It deals with the emancipation efforts of the developing countries which are dependent on the world market; their international capital utilization; great power interests which are exploited by indigenous oligarchies and sucked dry by a hungry, young early capitalism. In these countries, the desire of the poor majority of the people increases for overcoming social oppression, lack of rights, hunger and impotence. In these countries, very thin strata of absolute rulers exist whose mother tongue does not always originate with the United States or Europe, but whose own ambitions and thinking habits are allied with, and have been marked by, the north of the globe. In many countries, including countries in Central America, they are "brown-skinned Yankees" and they look down on their peoples with contempt. Is it in the interest of farsighted policy to rely fully on their staying in power? Once before, in Vietnam, the United States failed with such a policy course. In Cuba, in Nicaragua, in Peru, temporarily in Chile and increasingly also in other Latin American countries, the United States elicits the ire of whole nations because it props up corrupt, terrorist, arrogant oligarchies even though the mere study of serious U.S. newspapers could make it learn better and even though the intelligence services also submit adequately telltale material.

However, the opponents of the good old policy of confrontation are bound to be communists. It is as simple as that. Each and every social reform movement, and much more so any revolutionary revolt, is taken as the work of Moscow's agents. As a result, any reform movement in the so-called free world leads to confrontation with the other superpower. On a long-term basis, this policy is extremely dangerous. It may lead to war. But obviously, Gen Alexander Haig already has stated with a view to wars such as in Vietnam or in El Salvador that as far as he is concerned there are more important things than peace. Perhaps a resolute Western statesman will make it clear to him that as far as Europe is concerned nothing is more important than peaceful survival under conditions determined by Europeans themselves.

RED BRIGADES RELEASE JUDGE D'URSO 15 JANUARY

[Excerpt] Rome, 15 Jan (ANSA)--Judge Giovanni D'Urso kidnapped by the Red Brigades on December 12, went home at noon today four hours of questioning at police headquarters immediately following his early morning release.

D'Urso was freed unharmed in Rome this morning by his urban guerrilla abductors after thrity-five days of captivity. He was found tied up, gagged and bundled in a blanket on the back seat of a small car parked on a cobblestone street in downtown Rome not far from the Justice Ministry building where he is employed.

He had earphones blaring loud stereophonic music into his head.

Police and reporters rushed to the scene after the ANSA News Agency received a call from the Red Brigades announcing, "we are left D'Urso alive in a light brown Fiat 127, license plate N57211, in Via Portico Ottavia, in the Jewish ghetto."

The site was a short distance from the spot where Christian Democrat Party Chairman Aldo Moro's body was found on May 9, 1978, fifty-four days after he was kidnapped by the same guerrilla group.

D'Urso, a senior Justice Ministry official who arranged for the transfer of guerrilla prisoners to top security jails, was driven to police headquarters where he was reunited with his family and questioned about his ordeal by investigating magistrate Domenico Sica.

"I need rest, give me a cigarette", he was reported as saying in his first utterance as a free man.

D'Urso was given a medical checkup at police headquarters and was found to be in "perfect physical and mental condition". Sica, the magistrate in charge of the kidnap investigation and a friend of D'Urso, described the judge as "extremely lucid" in his account of the experience. The kidnap victim told Sica that he had been brought out of his hideout before dawn today and told "we're letting you free soon" during a long drive, which he reckoned had lasted about two hours. He said that a long time, maybe more than an hour, lapsed before police arrived on the scene after the kidnappers parked the car and left him.

He was dressed in the same clothes he was wearing when nabbed by the Red Brigades near his home as he was returning from work on the evening of December 12. Fragmentary police reports about his account to Sica this morning indicated that he had not been drugged during captivity.

He told the investigating magistrate that he had gone through a tough time, although he received decent physical treatment and was served good meals.

The Red Brigades hooded him during their cross examinations so he was unable to see or hear the exact voice of his inquisitor.

The abductors announced their decision to free D'Urso Wednesday in a message saying that the kidnapping had achieved its purpose and therefore "proletarian justice" could afford "an act of magnanimity".

Pope's Comments

AU151620 Rome ANSA in English 1600 GMT 15 Jan 81

[Text] Vatican City, 15 Jan (ANSA)--Pope John Paul II was one of the first to formally voice his pleasure today over Judge Giovanni D'Urso's release.

Vatican Press Spokesman Father Romeo Panciroli told reporters that the pope was informed about D'Urso's release after reciting a morning mass in his private chapel.

"In the Vatican there is great satisfaction and comfort after the anxiety of recent weeks and the heartfelt appeal from the pope," Panciroli said. "The pope was immediately informed of the liberation of Judge D'Urso and was extremely happy to learn the news," he added.

John Paul issued an appeal to the Red Brigades Sunday for D'Urso's release:

"I beseech the Lord to touch the souls of those who hold in their hands the person and life of the magistrate, that they may reflect on the gravity of their action and listen to that sentiment of humanity which cannot be extinguished in their hearts," he told a crowd of 10,000 in St. Peter's Square.

The Vatican has since confirmed that the pope met with the kidnapped judge's wife, Franca D'Urso, Sunday morning.

RED BRIGADES MEMBERS ARRAIGNED IN MORO SLAYING

AU151615 Rome ANSA in English 1605 GMT 15 Jan 81

[Text] Rome, 15 Jan (ANSA)--Italian judicial authorities arraigned fifteen Red Brigades suspects today on charges of kidnapping and slaying Christian Democrat Party Chairman Aldo Moro and murdering his five-man escort. The indictments were handed down in a sentence marking the conclusion of judicial investigations into the 1978 Moro affair.

The investigating judge cleared two radical leftists, Franco Piperno and Lanfrance Pace, of charges connected with the Moro kidnapping and slaying, overruling recent recommendations for their indictment from the public prosecuting attorney. Also cleared from charges in the Moro slaying today was Toni Negir, a Padua University professor in jail for more than a half [as received] on charges of instigating subversion, and Patrizio Peci, a so-called "repentent terrorist" whose revelations since his arrest have provided investigators with valuable tips.

Another figure often linked to the Moro kidnapping, "Front Line" leader Corrado Alunni, was also cleared of the crime.

The fifteen suspected Red Brigades members arraigned today were Prospero Gallinari Adriana Faranda, Valerio Morucci, Mario Moretti, Enrico Triaca, Teodoro Spadaccini, Gabriella Mariani, Antonio Marini, Barbara Balzerani, Franco Bonisoli, Lauro Azzolini, Rocco Micaletto, Raffaele Fiore, Luca Nicolini and Cristoforo Piancone.

The only two suspects arraigned today who are still at large are Mario Moretti and Barbara Balzerani, both of whom have been wanted for years. According to investigators, Moretti was the mastermind of the whole Moro kidnapping.

MINISTRY AIDE ON DEFENSE REQUIREMENTS, BUDGET

LD160843 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 8 Jan 81 p 3

[Defense Ministry Secretary of State Sven Hirdman article: "Advance Political Warning More Difficult"]

[Text] One of the most important tasks of defense policy is to make our neutralist policy credible in the eyes of the world. This is no easy task. Many people think it something of a paradox that a country with 8 million inhabitants should be able to defend itself in a superpower war. However, our total defense system is based on tangible realities.

We have adapted our defense forces' objectives to the situation which has prevailed in Europe for a long time now and which looks as if it will continue to do so--a situation with two power blocs which balance each other. In a European conflict we estimate that either one of the two power blocs would only be able to deploy limited forces against Sweden, since it would be occupied with resisting the other power.

The total deterrent balance is such that no one ought consciously and intentionally to start a war in Europe. However, a military conflict could arise in an atmosphere of strong political antagonism as a result of poor judgment and overreaction. The process which would precede such a military conflict should give us advance warning. In general terms our country's strategic importance would be much greater in a conventional war than in a nuclear war. For this reason a conventional defense forces has an important deterrent role to play for us.

The long time it takes to make decisive changes in defense strength gives rise to special complications. The defense debate on the problems of the 1990's is often misunderstood, especially abroad, to apply to the defense strength in the 1980's.

The long time it takes for the defense forces to feel the effects of measures adopted now comprises another psychological problem. Support for our neutralist policy is very broad in Sweden and an overwhelming majority probably also considers that we ought to defend our neutrality with force if we are attacked. However, it is not so easy to make people understand that our future defense capability, and consequently the future of neutrality, is dependent on the economic sacrifices we make today.

The crucial significance of Swedish neutrality and Swedish defense policy for the Nordic countries' security stability in peacetime is unfortunately often overshadowed in the public debate in Sweden. We take it for granted that the peace and detente which has ruled in the Nordic countries since the war will continue and do not always realize how changes in Swedish policy can affect our neighbors and through them us.

Our total defense system is vulnerable in several ways:

Unlike many other countries we have a defense force based on mobilization and practically no standing forces apart from parts of the air force and navy. This means that we would be vulnerable in a conflict's introductory stages, before we have had time to mobilize to full strength. From a contingent of serving conscripts of 35,000 men, the army, for example, will swell to 600,000 men, something which takes a few days at least.

Because of the lack of large standing forces it is important for Sweden to have good political and military advance warning of what is happening in our immediate area and how this could affect us. This is necessary so that we will have time to adapt our own mobilization measures to prevailing circumstances. All the most recent defense commissions have stressed the value of a good military intelligence service. This we do have as far as the situation in our immediate surroundings and possible changes in the short term are concerned.

On the other hand, advance political warning in the longer term has become a more difficult task as a result of the reversals in the international situation and the tenser relations between the superpower blocs. Who today would dare predict with any certainty how East-West relations will be in a year's time or what the final consequences of events in Poland will be?

Connected with the changes in the international situation and developments in military technology is the question of evaluating our immediate and longer-term defense readiness respectively. Since World War II we have traditionally put our efforts into a long-term strength buildup rather than into greater initial preparedness. The less certain international situation and the greater technical possibilities of surprise attacks has made both the defense minister and the commander in chief want to strengthen our capacity to quickly adopt measures which raise our level of preparedness.

For reasons outlined in the security policy article, Sweden can be assumed to be of increasing interest as a potential strategic corridor area for the superpower blocs. This makes it possible to envisage situations in which various forms of political blackmail could be directed at Sweden. For example, a superpower could demand the right to fly over Sweden in order to attack targets in other countries. In order to be able to offer political resistance to such demands we need physical resources to prevent the violation of our territory.

Sweden's large expanse of territory requires a balanced defense force. We cannot have certain advance knowledge of where a threat to our territorial integrity might originate and must therefore be able to concentrate at short notice our forces to a part of the country under attack. For this we need swift mobile units in the army, navy and air force alike.

Qualified mobile units cost money, as everyone is aware. But as in so many other contexts, a chain is no stronger than its weakest link. Thus there must be a well-planned distribution of our various defense resources, so that we have a reasonable capacity for meeting the more probable threats to our security.

In the budget year 1980/81 the defense forces will cost around 16.2 billion kronor, of which 400 million kronor will go to civil defense. Economic defenses, which are not included in the sum above, will cost 1.1 billion kronor.

In the sixties and seventies defense, unlike other areas of heavy spending, had a negative growth rate, as the table shows:

Purpose	Percentage of total public consumption in 1977	Growth 1963-77 in percent	Growth in volume per year
Defense	11.3	-6	-0.4
Education	21.2	81	4.3
Health services	24.6	114	5.6
Social services	15.8	204	8.3

In 1982 a new 5-year defense resolution will be adopted by the Riksdag. The resolution is being prepared by a parliamentary defense committee, which is to submit its report in the fall of 1981. Two important questions on which the committee must reach a decision are the future peacetime organization of the Swedish defense forces and the question of a new aircraft.

As far as peacetime organization is concerned the simple truth is that today we have too many army regiments, flotillas, naval bases and coastal artillery regiments in relation to the number of wartime units these are to train and equip. The number of qualified wartime units has decreased, partly because material has become more expensive, but also more effective, while the number of peacetime units has remained more or less the same since the war, apart from in the air force.

To find the money for the necessary renewal of wartime defense organization 10-20 peacetime units and schools must be disbanded, during the eighties, if similar savings cannot be made in other ways in peacetime running costs. The dissolution of so many units will undoubtedly be a difficult and painful process. However, it will be partly eased by the fact that the annual intakes of 18-19-year-olds will decrease in size from the middle of the eighties as a result of population trends.

The biggest single defense question which the Riksdag will have to decide in 1982 is the successive replacement of the Viggen system by a new system of aircraft, JAS. At present, the Swedish aircraft industry is working on proposals for a domestic version of the JAS, which will be lighter and cheaper than the Viggen and also tailormade to meet operational demands during the nineties and later.

This makes great demands on the competence of Swedish industry. Cooperation with firms abroad on various subsidiary systems is therefore necessary to keep costs down and to gain access to the technology needed to construct an integrated aircraft which at the same time is light, advanced and cheap. If we do not succeed in this it would only remain to buy the Viggen's successor from abroad despite the divergence this would represent from our traditions in the last three decades. This is a fully realistic alternative which the Riksdag must consider in 1982.

The size of the problem is indicated by the fact that the high command estimates the costs of the next aircraft system at around 20 billion kronor by the end of the century. A difficult question to decide will be how these costs are to be distributed over the years; development costs are especially heavy initially.

Swedish arms exports are the subject of frequent debate; most recently in an interpellation debate in the Riksdag . Basically the situation is such that Sweden is self-sufficient in materiel for the Swedishdefense forces to a considerably greater extent than countries of a comparable size. Almost 80 percent of all equipment is bought within the country. Sweden is one of the very few nations with domestic production of aircraft, submarines, tanks and missiles. The fact that we are able to manage on our ownto such a large extent gives important support to our neutralist policy.

However, to be 100-percent self-sufficient would be unreasonably expensive. For this reason we import arms and certain electronic equipment, for example, from various countries. For the same reasons we export certain products to keep development and production costs down. Because of the small production needed to cover Swedish defense needs we would in the case of some products not be able to keep production going inside the country with the negative consequences this would have for ourselves and for our role in the Nordic countries.

Swedish military materiel exports amounted last year to around 1.4 billion kronor, that is, a little over 1 percent of all exports. This year military materiel exports are expected to be a little higher. In general these exports vary greatly from year to year.

In Sweden the export of military materiel is surrounded by tough restrictions. If an export is to take place, express permission from the government is required, and here foreign policy considerations carry a great deal of weight. According to the current guidelines, arms may not be exported to countries involved in conflicts or which could be expected to use arms for internal oppression.

Proposals to limit the arms trade have been presented in the United Nations on a number of occasions. Such proposals have always come up against firm opposition from the developing countries, among others. They have found it difficult to see that it is morally justified for the developed countries to continue their domestic arms production to satisfy their security requirements, while the developing countries, which have neither the money nor the ability to produce their own military materiel, are denied the opportunity to purchase the arms they consider themselves to need for their security.

NUCLEAR REACTOR STARTUP DELAYED 2 MONTHS

LD151605 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 13 Jan 81 p 40

[Text] The Swedish State Power Board will not be able to commence commercial operation of Ringhals 3, Sweden's eighth nuclear reactor, until around 1 April. This is 2 months later than planned and is due to problems with a new feedwater system, Ringhals management said.

Ringhals 3 was primed with nuclear fuel on 1 July 1980 and is now operating at 75 percent capacity. Full capacity operation will begin in a month's time. The reactor will then be shut down for checks before the so-called 600-hour test starts on 1 March. This test is the final check before commercial operation can start.

The commencement of commercial operation means that the supplier, the U.S. company Westinghouse, transfers responsibility for the reactor to its owner, the state power board. This is expected to happen on 1 April. Ringhals will then produce around 6 billion kilowatt hours per year.

KIPRIANOU RETURNS FROM ATHENS, MAKES STATEMENT

[Text] President Kiprianou, who returned from his Athens visit today, expressed full satisfaction over the results of his talks with Greek President Karamanlis and the Greek Government.

In a statement at Larnaca airport, President Kiprianou added that during these talks a very broad review of the Cyprus issue was conducted. He said: We have reached joint conclusions and assessments and there has been absolute unanimity on future ways of handling the problem. President Kiprianou then referred to the unchanged Turkish intransigence. He stressed, however, that our side will continue the dialogue with good intentions in the hope that the other side might respond positively to our good will. President Kiprianou reiterated that, on our part, every effort would be exerted to achieve progress through the dialogue. He stressed: If progress is not made or if the dialogue fails, the full responsibility would be with the Turkish side because of the intransigence it is demonstrating.

President Kiprianou further said that Greek Prime Minister Rallis had assured him that every effort would be exerted by the Greek side to increase the economic aid to be given to Cyprus this year. He added: Mr Rallis and I also discussed the question of missing persons in which the Greek prime minister showed strong interest. He went on: At the same time, we have agreed to coordinate our activities toward various countries in order to promote our national cause. President Kirpianou reiterated that the identity of views that resulted from the Athens talks was not a form of speech but reality. He stressed: The Greek Government's support is multifaceted and firm and it will continue until the Cypriot people have been vindicated in their struggle for freedom.

The president of the Republic stressed that his visit has been successful in every respect and also gave the Greek people the opportunity to express their feelings of solidarity with the struggling Cypriot people. He concluded: I am absolutely positive that we are jointly facing the issues in a correct manner and will jointly continue to face them.

[Text] At the talks held between the president of the Republic of Cyprus, Mr Spiros Kiprianou, and the Greek prime minister, Mr Yeoryios Rallis, and attended by the foreign minister of Greece, Mr K. Mitsotakis, and the foreign minister of Cyprus, Mr N. A. Rolandhis, the representative of the Greek Cypriot side to the intercommunal talks, Mr Y. Ioannidhis, the ambassador of Greece to Nicosia, Mr K. Zakarakis, and the ambassador of Cyprus to Athens, Mr D. Hatzimiltis, and other officials, a wide review of the latest developments in the Cyprus problem and an assessment of its prospects were made in the light of the start of the fourth cycle of the intercommunal talks. The problems facing the intercommunal dialogue were also examined and it was established that an essential prerequisite to the end of the deadlock and the achievement of progress in the direction of a just and lasting solution of the problem is that the Turkish Cypriot side should adopt the necessary constructive attitude. Both governments reached common assessments on the approach to the matter and reiterated their opposition to acceptance of the faits accomplis.

Both sides expressed their gratification for the opportunity given them for a mutual briefing and an exchange of views. The Greek Government reiterated to the Cyprus Government its full support to its efforts for the promotion of a just and nationally acceptable solution to the Cyprus problem.

KIPRIANOU DISMISSES NEW TURKISH PROPOSALS

NC151013 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 15 Jan 81 pp 1,8

["Answers" by Cypriot President Kiprianou to questions posed by O AGON Athens correspondent Mimis Kostandinidhis at Grande Bretagne Hotel in Athens--date not given]

[Excerpts] Elections: I have thus far refrained from expressing views on the elections in order not to influence any party. Of course, I may have views on this matter, but I do not wish to express them now because I do not want to influence anyone. This is my view on the elections issue.

Denktas proposals: The latest Turkish proposals are worse than the previous ones. In reality, they provide for a pocket of 10,000-12,000 enclaved persons under Turkish occupation. Consequently, the proposals do not give even a margin for discussion; they are absolutely unacceptable. The Greek Government also completely agrees with the Cypriot Government's views on this issue.

I return to Cyrpus absolutely satisfied with my contacts in Athens. We had a lengthy exchange of views with President Karamanlis, Prime Minister Rallis and the Greek Government. Our views on all issues were absolutely identical. We examined the most recent handling of our national issue in light of the latest developments and agreed upon future handlings. In all my contacts with President Karamanlis, Prime Minister Rallis, Papandreou, the leader of the main opposition party, and other party leaders, I ascertained that Greece is on the side of Cyprus. I also wish to stress that the atmosphere during all my meetings was cordial. Once again it was ascertained that the relations of the Greek and Cypriot Governments are excellent in all aspects.

Mr Atakol, replying to a question, said that during his stay in Saudi Arabia he would also have discussions with officials of the Islamic Development Bank on the financing of several development projects in the TFSC.

KIPRIANOU TALKS END, JOINT COMMUNIQUE ISSUED

AT151300 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 15 Jan 81

[Text] Full satisfaction over his talks with the Greek Government was expressed by Cyprus President Kiprianou who departed Athens shortly before noon today on his way to Nicosia.

At Ellinikon Airport Kiprianou stated that full unanimity of the two governments was established during the talks on the handling of the Cyprus problem.

Kiprianou was seen off by Foreign Minister Mitsotakis who stated that discussions were completely successful. Mitsotakis added the Greek Government agrees on the necessity of the inter-Cypriot dialogue and of elimination of the faits accomplis.

A joint communique was issued this morning on the conclusion of the Greek-Cypriot talks, which mentions the following:

During the talks conducted by President of the Republic of Cyprus Kiprianou and Greek Prime Minister Rallis--in the presence of the Greek and Cypriot Foreign Ministers, Mitsotakis and Rolandhis; the representative of the Greek Cypriot side at the intercommunal talks, Ioannidhis; the Greek Ambassador to Cyprus, Zakharakis and Cypriot Ambassador to Athens, Hatzimiltis and other officials--there was a broad review of the latest developments of the Cyprus issue and an evaluation of prospects created in view of the commencement of the fourth round of intercommunal talks.

There was an examination of problems with which the intercommunal dialogue is faced and it was established that the existence of a constructive position from the Turkish Cypriot side is an imperative prerequisite for lifting the impasse and for achieving success in the direction of a just and permanent solution to the problem.

The two governments reached joint conclusions on approaching the issue and reiterated their opposition to acceptance of faits accomplis.

Both sides expressed satisfaction for the opportunity which was offered to them for mutual briefing and an exchange of views.

The Greek Government, the joint communique concludes, reiterated to the Cyprus Government its full support and encouragement in its efforts toward promoting a just and nationally acceptable solution to the Cyprus problem.

Kiprianou, Mitsotakis Statements

AT151630 Athens Armed Forces Television Service in Greek 1600 GMT 15 Jan 81

[Text] Cyprus President Kiprianou completed his 4-day visit to Athens and departed for Nicosia at 1145 today. Rolandhis and Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriot representative at the intercommunal talks and the Greek ambassador to Cyprus departed with him.

At Ellinikon Airport, Kiprianou was seen off by Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, the Cyprus Ambassador in Athens Hatzimiltis and other officials. Shortly prior to his departure Kiprianou made the following statement:

[Begin recording] I am satisfied because there is absolute unanimity both in respect to evaluations as well as in respect to future handling. What I am saying is not a form of speech. This is the truth.

We agreed that every possible effort must be made so that the dialogue which is being conducted in Cyprus will produce results. Already, as it is known, the Greek Cypriot side has made huge efforts in an attempt to achieve progress and it has demonstrated good will from the start. It will continue to demonstrate good will.

Unfortunately the dialogue did not have any positive progress. On the contrary, it remained in the exploratory stage and, as a result of the Turkish position, we were unable to break the deadlock. If there is to be progress in the inter-Cypriot dialogue it is essential that the Turkish Cypriot side abandon any plans it may have in mind. It must come to earth, it must negotiate seriously for an honorable solution to the Cyprus problem.

It is not necessary for me to reiterate that on our part there is no question of our ever recognizing faits accomplis. Nor is it possible for us to accept partitionist solutions in any form. We believe that the unity of the Cypriot state and the unity of the Cypriot people will not only bring peace and calm to the country but that it will also be to the benefit of the entire people of Cyprus and particularly to the benefit of the Turkish Cypriots. [end recording]

Then Mitsotakis said:

[Begin recording] I would also like to stress that the discussions we had were conducted in a spirit of brotherly unity and were absolutely useful and successful. We have truly agreed, as President Kiprianou said earlier, both on evaluations and on prospects as well as on the handling which must be undertaken.

The results are reflected in the communique issued. I would simply like to add that the Greek side is also in full agreement on the usefulness, I would like to say the necessity, of the dialogue which is being conducted. Naturally, there are difficulties in its progress. This, however, must in no case lead us to a negative position vis-a-vis the only method left open for us. I would further like to add and once more to stress that the Greek side is also in full agreement on rejecting faits accomplis. [end recording]

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO SELL SUBMARINES TO TAIWAN

OW161958 Paris AFP in English 1949 GMT 16 Jan 81

[Text] The Hague, 17 Jan (AFP)--The Dutch Government decided today to stick to its decision to sell two submarines to Taiwan despite threats of diplomatic reprisals from People's China. Prime Minister Andreas van Agt announced tonight after a cabinet meeting.

Mr Van Agt said that no argument had been put forward to make the government change its mind.

"We have reason to believe that China was issuing a warning in this affair to President-elect Ronald Reagan," Mr Van Agt said.

Last week, Beijing had threatened to recall its ambassador to the Netherlands and downgrade its diplomatic ranking there. Beijing said it would also ask The Netherlands to recall its ambassador to China leaving the Dutch mission headed by a charge d'affaires.

Meanwhile, Johannes Kneppelhout, Dutch ambassador to Beijing has criticized his government's position in the dispute.

No U.S. Advisement

OW181902 Paris AFP in English 1852 GMT 18 Jan 81

[Text] Apeldoorn, The Netherlands, 18 Jan (AFP)--Holland today flatly denied China's charges that The Netherlands had decided to sell two submarines to Taiwan following suggestions of advisers to U.S. President-elect Ronald Reagan.

Foreign Minister Christoph van der Klaauw told reporters here that his country had not sought Washington's approval or disapproval of the move.

However, Norweigan Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund had received explanations of American policies on the matter, Mr van der Klaawu said.

The Dutch Government approved the sale for employment reasons and the decision was not based on foreign policies, he said.

He said he thought that China was trying to warn Mr Reagan, who will become President on Tuesday.

Earlier today the official New China News Agency [NCNA] openly accused Mr Reagan's officials of backing The Netherland's planned sale of the submarines.

Mr van der Klaauw said that he did not bring up the subject during his visit to China in November as the sale was not decided. But he said he had discussed Taiwan in detail with his Chinese counterpart Huang Hua, with special reference to just what Beijing would tolerate in the island's relation with the West Friday that the subs were discussed during the Beijing talks. [as received]

NCNA dismissed as "lies" the suggestion that China had been given warning of the sale.

GENSCHER ADDRESSES STUTTGART FDP CONVENTION

DW160919 Bonn PRESS SERVICE OF THE FREE DEMOCRATIC PARTY in German 6 Jan 81

["Excerpts" from speech by Hans-Dietrich Genscher, federal foreign minister and chairman of the FDP, at the Epiphany convention of the Baden-Wuerttemberg FDP in Stuttgart on 6 January]

[Excerpts] Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, dear fellow party members: A year ago we ushered in the political year with the slogan: "Courage for Freedom and Courage for Responsibility."

For the liberals, it was a year with many ups and downs. The good showing in Baden-Wuerttemberg was followed by the party's holding its ground in the Saarland and then by the crash in North Rhine-Westphalia.

To some people reform means spending more money for more people. They forget that as a consequence more and more people are able to keep less and less of their earnings.

We see the limits of the welfare state, not only for material reasons, but also because the progressive and detailed involvement of the state or of public institutions of the most diverse nature will make us more dependent and will suffocate individuality. Social security, however, actually ought to create more independence and a life more worthy of man.

Nobody calls into question what has been created in our country in line with the implementation of the basic law requirement for a social state of justice. It is a firm component of our system of social justice. It still requires further development in some places.

But room must remain for self-help, room for initiatives supported by voluntariness and marked by individuality. Wherever they are suffocated, a bit of freedom is lost at the same time. It is necessary at long last for people to realize how much civic will exists for sharing in the decisionmaking process in all spheres of life.

What matters to many people is more freedom, more responsibility, more humaneness, healthier living conditions. This in particular is our job. The reduction of state activity and decentralization is necessary to make initiative and changes possible at all. What is valid today more than it ever was is that liberality, understood freedom in responsibility, constitutes the motive force of social progress.

We are aware that our economic stability and potential are also the result of the responsible attitude displayed by the trade unions. We do want open cooperation with the trade unions based on mutual respect. But I want to make this absolutely clear: We will never take orders, not from the trade unions, the employers or the churches.

We Free Democrats unreservedly avow the principle that safety has priority above economic interests in the peaceful utilization of nuclear energy. But to the extent new power stations are inevitable for the sake of safeguarding our energy supply, their construction should not be procrastinated. This does not mean going overboard on powerplant construction, but rather the courage to make a decision establishing to what extent nuclear energy is inevitable and to what extent the construction of the necessary powerplants in this situation will provide an investment push and wil reduce our energy dependency on a medium-term basis.

It is now the political leadership's task to show the limits of our material options. It is neither unsocial nor unrealistic to say that we must make a real effort. The times are past, at least for a few years, when it was possible to earn more while working less. We must not live beyond our means. This applies to finances and energy consumption alike. In this way, and with diligence and a wealth of ideas, we will overcome the deficit in the balance of payments, but not with travel restrictions. What matters is exporting more instead of traveling less.

Our country's citizens are haunted by anxieties, not only because of the economic problems but also, and much more so, because of developments in many parts of the world. It is the result of the fundamental decisions of German postwar politics that the Federal Republic of Germany today is a member of the family of nations doing its part in shaping this family and wielding increasing international weight. These were the decisions regarding membership in the Western alliance, membership in the European Community, the policy of balance of interests and cooperation with our eastern neighbors and the policy of strengthening the independence of the Third World.

We derive our security from the Western alliance and from the European Community. It also is here alone where we find the foundation for our policy toward the East. All the headway achieved in East-West relations and in the inter-German relationship was scored because of, and not despite, our affiliation with the two Western communities. Anyone who tries to cast doubts on these relationships and on these memberships must know that our weight, also in East-West relations, depends on the weight we wield in the Western communities.

The predictability of German foreign and security policies must be a definite quantity in our relations with our Western partners as well. This, by the way, also determines our weight and our value as detente partners for the East. The great challenges of our time include the growth of the nuclear destruction potential. Arms control and disarmament are the inalienable tasks of mankind's survival. We welcome the intention of the new U.S. leadership to continue the negotiations on strategic nuclear weapons. It was a great success for our policy that we succeeded in getting the negotiations on the medium-range weapons going through the dual decision on these weapons.

Those who are beginning to quibble over and call into question the dual decision or at least a part of it, namely the counterarming part, ought to please consider that in doing this they would deprive negotiations on medium-range arms of their foundations.

The result of such action would be lasting Soviet superiority and then instability as well as insecurity instead of arms limitation, disarmament, balance and stability. These are not individual decisions to be discussed at random, but rather the substance of the entire Western security and disarmament policies. They may not be called into question.

We know that the Soviet Union also has its needs for security. We recognize this and we expect the Soviet Union to do the same with regard to us. The policy of the West vis-a-vis the East remains unchanged and is aimed at cooperation and a compromise of interests on the basis of a balance. We want to achieve a balance on as low an armament level as possible.

This policy is an offer of responsibility for world peace and for the development of the Third World. A new arms race would endanger both. The hungry people of the Third World admonish us. With the help of cooperation with equal rights, they want to overcome famine, illness and ignorance and they do not want to be tutored or suppressed. Afghanistan and the worldwide reaction to it should be reason enough for the Soviet Union to alter its thinking. The policy of predominance has no future. The world's will for self-determination has become stronger.

The Soviet Union's leadership, which will outline at its party congress in February 1981 the policy for the coming years, ought to realize the seriousness of the Western will for cooperation as well as the advantages offered through this policy. Cooperation presupposes, however, that all involved adhere to the principles of the final document of Helsinki.

As serious as the will for cooperation is, the Western will to stand its ground is just as serious. In the interest of peace and its own freedom, the West will not tolerate eastern superiority. Our policy of responsibility and our offer to the East to cooperate presuppose a powerful Europe, an alliance able to act, as well as close cooperation of the Europeans with the United States.

Here in this room, U.S. Secretary of State Byrnes on September 1946 opened the way for Germany's economic reconstruction. The decision leading to Secretary of State Byrnes' speech was one of the indispensable building stones of an economically, socially and politically stable Europe. On the threshold of a new year and in view of great challenges for world peace, we ought to be aware this year that Europe and America belong together, also in the future.

Only if Germans and Americans, Europeans and Americans, act in awareness of their common responsibility for freedom and democracy, for self-determination and human rights will we be able to preserve peace.

Only a Europe determined to do all that is necessary for its security will be fulfilling its duties toward itself and the common transatlantic security of Europeans and Americans. This is not seen as clearly everywhere in Europe as it is seen in France, for example. Europe must not consider itself a lodger in the boarding house of American defense preparedness. Together with the United States, it must demonstrate its will for defense and its ability to defend itself if it wants to be able to act in foreign policy and if it wants to be creative in the East-West and disarmament dialogues.

The United States is not a watchman for Europe whom one can call on and who will come free of charge if possible.

The answers to the great challenges of our time must not be sought by Europeans only in the unquestionably important agrarian market reform, in the quarrel about market orders or the quarrels between the organs of the Community. If Europe considers only such things, it will embark on stagnation and thus will deteriorate. It would be abandoning international politics. Europe needs a new political impulse. It needs a visible step in the direction of European union.

I ask you, has the time not come at long last for a treaty on European union so as to orient the interrelationship already existing within the European Community and among the 10 member states more strongly toward union; to strengthen the internal cohesion of the Community so that the Community will be in a position to solve the difficult internal problems forthcoming in 1981-82, psychologically as well; and to consolidate the bases of concerted action in foreign affairs and thus to enhance the weight of the Community as the partner of the United States and, jointly with the United States, in international politics.

The objectives of a European union must be: the development of a common European foreign policy, the improvement of the Community policies in keeping with the treaties of Paris and Rome, coordination of security policy, cultural cooperation and the harmonization of legislation. All these demands are not new. They can be found in many documents. However, the time is ripe to put them into practice.

We Germans here in the heart of Europe must ask ourselves time and again what we can do to prevent tensions from aggravating and what we can do to lessen tensions and improve cooperation.

Europeans do not want another confrontation nor do they want any aggravations of the situation nor delimitation. What they want is to live and work in peace. They want to fill up rather than deepen the trenches. This is especially true for the Germans in their divided country.

Visits, meetings, cultural exchange, sports exchange, youth exchange--this is what the Germans in east and west want, not delimination. Peace and cooperation, this is what the people in east and west expect in 1981. No differences whatsoever exist in this respect in factories and schools, in homes and churches, in our country and in the GDR. Here and over there alike, people hope for peace and cooperation. They demand it and pray for it. This is why it was profoundly in keeping with the convictions and feelings of Germans in both parts of our country that Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and State Council Chairman Erich Honecker declared last year that war must never again emanate from German soil. This is the historical responsibility of the Germans. It is our duty toward the peoples of Europe and of the world.

But this must not be where the commitment of the Germans and the joint commitment of the Federal Republic of Germany and the GDR end. Additional tensions and burdens on the East-West relationship also must not emanate from German soil. Peace and cooperation mean much more than nonwar. We are realists. We are aware that the inter-German relationship cannot develop in isolation from the overall climate in East-West relations.

It is sheer illusion to assume that inter-German relations can be kept out of a worsening of the East-West climate. Besides, it would entail dangerous consequences for cooperation and the ability to act on the part of the alliance and of the European Community. This must not, however, be cause for resignation and inactivity, much less for a policy of additional burdens on East-West relations, a policy of aggravating tensions. What the German people want is not increased minimum exchange amounts but alleviated tourist travel.

To the great extent possible, they wish to visit each other without being impeded by bureaucratic obstacles, since they are not responsible for being separated. As much as possible, they wish to be allowed to travel in the west-east direction, since travel in the east-west direction is possible generally only for old people.

What they want is for the governments of the two states to consider ways of improving cooperation and ways of making it easier and better for people to get together instead of thinking up ways to create even more elements of separation at a time when the whole world wants difficulties to be overcome.

The Federal Republic of Germany and the GDR are called upon to set an example in the desire for cooperation and understanding, proceeding from the basic treaty and fulfilling its spirit:

1. No additional burdens on East-West relations must emanate from the relationship between the Federal Republic of Germany and the GDR. This means that neither side is allowed to seek to change anything in the basic treaty and the modus vivendi that has been found. This also includes our attitude toward the citizenship issue which once again was made known to the GDR at the conclusion of the basic treaty and which remains unaffected by said treaty.

We do not force anybody to accept German citizenship nor do we claim anyone for us against their will. But we reject making Germans from the GDR aliens by means of law or otherwise. German citizenship in the interpretation of our basic law and in accordance with our legislation is not affected by the GDR law on citizenship. This is what the chancellor rightly stated to the Bundestag.

In implementing the Final Act of Helsinki in all its parts, the Federal Republic of Germany and the GDR should seek to attain maximum fulfillment [of this Final Act] in their relations with each other. This means that it should be the ambition of the two German states to apply, at least in East-West relations, the most far-reaching provisions applicable, to all questions serving man's well-being; travel options; exit permits and family reunions; the solution of humanitarian questions and questions concerning economic, cultural, and sports cooperation and concerning youth exchanges.

The Federal Republic of Germany and the GDR ought to seek ways of cooperation everywhere and not to seek delimitation against each other. This means that it ought to be the common aim of both German states not to do anything that could separate the people in Germany from each other, but to exploit all opportunities for cooperation, despite the different state and social systems and despite their belonging to different pact systems.

The policy of the Federal Republic is aimed at this goal. We prefer cooperation to delimitation. We prefer the meeting of people rather than their separation. We prefer an objective exchange of opinion. With the aim of achieving objective results, our policy toward polemics is a program of soberness and realism. Out policy is an offer of good-neighborly relations, of cooperation and of service for the people.

The fruits of such a policy can be harvested on this side and on the other and they will be useful for East-West relations. We know that the Germans in the east and in the west cannot basically change the situation, but it ought to be at least their aim to bring positive and not negative influence to bear on this situation. We call on the GDR leadership to pursue this policy of responsibility together with us for peace and cooperation in Europe.

Ladies and gentlemen, the responsibility entrusted to us by the voters on 5 October 1980 has become greater. The election outcome has not made us insolent. This is demonstrated by our restraint in personnel demands. But we feel even more committed to our totally liberal policy. We do not lay down our liberal identity at the cabinet door. We want the government we support to work objectively and purposefully. Times are serious enough, there is no room for coalition quarrels.

The people have elected the government parties to govern and not to lament, not to plot against each other or to speculate about how long the federal chancellor will be in office. Neither of the two coalition parties has the absolute majority, therefore the ability to compromise is necessary as is mutual concern.

That does not affect our independent status. We do not hide the fact that we sometimes prefer to be different from them. That does not bring on self-pity, but rather causes us to be more active in exerting our strength to convince others. Because of its world position and responsibility, our country needs a government that can act and make decisions. We face this responsibility.

Both government parties will best do justice to this responsibility if they begin with determination to implement the coalition agreement and the government statements, as well as passing the 1981 draft budget adopted in the presence of the faction chairmen and the budget spokesmen. The convincing strength of a coalition also depends on doing what has jointly been planned. We want to fulfill our duty toward our citizens and convince them through loyalty to principles, reliability and objective work.

The tasks we are facing are great. We, the liberals, have demonstrated time and again that it pays to live in and for our liberal society. We want to show that despite all its shortcomings--we do not claim to have patent recipes or a philosophy of infallibility--it is not merely the most effective, but also the most humane and just society.

The great opportunity for our society does not lie in the development of state or organizational power, these are the dangers and handicaps. The great opportunity for our society lies in the varied initiatives of individuals and their engagement. We know that the future does not belong to the powers that be and not to a tutored society. The future belongs to the liberal society where mature people act with courage with regard to freedom and responsibility.

GENERAL DISCUSSES COUNTRY'S NATO CONTRIBUTION

[Article by Lt Gen Lothar Domroese, SHAPE deputy chief of staff]

[Text] Important decisions will have to be made by the Federal Defense Ministry, the Federal Government and the Bundestag in early 1981, pertaining to security and defense policies, but particularly to the Bundeswehr.

This applies to the size of the defense budget, just as it applies to the necessary coordination in our alliance on the German contribution to and share in the protection of German security interests within and without the NATO treaty area. The catch phrase in this respect is "division of labor."

But at stake as well is very concrete individual decisions as to what is to be done in the next several years with the funds that can be expected, funds that in any event will be extremely scarce.

Arms projects are involved, for example, the Leopard II tank, Roland and Nike missiles and their successors, theater nuclear forces and land-based sea war facilities, the number of systems, the timing of procurement, the consequences of agreements concluded and commitments undertaken in the national and international sphere.

The procurement of ammunition for weapons systems in service and new weapons systems, for training purposes and as a war reserve, and the new construction and remodeling of ammunition depots are involved.

Funds for research and development, with consequences for the future German contribution [to the alliance], the effects on the "two-way street" as well as the fallout for the industrial sphere with consequences for the promotion of new scientific manpower are involved.

These are but examples. Much more needs to be decided after the "inventory" of the Bundeswehr scheduled by the defense minister for February-March.

It is no trouble to predict that the public discussion on the "appropriate" strategy will be revitalized in connection with this "inventory" and the decisions on arms projects. The question concerning the validity of the NATO strategy of flexible response will continue to be raised.

This must be welcomed for it is only if broad consensus exists on strategy that we can hope that the required funds for defense and the proper priorities for the armed forces and their suitable structure within the framework of the Federal Republic's defense contribution will be defined.

A word about strategy: NATO's strategy of flexible response, which has been valid for more than a decade now, is the appropriate strategy for today as well, just as it is valid for the foreseeable future. It will retain its validity for as long as no technological breakthrough--comparable, say, to nuclear weapons or long-range missiles--leads to a fundamental qualitative change in the arms arsenal. The strategy of flexible response in particular is the strategy aimed at preventing war; it is a strategy based on deterrence but does allow waging war with the appropriate means in the event this deterrence fails. We must keep in mind in this context that all contemplations such as those concerning "area defense" or even "area covering defense" cannot claim to be considered a "strategy." At best, they can be classified under the aspects of "defense concept" or "operational leadership."

The first inspector general of the Bundeswehr, retired General Deusinger, stated in 1966 in three lectures at Heidelberg University (that sort of thing did exist in the Federal Republic of Germany 15 years ago): "I believe that what we should understand by strategy today is the pooling of all considerations and means in all fields in peace and war and orienting them in a planned way toward a specific objective. This specific strategic objective today is not war at all, but rather the problem of maintaining peace." This maxim, I think, continues to be as applicable today as it was in 1966.

The demand for preventing war makes it necessary for the United States to make available adequate strategic nuclear weapons and adequate theater nuclear forces in Europe with limited support by European NATO partners. Necessary decisions on these two pillars of the triad of flexible response have been taken.

But what about the conventional forces of the alliance, the third pillar of the triad? For more than a decade now, that is, since the very date when NATO's strategy of flexible response was put into force, many white papers, NATO communiques and statements by government members time and again affirm the Warsaw Pact's superiority over NATO in ground and air forces, especially in central Europe. Keeping this in mind, it is all the more amazing that the measures taken in the alliance for the purpose of eliminating this potentially fatal weakness to date have not been adequate. For several years now, the concept of Europe's reinforcement by air and ground forces from the United States, Canada and Great Britain in the case of tension has been available, a concept which was developed by NATO command authorities and recognized as appropriate by all sides. The impressive maneuvers of these reinforcement contingents in the Federal Republic of Germany during the past few years are well remembered.

Many of us know about the headway made under the generic term "host nation support" for these reinforcement contingents in Norway, Denmark, the Benelux states and the Federal Republic of Germany in the past few years. Many of us know the services rendered to this end in the infrastructure and its costs. Many of us know that each U.S. division or brigade of these reinforcement contingents requires double the heavy arms equipment--on ready in the United States and for others in Europe. This is a costly but necessary concept lest the narrow European area be converted into a permanent army camp even in peace times.

All these preparations notwithstanding, the transfer of these large units from overseas to the Federal Republic of Germany, or those from Canada to Norway, takes time. Will we have this time in all cases?

A brigade, for example, has a personnel strength of several thousand. It has several hundred tanks, armored personnel carriers and self-propelled carriages. In short, it has weapons systems which are heavy and of considerable size. Special transport capacities thus are needed and, above all, time to make these army units available in good time on another continent; that is to say, to make them available for the protection of NATO territory or of vital interests of singular or several partners in the alliance outside of Europe, for instance, in the Gulf region.

Another future problem will emerge. Will we continue having at our disposal adequate army units from the United States for Europe under the reinforcement concept? I purposely have referred only to large components of the ground forces and not to air and naval forces, since surely other criteria are applicable to the latter two. The occupation of Afghanistan by Soviet troops and the war between Iraq and Iran have made it quite clear to a broad public in Germany that not all security interests of our country, in fact those of most NATO member states, are not covered by the alliance alone and by alliance commitments that have been undertaken.

Thus, the question inevitably arises as to who should protect these interests and how. Permit me to recall in this connection considerations by some people to expand the NATO treaty or at least to expand the treaty area. Politically responsible people have hastened to reject this idea. It has ceased to play a role in a public discussions that needs to be taken seriously.

The occupation of Afghanistan made many people aware of the significance of the balance of forces, particularly the military balance. Many realized how limited the NATO partners' military means are at the moment which are available for the protection of individual, several or all alliance partners outside NATO's sphere of influence.

White papers may most convincingly represent the ratio of strength of the Warsaw Pact's conventional armed forces--more attentive, impressive and alarming is still the actual use of military means of power. No arguments exist calling this into question.

It remains to be stated that for the future defense of the Federal Republic of German, forward defense remains the indispensable demand. A "minimum" of divisions or brigades is necessary for defense. Under an MBFR agreement, numerical strength calling in peacetime will become valid. Less reinforcement units from overseas would be available for the defense of central Europe, if they were stationed outside NATO's sphere of influence, such as in the Gulf region. The consequence of the last point is that the European partner must offset the absence of U.S. forces, if the efforts to avoid war are not to lose their credibility.

Political reasons, together with a limited availability of suitable armed forces, soon led after the occupation of Afghanistan to the suggestion of a division of labor between the alliance partners. Hans Apel, the federal minister for defense, commented on this at the international defense policy meeting in February 1980 in Munich--a division of labor including political, economic and military fields.

One of the aspects is the division of labor among the ground forces of the alliance. I assume that the United States will in any case make ground forces available outside NATO's sphere of influence wherever the interests of individual or several treaty partners must definitely be protected. Consequently, these ground forces will not be available for the common defense of Europe, that is, also of our country. They will have to be replaced by others.

A solution offers itself to the Federal Republic of Germany for the setting up of reserve brigades which can be mobilized quickly. They must be incorporated into the field army and subordinated to the planning of NATO command authorities. Their equipment, armament, setup and training must be fully equal to that of the brigades. They must carry out "same missions under equal conditions."

Just to rule out misunderstandings: None of the U.S. forces stationed in Europe have been slated so far for action by American ground forces outside NATO's sphere of influence. The deterrence principle demands that these forces must remain present and ready for action in Europe. It is equally logical for the preservation of peace to have U.S. ground forces available for quick stationing in tension areas or, in case of defense, in Europe--that is, reinforcements.

Nothing must be changed in this regard. But if we will have to reckon in the future with some of the U.S. reinforcement units being slated for action outside of Europe, corresponding replacements, I am repeating myself, must be made available for these forces by the European partners of the alliance. This replacement, however, cannot consist in the mobilization of big units which would be available only many days after the outbreak of a conflict. Regarding the Federal Republic of Germany, units must be created which can be mobilized quickly and which will be fully capable of supporting the field army even during times of tension.

It must be said that also in the future the regional military balance of forces is indispensable for the preservation of peace. It must be achieved through corresponding armament, on the one hand, and through verifiable arms limitation on the other. It lies in our interest to achieve a result in the Vienna MBFR talks which will be satisfactory to both sides.

Every German defense contribution, every change of the German element, must therefore be in line with MBFR. Army model four therefore is especially suitable for setting up and training the reserve brigades if four combat companies are the basis of the combat troop battalions in peace and war, if training is changed accordingly.

Here is a suggestion on this matter: Training will take place as a complete entity in the unit throught the entire 15 months of basic training, from the first to the last day, under the full responsibility of a company commander. The difference between this training and all other kinds of training is obvious for every experienced military leader. It is the completeness of training, it is the undivided responsibility for the training up to the point where a soldier will be fully suitable for field service, it is the growing together in combat units, the practicing of comradeship; it is the only way of forming a unit out of persons who accidentially have come together.

This kind of training leads to a high training level together with a high presence of field army units and only this way of training helps to considerably avoid the "retraining" of reservists. It cuts costs. This way of training is logical only if reserve brigades having a pattern and having equipment similar to the active brigades are set up. Only this way of training permits hope and creates the opportunity of bringing young people so close to each other that a personal responsibility for each other as well as for the defense of our country will result. It is logical that this cohesion does not exist in most reserve units.

After 15 months of basic training, the fully trained soldier will be transferred for 12 months to standby Readiness I. As a reservist, he covers the time when recruits will be trained in his basic unit and, because of his status, he will be available at short notice, without mobilization. Thereafter, the soldier will be transferred to standby Readiness II, thus forming together with his former comrades the reserve unit of the reserve brigade of the same type.

Assuming that three divisions from the United States with a total of nine brigades are not available for the defense of central Europe, that is of our country, as reinforcement forces because they must be kept available as rapid deployment force for the protection also of German interests in or for the Gulf region, I consider the setting up of six German reserve brigades an adequate contribution.

As a whole, I consider this concept a most effective contribution to cutting costs on behalf of the army and thus the Bundeswehr within the framework of the division of labor concept.

Such a German contribution in the form of six such reserve brigades will contribute considerably toward preserving the credibility of the flexible response strategy through making available the necessary conventional component for forward defense in central Europe, particularly for the defense of the Federal Republic of Germany.

The current adaptation of the army to model four is the right time for setting up and deploying the reserve brigades called for. A decision made now will demonstrate to the Warsaw Pact states our determination to defend our country, making the right impression on the Vienna MBFR negotiations, which have been treading water for years.

FOREIGN MINISTER, ZAIRE PRIME MINISTER HOLD TALKS

[Text] Bremen, 17 Jan (DPA)--Talks in Bremen today between Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and the prime minister of Zaire, Nguza Karl-i-Bond, focused on concern over developments in Chad. Following the talks, Genscher said that the Federal Government appreciates the concern expressed by the central African states at their conference in Brazzaville. He stated that the Federal Government is interested in the African states being able to preserve their independence and sovereignty.

Gencher said that on the Namibia question both governments hope that after the disappointing outcome of the Namibia conference in Geneva the "constructive forces on all sides" nonetheless will be able to reach an early and peaceful settlement of the Namibia question through free elections. According to the foreign office spokesman, Genscher said in the course of the talk that, in view of the large number of Germans living in Namibia, people in the Federal Republic are following these efforts with special attention.

Both partners in the talks described German-Zaire relations as "good and trusting." The relations show that cooperation between African and European states with respect for mutual independence and sovereignty is beneficial for both sides. The two governments are determined to further expand the political and economic relations between the two states.

TURKEY'S TURGUT OZAL COMPLETES ECONOMIC MISSION

[Text] State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal, who conducted talks in Britain on Turkey's debts to international commercial banks and then held meetings with FRG Government officials in Bonn, will return to Turkey this evening. Turkish radio and television correspondent Turan Dikkaya reports from Cologne regarding Ozal's contacts in the FRG:

[Begin recording] The FRG is again expected to assume the duty of coordinating aid and being the leading contributor of aid to Turkey in 1981 within the OECD framework. Ozal held a news conference late last night after concluding his contacts in Bonn and, commenting on his contacts, said this was the impression he had received.

Ozal, who arrived in Bonn from London, held meetings with the federal finance and economy under secretaries and then met with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher for a lengthy talk. Ozal also held an unexpected 1-hour meeting with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt upon the latter's request, pointing out that he gave Schmidt detailed information concerning economic and political developments in Turkey. Ozal said Schmidt welcomed the positive developments in the Turkish economy despite the sharp increases in oil prices and was expecting this development to continue.

Noting that Turkey needs around $1.5 billion in foreign economic aid during 1981, Ozal said: If the aid continues, the work we started can succeed. Europe is not in as good an economic position as in past years. The increases in the price of crude oil greatly are affecting Western economies. The FRG attaches great importance to its NATO allies and Turkey.

In reply to a question on the amount of foreign aid to be received this year, Ozal noted: It is still early to talk about quantity. I believe the amount of U.S. and FRG aid will be about the same. Meanwhile, it is rumored among government circles in Bonn that the FRG aid will not exceed last year's amount. As will be recalled, FRG aid during 1980 was set at DM560 million and some of this amount was extended into 1981. [end recording]

PARIS APPROVES OAU SUMMIT RESOLUTION ON CHAD

[Text] The battle of words continues between France and Libya after the Lome agreements. For the first time, France is taking an official stand after the decision adopted by the 12 heads of African states at the OAU summit in Lome. Paris welcomes with keen interest the decision taken there and deems it to correspond, on the whole, with the French position expressed repeatedly in the last few weeks.

Libya, on its part, continues the argument. The Libyan number two, Jallud, accuses France of having started a controversy over the presence of Al-Qadhdhafi's men in Chad to conceal the dispatch of French military reinforcements to Central Africa, Senegal and Gabon.Jallud states that Libya observes the wishes of the Chad people and that it is out of the question that anything should be imposed on them. Reiterating a well-known leitmotiv, Tripoli states that Libya intervened following an official request and in accordance with a treaty.

LE MONDE VIEWS EVOLUTION OF FRENCH-GERMAN ENTENTE

[Editorial: "Twofold French-German Inconsistancy"]

[Text] Within the space of a few hours, the Elysee and Bonn government spokesmen reaffirmed that Giscard d'Estaing and Chancellor Schmidt or, in more general terms, France and the FRG, are in perfect agreement. The occasion which prompted this commentary was the 45-minute telephone conversation held by the two statesmen on Saturday, 10 January, following the chancellor's vacation in the sun. It related to all current issues: economy, Africa and relations with Washington and Moscow.

Since not all telephone calls between "mein lieber Helmut" and "mon cher Valery" are publicized, we have to look elsewhere for the reason prompting the two sides to make this demonstration of friendship. The explanation is to be found in the rumors which had been circulating on the other side of the Rhine in the past few weeks, alleging that the Giscard d'Estaing-Schmidt entente is no longer what it was. The New York TIMES and the INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE gave wide coverage to those rumors.

The Bonn government spokesman even felt it necessary to specify that those rumors were being spread "deliberately." Who would stand to gain from poisoning French-German relations? According to the German daily DIE WELT, official circles in Bonn and Paris suspect a maneuver by Mr Reagan's entourage, with the U.S. president-elect already attempting to destroy the "Bonn-Paris axis," the better to restore U.S. influence in Europe.

French-German relations, from total war to the televised embrace between De Gaulle and Adenauer, have always been a source of countless speculations. And their alleged cooling, like the accusations leveled at the Americans in this affair, is based above all on assumptions.

There is, however, one indisputable fact, and that is the evolution in French and West German East-West policy. Relations between De Gaulle and Adenauer only seemed idyllic in light of the recent past. On the mound of the ruins and dead left by the world war, the old statesmen carried off a reconciliation which they intended to be spectacular. They nonetheless were divided by fundamental differences of opinion. The chancellor did not approve of General de Gaulle's distancing himself from Washington or flirting with Moscow. Furthermore, with a preamble adopted by the Bundestag and a German-U.S. armament agreement, he allowed the 1963 French-German treaty to be stripped of a good part of its substance.

Times have now changed. Paris' distrust of Moscow is growing and the French-Soviet dialogue is less and less sustained. France, however, while remaining outside Atlantic integration, has responded better than any other ally to the U.S. call to strengthen defense. Conversely, Bonn has ceased to be a wholehearted U.S. ally and relations between Mr Carter and Mr Schmidt were terrible. On the other hand, the chancellor will do all he can to save a minimum of detente which will make it possible to humanize relations between the two Germanies and to develop fruitful trade with the East.

Should we conclude that Paris and Bonn definitely will continue to diverge on this issue? Should we not instead observe that the dual evolution by France and Germany leads them to a joint middle stance between East and West and that, all in all, French-German understanding has never been so complete?

This is what the Quai d'Orsay and the Elysee are saying repeatedly. It is a safe bet that the next French-German summit, at the beginning of February, will lend weight to that assertion, but the European budgetary quarrel will make it possible to check whether this understanding exists other than in words.

PREMIER BARRE DISCUSSES ACTIONS WITH PRESS

[Text] Raymond Barre told the press at the Hotel Matignon on Tuesday, 14 January, that he will hand the president of the republic his resignation as premier at the end of the present 7-year term of office. Until then, he said, he will try to "finish the things which have been undertaken and keep the promises made." He took the opportunity to present a flattering account of his actions since August 1976. He explained: "Since 1976, France has overcome the first oil blow; since 1979, it has again been hit hard by oil price increases, it will take long and patient efforts to overcome its effects, however, our country is now in a better position than in the past to face that. Everybody knows this, even if they are not saying so."

The premier congratulated himself for having remained faithful to three resolutions throughout his time in the Hotel Matignon.

First, he "decided to strictly observe the letter and the spirit of the Fifth Republic institutions." Thus, according to him, "despite renewed efforts, the attempts to divide the Elysee and Matignon--a favorite subject of political chronicles under the Fifth Republic--have led to their perpetrators being thwarted." As for his relations with parliament, Mr Barre congratulated himself on having used "the means to ensure the executive's stability" and mentioned "the tempests in teacups which are less exciting than the Fourth Republic's ministerial crisis." Mr Barre's second resolution was not "to be affiliated and still less subservient to any political party." He went so far as to boast that he is regarded "as an irritating provocateur." Finally, the premier prides himself on having adopted a "state of indifference" to press criticism. Jean-Claude Vajou, ministerial press association chairman, then wished him "happiness in his long, drawnout end." Mr Barre sarcastically wished his guests a year rich in "questions, calculations and prognostications."

POPE CELEBRATES MASS FOR WALESA, POLISH GROUP

LD181906 Vatican in English to Central and West Europe 1445 GMT 18 Jan 81

After the gospel, the pope (?spoke on the Sunday readiness) about the lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world. He sustained to do the Father's will and he reveals man to himself, showing him his dignity and his great vocation. The holy father said he wished to gather the whole of Poland around the altar of the eucharistic sacrifice, in particular, all her workers, in order to offer them to God along with the bread and wine of the mass. If we place on this altar, he said, the whole of our work in Poland, we will be given from heaven the strength to become friends of God and to achieve our dignity as workers.

Pope John Paul II personally distributed communion to all present. During the celebration, the Solidarity delegation performed several traditional Polish songs.

After the mass in the Vatican, the Polish trade unionists, led by Lech Walesa, went on pilgrimage to Assisi to pray at the tomb of St Francis. They are scheduled to return to Rome this evening.

PINTO BALSEMAO PRESENTS PROGRAM TO PARLIAMENT

LD162208 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 16 Jan 81

[Parliamentary correspondent's dispatch]

[Excerpts] It was 1500 when Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao started reading his speech presenting to the assembly the program of his government.

One of Pinto Balsemao's first assertions was that this is a 4-year program, and this idea was stressed throughout his speech. He justified his statement on the grounds that the government's majority, represented by its 134 members of Parliament, ensures from the outset government stability for Portugal. He expressed his intention to establish a deep and permanent collaboration with the Democratic Alliance majority but voiced as well the government's high regard for the opposition's role, and called on the opposition parties to formulate, here and now, the indispensable alternatives.

The revision of the constitution as a conditioning factor in the government's future action was one of the topics on which the prime minister dwelt at length. Recognizing that the government has no active part in the process, Pinto Balsemao considers it necessary, however, that the future revision should strip the constitution of all that stands in the way of full democratization of the country and of all elements likely to impose on Portuguese society a given blueprint of economic and social organization. The revision of the constitution, he said, should instead be conditioned only by the essential values of democracy.

He said that the major objective of the seventh government is to modernize and democratize the country through the consolidation of local and regional powers and the inherent decentralization of the state. It is necessary to modernize and reduce the state bureaucracy, as this is one of the conditions for our country's accession to the EEC.

According to Pinto Balsemao, Portugal's integration in the EEC is indeed another priority task in the government's future action, as in his view European integration is closely linked with our modernization.

With regard to foreign policy, the prime minister stressed that it is for the government to formulate and also conduct it. In this connection he said that our foreign policy will be directed toward European integration, active loyalty to our NATO commitments, a closer relationship with Portuguese-speaking countries, continuing international measures toward the self-determination of East Timor and closer relations with Arab countries.

Pinto Balsemao strongly criticized the excessive collectivization of Portuguese society and advocated the release of civilian society and its wealth-generating energies, restricted to date by the corset of state bureaucracy. The major targets of economic policy set out by the prime minister should thus be viewed within this framework of release of civilian society.

Among the priority targets of the government's economic policies, the prime minister mentioned the improvement in the living standards of the Portuguese. To this effect, he said, it is necessary to combat inflation, reduce the inflation rate to 16 percent this year and to average European levels by 1984, wage a productivity battle and fight unemployment.

Concluding his speech, the prime minister was particularly emphatic in his assurance that this is a government to last and that there will be no more general elections until 1984 since the parliamentary majority is perfectly united and cohesive.

A warning, however, was also issued by the prime minister, apparently to the present majority itself, when he said that any cabinet member, member of Parlimanent or party leader who dares to advocate to the country the division or destruction of the Democratic Alliance will assume a tremendous historic responsibility.

PCP CENTRAL COMMITTEE HOLDS PLENARY MEETING

Rejection of Government Plan

LD172258 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 17 Jan 81

[Text] PCP Central Committee is holding a plenary meeting, which is scheduled to end tomorrow. The main item on the agenda is the analysis of the current political situation.

Late this afternoon PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal spoke to reporters about the political situation.

[Begin recording] In line with previous conclusions, our party's Central Committee takes the view that, as a result of the terrible defeat suffered by the Democratic Alliance in the presidential elections, an important change has come about in the Portuguese political situation. The reactionary offensive has been suddenly checked; the Democratic Alliance's subversive scheme, in which the election of General Soares Carneiro was an essential component, has been defeated; democracy has emerged consolidated from the 7 December elections.

However, the program submitted to the Assembly of the Republic by the Pinto Balsemao government reflects the intention to continue the policies of the Sa Carneiro government. The PCP's parliamentary group will be submitting a motion rejecting the program; it will also consider rejection of motions made by other parties and will, in any event, seek to contribute toward rallying the largest possible number of deputies into rejecting the Pinto Balsemao government's program. [end recording]

The PCP secretary general further stated that the popular mass struggle will be intensified in Portugal in the near future. Indeed, this is a subject that the PCP's Central Committee will also be looking into at the plenary meeting currently underway:

[Begin recording] At this stage in the debate, we have already stressed the decisive importance of the organization and unity of the workers and democratic movements. The PCP will firmly continue to implement its policy of unity in the grassroots organizations, in all the mass organizations, in interparty relations--particularly between Communists and Socialists--and in making more dynamic the action of the independent democrats whose potential strength was confirmed in the results of the 7 December elections. [end recording]

More on PCP Plenary Meeting

[Excerpts] The Portuguese Communist Party Central Committee is meeting in plenary session in Lisbon. The PCP says the government lacks a social and political basis of support and maintains that if the government persists with the unconstitutional, illegal and subversive policies of the Sa Carneiro government, it must be dismissed.

In regard to the Council of the Revolution, the PCP says it must remain in the full exercise of its powers, at least until the revision of the constitution.

The PCP describes the prospects facing the Portuguese people as somber due to the continuation of the Democratic Alliance in government. The PCP emphasizes, among other things, the worsening economic situation of the workers resulting from the foreseeable reduction of real wages, the rising cost of living and growing unemployment.

The situation of the mass media was also discussed at the PCP Central Committee's plenary meeting and was described as scandalous. The PCP says it will do its utmost to ensure pluralism and democracy in the media, the Central Committee says.

Constitional Revisions

[Text] The Portuguese Communist Party Central Committee, meeting over the weekend, has devoted part of its agenda to the question of revising the constitution. Speaking to reporters during a break in the proceedings, Alvaro Cunhal said the PCP does not intend to propose to Parliament a draft of its own on the revision. He added the PCP will merely propose amendments to the existing text because, he said, we are not in a hurry and the less the constitution is tampered with the better: there are more dangers in revising it than in leaving it unrevised.

Nevertheless, the Communists are preparing themselves for the revision of the constitution and Alvaro Cunhal has already outlined some of the goals for which his party will fight. One concerns the role of the military in the political life of the country.

[Begin Cunhal recording] The PCP Central Committee favors the institutionalization of the role of the military in the political life of the country; it is against the partisan use of the armed forces, particularly against their being placed under the government's orders. We advocate that, in the present stage of evolution of the democratic regime, the drafting of regulations, the organization and running of the armed forces should be a task for the military alone in the framework of the constitution. [end recording]

Continuing on the subject of the revision of the constitution, the PCP secretary general further stated:

[Begin recording] The PCP regards the defense of the constitution as a central task and is firmly against any revision which fails to respect the formal and material limits imposed [by the constitution itself]. [end recording]

Statement on Political Issues

[Text] Early last evening the PCP issued a lengthy document to the news media entitled "Statement of the Central Committee."

The 18-point statement covers a wide range of political issues. The PCP takes the view that, despite the favorable changes in the political situation as a result of the presidential elections, Portuguese politics is confronted with somber prospects. For this reason, the PCP urges that the struggle against government policies be immediately stepped up.

The statement declares that, in the terms of the constitution, the PCP will continue to maintain relations with the president and with the Presidency of the republic. [as heard] It takes a positive view of the role of the Council of the Revolution in the defense of the stabilization of the democratic regime.

Further on the statement says that the PCP has no objections to a 4-year extension of the Council of the Revolution's mandate as a sovereign organ.

After listing the reasons why the PCP opposes the seventh government, referring to aspects of the party's internal situation and organization and outlining its stand on the question of the revision of the constitution, the statement defines the PCP's stand with regard to the armed forces: The PCP advocates that the role of the armed forces in the political life of the country--a national reality--must be institutionalized and not left to drift in the currents created by conflicting forces.

Carrillo says, among other things: We do not attribute the results of the Fifth PSUC Congress to mainly outside manipulation. However, this does not mean that there is no definite plan to liquidate Eurocommunism in Spain and in other countries. We are aware, Carrillo continued, that prior to our 10th congress [July 1981] the network could be laid to pursue this end. We will defend the Communist Party and its policy against this. INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS' FOURTH ROUND CONTINUES

[Text] The second meeting in the fourth round of the intercommunal talks have been held at the Ledra Palace hotel in Nicosia. Discussion of the initial practical measures by both sides to promote good will, mutual confidence and the return to normal conditions was continued during the meeting.

On his arrival at the hotel, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Mr Gobbi, declared that the inter-Cypriot talks were at a very sensitive stage. That is why, he added, you can understand my inability to be more expressive. Replying to a question, Mr Gobbi said that this stage was sensitive because there are new developments and there is a need for caution. Mr Gobbi refrained from saying what the new developments were but clarified, nevertheless, that this stage of the talks is sensitive but not critical.

In statements prior to the meeting, the representative of the Greek Cypriot side at the talks, Mr Ioannidhis, expressed the hope that useful views would be exchanged. We also expect, he added, several replies from the Turkish Cypriot side regarding issues that we have raised at previous meetings. In reply to an observation that after the submission of the Turkish Cypriot proposals on Varosha, an impression had been created that the intercommunal dialogue was at an impasse, Mr Ioannidhis said: The dialogue is continuing. Consequently, as long as the dialogue is continuing there is no question of an impasse. Ioannidhis refrained from commenting on the Turkish Cypriot proposals on Varosha. Asked whether he was more optimistic following his visit to Athens, Mr Ioannidhis said that up to a point, even if to a limited degree, one should be optimistic as long as a dialogue was in progress. Asked whether he regarded this stage of the dialogue as crucial, Mr Ioannidhis said that all the meetings are serious and crucial.

In his statements, the Turkish Cypriot interlocutor, Mr Onan, said that he expected proposals from the Greek Cypriot side regarding the practical measures and voiced the hope that these proposals would help in the achievement of progress. Replying to a question, Mr Onan said that the Turkish Cypriot side has not asked for the Varosha question to be linked to the reopening of Nicosia airport, and added that Nicosia airport has not been an object of discussion. He also said that if it is included on the agenda it will definitely be discussed, but as a separate question. Replying to an observation that some people believe that the Turkish Cypriot proposal on Varosha does not contribute to the creation of a good atmosphere and to progress in the talks, Mr Onan said that some may not like the proposals but, he said, to say that they are not constructive would not be right. It is a matter of rapprochement, he added. Let us not forget that we are seeking a comprehensive settlement to the problem of Cyprus. Asked why the question of Varosha had been separated from the territorial issue, Mr Onan expressed the view that it had been wrong to separate the territorial issue from the question of Varosha. Asked whether the Turkish Cypriot proposals on Varosha are negotiable, he said that there definitely were some points that could be discussed and added: Everything is negotiable; but whether an agreement is reached or not, that is another matter.

A UN statement issued this evening says that during the meeting there had been a sincere and constructive general exchange of views. The next meeting will be held on Wednesday. Discussions on the constitutional aspects of the Cyprus issue will be continued at that meeting.

[Text] The second meeting of the fourth round of the Cyprus intercommunal talks was held today. The statement said the two sides continued to discuss the issue and added that the negotiators conducted a general exchange of views in a sincere and constructive atmosphere. The intercommunal talks will resume at the Ledra Palace hotel at 1630 on 21 January. The constitutional aspect will be discussed during the meeting.

During today's meeting, the Turkish Cypriot side was represented by Umit Onan and the Greek Cypriot side by Yeoryios Ioannidhis. The UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Hugo Gobbi, attended the meeting.

CENTER UNION PARTY HOLDS FOUNDING CONGRESS

NC181209 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 18 Jan 81

[Text] Today, the founding congress of the Center Union Party was held in Nicosia. Addressing the congress, Tasos Papadhopoulos analyzed the party's position on the national issue, which, as he said, must predominate in our thoughts. Papadhopoulos said that the intercommunal dialogue under the present conditions was and would continue to be the most appropriate procedure for a peaceful Cypriot solution. He also said that for the Center Union, an acceptable basis for solving the national issue was the philosophy included in the February 1977 National Council proposals that the Greek Cypriots submitted at the negotiating table in Vienna in April 1977. Also in connection with the national issue, he said the Center Union was ready and willing to cooperate with both similar and different parties to reach agreement on a jointly acceptable basis for a solution.

Papadhopoulos said: We must seek a revival of international interest in our proposals, which provide everything that the Turkish side says constitute its vital demands for a Cypriot solution.

CYPRUS WEEKLY: ISRAELI AGENTS IN LIMASSOL FIRMS

NC181707 Nicosia THE CYPRUS WEEKLY in English 16 Jan 81 p 1

[Text] The Arab Boycott of Israel Office has issued a circular calling on all Arab states to guard against the importation of Israeli goods via the port of Limassol.

The circular, published in Lebanese newspapers, also claimed that agents of Mosad, the Israeli counter-intelligence organisation, have infiltrated certain firms and companies operating in the port of Limassol, to wage economic sabotage against the Arab world.

The circular added that Arab states with diplomatic representatives in Cyprus have been asked to determine the names, nationalities and the nature of the operations of these allegedly "Israeli-infiltrated companies," and the role they play in channeling Israeli-made goods to Arab countries.

Limassol is used extensively for the export of Cypriot-made goods to the Arab states, as well as for entrepot trade in foreign cargoes destined for the Arab world.

The Arab Boycott office charge could have serious repercussions on Cypriot-Arab trade and could affect the emerging position of the Arab world as the island's main trading partner and buyer of Cypriot goods.

According to the latest official statistics, Cyprus imported goods worth 7.4 million pounds from Israel in the period January-October 1980, representing slightly more than two per cent of the island's total imports for this period.

In the same period, Cypriot domestic exports to the Arab world in general amounted to 61 million pounds and re-exports accounted for an additional 13.9 million pounds.

The boycott office circular said:

"1. As regards the questions of the infiltration of Israeli goods into the Arab countries, organs of the Arab Boycott of Israel Office are following up on this question. The competent authorities are currently undertaking a careful scrutiny of all goods arriving in Arab countries from any area or port in Cyprus, to guarantee that the certificates of origin of these goods are in order. We have received notifications from the regional offices in Syria, Bahrain, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates that all required steps have been taken.

"2. As regards information concerning the infiltration by Mosad of companies and elements into Limassol port, and in view of the fact that currently (the boycott office) has no liaison officers in Cyprus... the regional boycott offices of the countries that have diplomatic or consular representation in Cyprus are hereby asked to intercede with their missions for the procurement of detailed and confirmed information that would pinpoint the names, nationalities and the nature of the activities of the said companies, and the roles played by these companies in the infiltration of Israeli goods and products into the Arab countries; and also to provide any documents that might prove useful in discussing the status of these companies."

RIZOSPASTIS EXAMINES VISIT OF U.S. DELEGATION

[Excerpts] A 16-man U.S. congressional delegation arrived in Athens yesterday. One of its main targets is to promote the agreement on the bases within the framework of a more general strengthening of the political and military "cooperation" between Greece and the United States.

The delegation, which is headed by the chairman of the U.S. House of Representatives Armed Services Committee, is carrying out a "factfinding mission" in five countries, including Egypt and Israel.

The U.S. congressmen will meet with Foreign Minister Mitsotakis and National Defense Minister Averof. Certainly, their talks in Athens will not be confined within the limits of a mere "factfinding" of Greek affairs but will extend to matters of substance covering the whole spectrum of Washington's "interests" in the country's internal political developments and foreign policy. It should be pointed out that the delegation is also accompanied by experts in various sectors. It is certain that the question of the bases will be one of the main points of discussion with the government.

During the talks, particular importance will be attached to the present political situation in the country and its prospects. According to reports, the U.S. congressmen will convey Washington's "concern" over the "dangers" posed for the entire complex of Greek-American relations by the constantly increasing influence of the progressive forces which will definitely be manifested in the elections.

I KATHIMERINI ON FORTHCOMING U.S. BASES TALKS

NC172015 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 17 Jan 81 pp 1, 3

[Reportage by Nikos Simou]

[Excerpts] Substantive talks with the U.S. side on the accord concerning the operation of U.S. bases in our country begin on 27 January.

Already the Greek side has prepared and most probably will submit on Monday, or some time at the beginning of the week, the five "geographical" appendixes that refer to the same number of U.S. bases that operate in the country. These appendixes were written on the basis of the corresponding points of the Greek-American 1977 agreement and the recent U.S.-Turkish agreement as well as on a plan by the National Defense General Staff.

On the other hand, the issue concerning the writing of the letters (secret protocols) has made no progress. These letters constitute the substantive Greek documents, since they safeguard Greek interests by securing: A) the economic and military reinforcements that our country demands; B) the satisfaction of the annual Greek needs in military equipment; C) the exchanges that the Greek side must receive for the operation of the bases.

It is revelantly pointed out that the U.S. side has not yet replied to the Greek counterplan that was handed to Mr McClosky in reply to the unacceptable proposals on the bases that were submitted by the United States. According to authoritative information, the Greek counterprposals are quite "tough" in a way that they leave no room for vagueness concerning the protection of Greek interests.

It is pointed out that one of the fundamental differences in the two plans concerns the commanders of the bases.

Beyond the already known U.S. dissatisfaction with the serious differences between the Greek counterplan and the U.S. proposals, reliable sources pointed out the U.S. desire to reach any kind of agreement regarding the text of the main agreement and the geographical appendixes by mid-February. This would allow, in the remaining time, an opportunity to reach an agreement on the "letters" and to ratify the Greek-U.S. defense agreement before the Chamber of Deputies recess (21 April) for the Easter holidays.

Diplomatic circles, however, pointed out that the statements made by A. Haig, the new secretary of state in Reagan's administration, statements that caused a Greek reaction and advocated a change in the 7 to 10 ratio of U.S. aid to Greece and Turkey respectively, would certainly have its repercussions on the Greek stance on the issue of the bases, at least until the U.S. views on the balance take a specific form following their ratification by the U.S. Congress and following the pertinent proposal by the Reagan staff.

Thus, another element is being added that strengthens Greek thinking against any haste to end the impasse. Because, as is known, the Greek side had already assessed that the signing of a defense and economic cooperation agreement with the United States, before the pending Greek issues in NATO are on the path of some kind of settlement, could lead to the weakening of the Greek negotiating stand. Because with the issue of the bases solved, the Greek side loses a very important "weapon of pressure" in presenting its positions on, for example, the question of the Aegean boundaries.

Finally, it is pointed out that the formulation of the content of the "letters" will probably be delayed so the Greek Government may be briefed on the views of the new U.S. administration on the specific points of the agreement under negotiation by the Greek ambassador to Washington, Mr I. Izounis, who is expected in Athens around the end of the month.

Asked about the reports on his differences with National Defense Minister Averof, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis has stated that there are no differences whatsoever and that the two ministers are cooperating harmonously on all matters of joint responsibility and as matters of a more general government concern. Of course, Mitsotakis said, there is an oral and written exchange of views.

The minister added that what has been published about a difference of opinion on the secret protocols of the U.S.-Turkish agreements are untrue and stressed that the Greek side has already asked to be briefed on these secret agreements.

EVREN DELIVERS ADDRESSES, CONCLUDES COUNTRY TOUR

Speech in Adana

[Excerpts] Ankara, 16 Jan (AFP)--General Kenan Evren, chief of Turkey's ruling military junta, strongly criticized the country's leftists and certain unions today, accusing them of seeking to install a communist regime. The general mounted his attack in a speech at Adana on the Mediterranean coast of southern Turkey.

In his Adana speech, Gen Evren denounced leftist groups and unions "in Adana, Izmir, Istanbul and Ankara that are using class struggle to aggravate the country's economic situation, to provoke dissatisfaction among the underprivileged and to justify a rising to install a communist regime."

The general was referring, without naming it, to the Confederation of Revolutionary Workers Unions (DISK). He condemned the confederation's wealth, which he said was misused. It had built a 16-story building at Ankara, he said, which has a 200-car parking lot. The group employs four chauffeurs, the general added, whose services are reserved to the organization's leaders.

General Evren put the confederation's income at about 100 million dollars a year and said that it did not hesitate to spend as much as 40,000 dollars on a single banquet.

Kahramanmaras Address

TA171551 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 17 Jan 81

[Text] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren has said that sectarianism is a concept of the Middle Ages and that there is no room for that type of discrimination in our age. General Evren went to Kahramanmaras from Hatay on the third day of his tour of the country. He was received by a military ceremony at Kahramanmaras airport. Addressing a large crowd of citizens who waited for him in the rain in front of the municipal building, General Evren pointed out that Kahramanmaras had a special importance and meaning in Turkey's liberation war. Referring to the incidents that occurred there during the past few years, the head of state said: Secret and treacherous forces who want to destroy us spread seeds of enmity among us, committed all kinds of abominable acts and caused great bloodshed in this beautiful part of the country.

General Evren stressed that those days were now finished, that the traitors who wanted to turn the Sunni and Alevi citizens against each other had been punished and would continue to be punished. The head of state urged the citizens to love and respect each other with the pride of being Turks living in the same land and gathered around the same flag. He added: We are brothers belonging to the same nation.

General Evren then said that it was necessary to work very hard in order to leave a legacy of happy tomorrows to future generations and that this was the only way to create a strong and great Turkey. Gen Kenan Evren then departed by land for Gaziantep.

VOTCP REJECTS CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY FORMULA

[Station commentary]

[Text] Dear listeners: What does Evren's statement on the constituent assembly during his Konya speech indicate? Evren said that unless there is a big obstacle, a constituent assembly will be established between 30 August and 29 October. He also noted that the National Security Council will choose the members of the constituent assembly. It is above all necessary to ask the following: In statements made so far, the representatives of the junta claimed that the people are supporting them. If this is the case, why is the junta reverting to this antidemocratic method? Why is it afraid of the election of the people? In other words, this is not the truth.

Evren said that the legitimate authority of the constituent assembly will not be final and that the National Security Council will function as a senate. That is to say that Evren's constituent assembly will prepare draft bills. However, the National Security Council disguised as the senate will hold all the power. It will be the National Security Council that will enact the laws. If this is the case, dear listeners, what is the need for a constituent assembly? This move is aimed at taking another step toward an authoritarian regime led by the junta with a parliamentary facade. In other words, there is no question of a return to democracy.

Nevertheless, it is necessary to pose the following question once more: Why is the junta giving a date for the constituent assembly with the condition that there will not be a big obstacle? The reactions both at home and abroad are growing against the military dictatorship. While the discontent of the people in the country is mounting, the movements of solidarity with the Turkish democratic forces are becoming stronger on the international level.

Representatives of international labor organizations and democratic institutions are arriving in Turkey. These representatives witness the pressures against the democratic forces in Turkey and the disregard for human rights and freedom and convey these to their public. The junta is apprehensive about allowing these representatives to meet with detained persons. It is also known that the junta told a Council of Europe delegation not to press for a date [of return to democracy]. However, immediately after this, a date is announced for the establishment of the constituent assembly. This goes to show that the junta resorted to such a maneuver in the face of increasing discontent in the country and the growing movement of international solidarity with the democratic forces.

These facts clearly demonstrate and prove that a return to democracy is not possible under a military dictatorship. Those who believe in the junta's promises to return to democracy and the circles which support the junta for one reason or another should again reflect upon these facts. How will democracy be restored? Democracy can be attained only through the joint struggle of all progressive, patriotic and democratic persons and forces. Any constituent assembly to be established without the participation of the people's masses, the democratic organizations and unions which represent their interests and all the parties in favor of national independence and democracy would be essentially antidemocratic.

Tens of thousands of progressive, patriotic and democratic persons, who defend the interests of the toiling people--who firmly safeguard democracy--and national interests and independence, are currently in prisons. Democratic organizations, the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] and unions affiliated with DISK have been closed down. Parties in favor of democracy are also banned. The first step in the struggle for democracy consists of uniting in action for the release of detained patriots, democrats, communists and mass unionists, for the opening of their organizations and for all democratic rights and freedom.

The Turkish Communist Party calls on all progressive, patriotic and democratic persons to join in this unity of action and solidarity.

MINISTER OZAL RETURNS FROM UK, FRG VISIT

TA161720 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 16 Jan 81

[Text] State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal concluded his contacts in Britain and the FRG and returned to Ankara today. In a statement at Ankara's Esenboga airport, Ozal expressed the hope that Turkey's foreign currency needs for 1981 will be secured through exports, other foreign currency revenues and loans.

Ozal had gone to Britain on 12 January to hold talks on Turkey's debts to international commercial banks. He then went to the FRG for meetings with government officials.

Comments on Economic Situation

TA162101 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 16 Jan 81

[Text] State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal has said that the talks he held in Britain and the FRG were of a preparatory nature for the OECD meetings to be held in March and April this year. Ozal, who returned to Ankara this evening, made a statement to Turkish Radio and Television. He said a large part of Turkey's foreign currency needs for this year were secured from Turkey's own sources and from loan and debt rescheduling agreements signed last year. Pointing out that Turkey will need a certain amount of foreign loans this year as well, Ozal said they will be secured during the OECD meetings to be held in March and April. Ozal added that through the measures taken and economic policies implemented, Turkey has taken significant steps in overcoming its economic bottleneck.

FOREIGN MINSTER GOES TO ISLAMIC SUMMIT MEETING

[Text] The Islamic Conference summit meeting will begin in Taif, Saudi Arabia on 24 January. A delegation headed by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu will represent Turkey at the summit meeting.

Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen left for Taif today to attend the preparatory meeting for the summit conference. Turkmen made a statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport before his departure.

[Begin Recording] The purpose of this meeting is to prepare for the Islamic summit conference which will begin on 25 January and last until 28 January. The ministerial meeting preceding the summit conference will be held from 17 through 21 January.

The summit meeting will be the third such meeting of Islamic countries. The previous meeting was held in Lahore in 1974. The summit meeting is being held at an important time from the viewpoint of relations among Islamic countries. There are very serious issues to be discussed. The Jerusalem issue, the Afghanistan problem and the Iran-Iraq war are among the political matters to be discussed.

Economic issues will also be discussed. Economic issues consist of developing the economic cooperation among member countries. A meeting on the development of economic and scientific cooperation was held in Ankara about 2 months ago. The Turkish delegation prepared and proposed an action program during this meeting. This action program will be submitted to the foreign ministers meeting and then to the summit meeting. It will be ratified at the summit meeting after discussions. Our delegation will, naturally, be headed by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu following his arrival in Taif. We are expecting his arrival in Taif to be on 23 January. [end recording]

MILITARY AID MEMORANDUM SIGNED WITH CANADA

[Excerpt] An agreement memorandum on military aid, worth about 2.5 billion Turkish liras which Canada has agreed to extend to Turkey, was signed in Ankara today. The agreement memorandum was signed by National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken on behalf of Turkey and by the Canadian Ambassador in Ankara, Marc Baudouin, on behalf of Canada.

VOTCP URGES RECOGNITION OF BABRAK KARMAL REGIME

[Station commentary: "Afghanistan, Haq and Evren"]

[Text] As you know, Ziaul Haq, who has established a bloody dictatorship on the Pakistani people, arrived in Turkey as the guest of Evren. Evren who is the head of the pro-American junta proposed a toast at a dinner he gave in honor of bloodstained dictator Ziaul Haq. In his speech, Evren said: "The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has undermined security." Thus, Evren once again reiterated imperialist demagogy that went bankrupt long ago. The Afghan people greatly value the Soviet Union's internationalist help. The Afghan people support the Babrak Karmal administration. The Babrak Karmal administration and the Afghan people act as one (?body). They have begun to establish an Afghanistan in which there is no inequality, brute force, poverty or hunger. Everyone agrees that this is so, even Western bourgeois parliamentarians. The statement made by the British Labor Party members of Parliament, who recently visited Afghanistan, clearly show how unfounded the imperialists' demagogy about Afghanistan is.

As for Evren's description of the great Soviet support for Afghanistan as "an act of undermining security," it is obvious where this demagogy stems from. On the eve of their coming to power, the likes of Reagan and Haig are making it clear that they will promote a cold war policy. In his speeches, Haig repeatedly and clearly says that he will escalate the arms race, he will be used to these ends. The imperialist forces are drawing up new plans to turn Turkey into a more effective country in the Gulf region. These forces are increasing their pressure on Turkey. With all his demagogy, Evren cannot conceal these facts.

The Turkish people and the other peoples in the region know very well the bloodstained Ziaul Haq, the enemy of the Pakistani people. This bloodstained dictator has turned Pakistan into an aggressive base for the imperialists in the region. The imperialist circles and the Chinese hegemonists are interfering in Pakistan's internal affairs through this bloodstained dictator. Our people do not want to see such antipeople dictators in our country. By inviting this dictator to Turkey, Evren violated our people's wishes.

The irresponsible remarks made by Evren on the Afghanistan issue are in line with the imperialist circles; aim of trying to drag our world into a cold war. The sole and real representative of the Afghan people is the Babrak Karmal administration. The junta in Turkey must accept this reality and must recognize the Babrak Karmal administration as soon as possible.

PRIME MINISTER MARTENS ON FISCAL POLICY OPTIONS

LD191045 Brussels LE SOIR in French 13 Jan 81 p 2

[C.L. Binnemans report: "Mr Martens Promises Us More 'Efforts' Next Easter"]

[Text] Efforts and more efforts, and probably, sacrifices--this is what Prime Mininster Wildried Martens forecasts for the population in both the medium and the longer term, that is, for the coming days and months.

Mr Martens expects that all the provisions of the "recovery laws" will be implemented when, at the end of this week the final discussions among the parliamentary majority will have cleared the way for the coming vote and its implementation from February onward. A pressure stronger than hitherto envisaged may be exerted on the highest incomes.

Later, the government is to take budget problems in hand. As early as next Monday, work connected with checking expenditure is to begin. It is to be concluded by Easter.

After, successfully or not, formulating a policy aimed at reducing expenditure, Mr Martens and his ministers intend to devote their attention to the "tricky and difficult" decision concerning long term savings.

They are to consider national defense, national education and public works, and also "transfers" which, unless we are mistaken, could mean unemployment benefits, family allowances and the retirement pensions structure.... We do not know what "is bound to" means.

During the Sunday midday "Facing the Press" television program, the prime minister gave some current information and made some longer-term forecasts.

What was rather unusual was that, even though some experienced interviewers, led by Christiane Lepere, were present, Mr Martens himself spoke almost throughout the hour-long program. It was a kind of "one-man show," rather serious and both well documented and earnest. No one seemed prepared to either interrupt or attack the politician.

You can either like or dislike Mr Wilfried Martens and either approve of his policy or believe that it is bound to lead to disaster; but he has undoubtedly behaved like a leader who is certain, first, that there is no alternative to what he is doing and preparing and, second, that no one else can do it....

Moderation

Thus, once more, the synthesis and the steps aimed at keeping incomes down and improving social security which are now being considered by parliament require more than 50 billion francs, which the population is being asked to provide, including 25 billion through wage restraint and 31 billion through streamlining social security (5.2 billion francs in additional contributions levied in the private sector, 4.8 billion in the public sector and 3.8 billion among the self-employed, plus 17.3 instead of 15 billion saved as a result of an agreement with the medical profession).

However, 7.3 billion francs are to be refunded to enterprises through tax rebates to help them on their way to recovery.

Mr Martens asserts that the working classes are not to carry the main burden. It cannot be said that only wages have been affected. For instance, a number of tax rates have remained unchanged. Incomes below 35,000 francs have not been affected. On the other hand, high salaries--in semipublic financial institutions, for instance--are to be heavily taxed.

One problem has not been resolved by parliamentary committees during this week--some people want to see amendments introduced providing for higher taxation for people with the highest incomes, whereas some other people would like to see the tax burden of families, which have high expenses, lightened to some extent.

"We will have to come to an agreement," Mr Martens stated. "The majority has shown that it is coherent. We will be able to overcome the final obstacle." And he hinted that if it is a question of taxing more heavily incomes of more than 5 million per annum, it could well be possible to lower this threshold....

And Mr Martens continued: "With reference to wage restraint, the government no longer negotiates with social interlocutors. It could possibly agree to engage in talks if asked to do so. The entire government faced its responsibilities by submitting its eight plans prior to 31 December 1980.

National Defense Again

But is the total of 50 billion francs thus to be obtained sufficient? Apparently not. We will be confronted with new difficulties: our account is still overdrawn. How can we moderate our expenditure and pay our debts? Will the majority stand the test? And how will public opinion react to all this?

In this realm of problems Mr Martens stressed, first, the substantial financial depreciation which is emerging. Of this depreciation 16 billion francs are the predictable and established result of the rehabilitation plan. But the drop in revenue is reaching some 50 billion, as compared with last July's forecasts. Economic activity has weakened dangerously, "vertically," since September.

Therefore, the budgetary problem remains, over and above the plan for restraint and rehabilitation. And with this problem the options which, in the prime minister's view, an attempted solution seems to require also remain.

"You cannot do everything at once," Mr Martens declares. "A minimum amount of time is needed. We are already preparing new drafts which will be submitted to Parliament with all necessary measures."

It will be the stage of "delicate and difficult choices." These choices are to be determined before Easter.

So we come back to national defense and the expense implied in our membership of NATO. A study group is setting to work: these specific problems are on the agenda of government meetings this week.

The "Transfers" Implicated

National education will also be examined, as will public works. As for "transfers," and we know that in politics this word means a fair distribution of the wealth produced by the country so that the most underprivileged also benefit by it, the prime minister did not indicate what he was considering while he was talking. But he said: "Some sectors will have to be radically reformed." He noted: "This is not envisaged in the government statement."

So the objection arises--and it was made at the end of the TV program--"You cannot count on an enthusiastic attitude from the public. You are now taking decisions without reference to political partners. Regionalization has been accomplished and problems are arising, in ferrous metallurgy, for instance. Should you not consider the danger of political destabilization?"

Mr Martens reply was: "Amid all our difficulties this is perhaps just the right time to see whether the regionalization system which has been developed and put into practice is a good one. Each region must administer itself on the basis of its own problems. But important sectors remain within the national purview. National decisions will have to be taken and national solidarity will have to play a part."

And he concluded: "The time has come for a government which must govern."

GOVERNMENT REGRETS PRC WISH TO DOWNGRADE MISSIONS

NC192001 Paris AFP in English 1953 GMT 19 Jan 81

[Text] The Hague, 19 Jan (AFP)--The Dutch Government "learned with regret China's desire to negotiate the downgrading of the status of diplomatic missions in each other's country," a Foreign Ministry spokesman said here today.

Earlier today, China announced that it wanted the missions to be headed by charges d'affaires as a result of The Netherlands' planned sale of two submarines to Taiwan.

Dutch political observers said that The Netherlands would announce its reaction after parliament had reconsidered the matter. The debate could occur Thursday, observers said.

LEADERS CONGRATULATE INCOMING U.S. ADMINISTRATION

Schmidt's Telegram

LD201848 Hamburg DPA in German 1800 GMT 20 Jan 81

[Text] Bonn, 20 Jan (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt sent telegrams of congratulations to President Ronald Reagan, Vice President George Bush and Secretary of State Alexander Haig. "I am looking forward to a trustful and fruitful cooperation," Schmidt noted in his telegram to Reagan. He said he is convinced that the commonality of ideology and agreement concerning the interests of the two countries will remain the touchstone for relations between the United States and the Federal Republic. He agrees wholly and entirely with Reagan that the joint strengthening of the North Atlantic alliance and close consultations between the partners of the alliance are of paramount importance.

Carstens' Greetings

[Text] Bonn, 20 Jan (DPA)--Federal President Karl Carstens sent a telegram of congratulations to U.S. President Ronald Reagan on his inauguration. Carstens wrote that at this moment he is thinking of the lofty ideals to which the United States and its friends jointly feel bound: "liberty, under whose banner the United States of America entered the stage of history 200 years ago; the dignity of man and justice, which is indispensable for the internal and external peace of peoples and the preservation and safeguarding of peace, on which the future of mankind depends."

Carstens said he hopes that under Reagan's presidency the United States will find ways to meet the challenges of a changing world in peace and freedom. He stressed the friendship between Germans and Americans, which has grown over three decades. He said he is convinced it will continue to prove itself and be further consolidated in the coming years.

In a greetings telegram to departing President Carter, Carstens recalled his visit to the Federal Republic and to Berlin in the summer of 1978. During this visit, Carter's impressive commitment to Berlin's freedom and security and to the German people's right to self-determination will not be forgotten.

SCHMIDT COMMENTS ON UPCOMING U.S. POLICY TALKS

[Text] Bonn, 21 Jan (DPA)--According to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, the Federal Government will have consultations without delay with the administration of new U.S. President Ronald Reagan who was inaugurated on Tuesday. Addressing the SPD parliamentary group on Tuesday, the chancellor said that Bonn strongly will stress the need for diplomatic cooperation with the Soviet Union in its talks with the U.S. administration and will insist on a policy of balance.

According to the parliamentary group today, Schmidt said the prospects for a meaningful division of labor within the overall concept with which the West intends to respond to the Soviet Union's policy of expansion, particularly in the case of Afghanistan, are good.

The chancellor confirmed that he will travel to the United States for talks with President Reagan "somewhat later" than Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, who is to visit the United States in March.

GENSCHER AFFIRMS COOPERATION WITH U.S. LEADERSHIP

LD201456 Hamburg DPA in German 1406 GMT 20 Jan 81

[Excerpt] Bonn, 20 Jan (DPA)--Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP chairman and federal foreign minister, stressed the FDP's determination to implement vigorously the policy agreed with the SPD. He told the FDP parliamentary group in Bonn today that the integration of the Federal Republic in the Western alliance and in the European Community is the basis of German and European security. German-American friendship is a permanent element of German foreign policy. Genscher again called for efforts for arms control and disarmament. He said he is convinced the Federal Government will cooperate closely and trustingly with the new American leadership, which has stated its desire for close cooperation with the European allies. President Ronald Reagan and Secretary of State Alexander Haig are politicians who approach their task with great realism and a sense of responsibility.

SCHMIDT GRANTS INTERVIEW TO FRENCH TELEVISION

Schmidt replied in the negative when asked whether he feared that Reagan's policy would be "ham-fisted" [politik des groben klotzes]. In the 4 or 5 years he had worked in Europe as commander in chief of the NATO forces, the new Secretary of State Alexander Haig had, in fact, not given an impression of naivete. Haig is undoubtedly an American secretary of state who is able to judge Europe's problems very well and who knows well a number of Europe's leading politicians. The Bonn head of state said on the eve of Reagan taking office, "We all know that in the difficult situation in the world in 1981, we are dependent on good cooperation with the United States."

The chancellor stressed that he always has believed that detente is possible and can be realized only on the basis of a balance of power. But he said he sees this balance threatened by the Soviet SS-20 missiles which so far are not matched by a Western equivalent in sufficient numbers. "This balance must be taken care of, without a doubt," said Schmidt. In the federal chancellor's view, the Poles are able to solve their difficulties themselves. It would be a "great tragedy" were someone to try from outside to interfere in the difficulties which undoubtedly have appeared at the moment. When asked directly on a possible Soviet intervention, Schmidt replied that responsible members of government and heads of government have to be prepared for difficult situations not only domestically but also have to be prepared together with their friends and allies. Schmidt declared, "Our stance is one of noninterference." "We must assume that others also keep to their obligations."

The chancellor said that French and German interests are to a large extent parallel and will remain this way in the years and decades to come. He described as a "fairy tale" reports of a "cooling off" between Paris and Bonn. His good understanding with President Valery Giscard d'Estaing is a "blessing." The chancellor referred to the differing situations of the Federal Republic and France. The Federal Republic is not a nuclear power and has no permanent seat on the UN Security Council. Germany is a divided country. "This means that we have to tread more carefully than France."

On cooperation among the European states in combatting terrorism, Schmidt's view is that in cases such as that of Italian Judge d'Urso and the German employer's President Schleyer, the government in question had to bear the responsibility itself. Schmidt emphasized, "I am not in favor of democratic governments letting themselves be blackmailed."

OPPOSITION TO AL-QADHDHAFI EUROPEAN VISIT REPORTED

[Text] According to a reliable source, France does not want Colonel al-Qadhdhafi's official visit to Italy and the FRG during the first half of 1981 to take place. France has not made any official approaches to Rome and Bonn. But, it seems, it has made known its feeling--motivated by Libyan policy in Chad--during political consultations among the [European] Ten.

According to British sources, the French Government only wishes such visits or visits by other Libyan leaders to Community states to take place if they seem absolutely necessary. The Chad question and relations with Libya probably will be discussed during the Ten's policy cooperation meeting in Brussels on Tuesday 20 January and at the forthcoming French-Italian summit (22-23 January) and French-German summit (5 and 6 February).

GOVERNMENT MOVES TO RESOLVE LIBYAN OIL DISPUTE

["B.D." report: "ELF-Aquitaine To Defer Implementation of Libyan Oil-Prospecting Agreement"]

[Text] Mr Barre finally has settled the dispute between Mr Giraud and Mr Chalandon over ELF-Aquitaine's signing of a prospecting and production contract in Libya relating to five sectors with a total surface area of 15,000 km. The official text stresses that "the Hotel Matignon announces that, during the ELF-Quitaine national company's [SNEA] board meeting on 14 January, the government commissioners asked the company, in view of the recent development in the situation in Africa, to defer implementation of the oil-prospecting agreements which it reached with the Libyan authorities on 1 December 1980 in the exercise of its management responsibilities. The board took note of the request."

As he already stated at the L'EXPANSION forum the day after the publication of a communique by the industry minister--a communique which the Hotel Matignon did not appreciate--the prime minister recalls that the contracts were signed by Mr Chalandon "in the exercise of his management responsibilities." The SNEA chairman therefore is cleared of accusations that he used guerrilla tactics. The fact that the communique has been issued by the Hotel Matignon and not the minister responsible is significant in this respect.

"In view of the recent situation in Africa," however, Mr Chaladon is asked to "defer implementation of the prospecting agreements in Libya." That seems very vague. It can be assumed that ELF-Aquitaine will refrain from investing in prospecting and production for a few months. (However, this type of contract usually includes clauses which force the company to invest within a certain time or lose its rights.)

The prime minister's communique discreetly ends an incident between the industry minister and the SNEA chairman which, to say the least, could and should have been avoided.

LD MONDE VIEWS GISCARD, ELECTION CAMPAIGN

[Noel-Jean Bergeroux article: "Presidential Campaign Launched in Rambouillet With Review of 7-Year Term"]

[Excerpt] "The president of the Republic keeps his promises." This is, of course, the meaning which the government attached to the extraordinary cabinet meeting held in Rambouillet on Friday:

The head of state keeps his promises and scrupulously ensures that the work he started is completed in a satisfactory way. He solemnly is checking that in his speeches during his 7-year term, he has not raised any hopes which have not been realized. Another extraordinary cabinet meeting at the end of February will close the record book.

Thus, a government and head of state who so often give an impression of "advance publicity" are taking the risk of seeming to give an impression of "repetition." For, with few exceptions, the bill on professional equality, the creation of a children's institute, the measures contained in the 21 official pages published on Friday are not new. They already have been announced and have drawn comment. They already have been used by the government to demonstrate the generosity of its intentions.

The list includes legislative documents which give shape to an idea previously launched--professional equality for instance; implementation decrees adopted in recent months to bring recently-adopted laws into effect (pension insurance for craftsemn, family income); and adjustments of budgetary items implementing projects included in the figures in the 1981 finance law.

This is repetition ("information" the Elysee would say) but also a deliberate attempt to give the impression of a firm line and good management; an "end of term" impression. Whether intentional or not, that impression is very real: The government is clearing the decks. Mr Giscard d'Estaing is trying to give the impression that the ministers are tidying their school bags and clearing their desks before leaving school. Perhaps after all he is trying to give not only the impression of a completed task but also to suggest that there could be a new system, a change after his possible reelection? The work of this 7-year term is over. This government has finished. Another one will replace it and it will not be the same. That suggests a new version of the theme of change.

On the basis of this extraordinary cabinet meeting, therefore, it would not be too much to say that the present government is finishing current business. This is one way of confirming that France is now in an election campaign.

From this viewpoint, moreover, it now seems more difficult for the outgoing president not to indicate his intentions more clearly, intentions which nobody now seems to doubt but which remain deceptively veiled in mystery.

Indeed, he is now alone on stage. Around him the government machine is becoming more administrative than ever and more subordinate. The ministers are working out their notice. If they still have a role to play, the head of state reminded them of Friday, it will be to defend and promote with all their conviction what they have achieved during their term in office. However, for the time being, they have no future....

It is now up to the head of state to say what he intends to do about the future. The campaign to cast doubt on his ability to seek a second term will only end when he announces his decision.

The RPR currently is guided by a kind of preventive strategy. "If he stands, he has every chance of being defeated," Bernard Pons said. "We now have a chance of winning" as the Gaullist party's spokesmen officially say, taking care not to specify what instructions they will give if there is a straight fight between Valery Giscard d'Estaing and Francois Mitterrand.

Doest this mean that Mr Chirac's friends no longer rule out the possibility of giving the left a kind of "pass"--of changing alliances?

These question, raised here and there by the ever growing virulence of the Gaullist attacks, partly are answered by the strategy of trying to prevent a candidacy which it will be difficult to reject totally when the time comes.

If the Gaullists are so anxious for Giscard d'Estaing not to stand, if they are issuing increasing warnings and if some of them in private even go so far as to seem to be worried by a campaign full of "scandals," it is because they are aware of the difficulty they will have in not, sooner or later, giving reluctant or wholehearted support to a rightwing candidate who stays in the race against a leftwing candidate. Of course, they also know that if Giscard d'Estaing is reelected with any kind of appreciable margin they will, as one of them said, be able to take stock of themselves. They also know that the UDF, in one form or another, will be the instrument of retaliation when the time comes to elect deputies. (Did not UDF cadre Berthet recommend that his leaders immediately name candidates for all the parliamentary constituencies?)

The Gaullists no doubt know all that, but they are also aware that their statements about their chances of appearing in the second round are only seen as exorcisms or incantations. They will have to choose in the second round of the spring election. A party which left its voters free, abandoning its alliances, will be taking a risk which will be difficult to assess whatever the outcome.

Indeed, it is institutional constraints which form the strictest guarantee of the alliances. It could be considered that if Giscard d'Estaing succeeds in winning a presidential majority, it will be due partly to the parliamentary electoral law which gives rise to the parliamentary majority.

In other words, those who are not in the victory camp in the presidential election are likely to be unable to have their deputies elected if the assembly is dissolved. This is because most of the candidates in the constituencies cannot be elected without alliances as the two-round uninominal majority voting system requires.

That is an entirely different matter from the possible transfer of votes. It is one thing to observe or predict that a particular proportion of the Gaullist voters prefer to vote for the socialist candidate than for the Giscardian candidate. It is another thing for a party leadership to take a decision to stand down or not to stand down, a decision which involves the party's social thinking.

The president's deteriorating image in the opinion polls, confirmed again on Friday, and the government's gradual winding down probably strengthen the position of those who want the head of state to enter the preliminary campaign. However, Mr Giscard d'Estaing has in any case already put on his battle dress.

MITTERRAND WILL DISSOLVE ASSEMBLY IF ELECTED

[Text] In an interview granted to the weekly VALEURS ACTUELLES, Francois Mitterrand confirmed that he will dissolve the National Assembly if he is elected president of the republic.

"As for the future majority," he said, "there are many hypotheses....However, if the French enjoy being inconsistent, their choice must be respected. The electoral and government agreements will be a matter for the parties."

PCF organ L'HUMANITE concludes that the PS candidate "is justifying in advance alliances which would enable the right and the PS to govern together as in the past."

PRESIDENT PERTINI GREETS PRESIDENT REAGAN

AU202012 Rome ANSA in English 2005 GMT 20 Jan 81

[Text] Rome, 20 Jan (ANSA)--Italian head-of-state Sandro Pertini expressed his "warmest wishes" that President Ronald Reagan's mandate in the White House will be "crowned by success" in a message dispatched today to mark the new president's inauguration.

"The tasks awaiting you are among the most heavy and the wisdom and responsibility of your work are, and will be, under the eyes, not only of your own people, but of the world", Pertini added. "But I am deeply convinced that you will manage to deal with the grave problems that the world scene presents in this particular historical moment, with equilibrium and working in the interest not only of your people, but of the entire international community.

"It is thus with this certainty that, aware of how strong are the ties between our two countries and peoples, I send you my best and most sincere wishes for the pursuance of your very high mission".

FOREIGN MINISTRY SEEKS TO RESUME IRAN RELATIONS

LD191916 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1630 GMT 19 Jan 81

[Text] As one of the first results of the hostages' release, our Foreign Ministry has announced that the restrictive economic measures decided against Iran have no reason to continue. Indeed, the Foreign Ministry has expressed the hope that a way will be reopened for the resumption of normal relations in every sector, especially that of trade.

BERLINGUER HITS 'CONCESSIONS' TO TERRORISTS

[Giorgio Frasca Polara report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer's 16 January address to the Italian lower house: "Republic and Freedom at Stake"]

[Text] Rome--Why has the lower house suddenly been asked to take a vote of confidence in the government instead of voting on a simple motion on the prime minister's statement? Enrico Berlinguer asked yesterday in the lower house, opposing the motion for the Communists. Everyone in this room knows why, he added, but all citizens should know why too. There is only one reason, and it was clearly stated a few months ago by Deputy Battaglia: by calling for a vote of confidence, the aim was to brush aside the motion introduced by the PRI expressing full solidarity with the newspapers which refused to accept the demand to publish the Trani and Palmi terrorists' communiques.

We all know, the PCI secretary general continued, that this was not wanted particularly by the PSI. Therefore, irrespective of Deputy Forlani's verbal acrobatics and tightrope walking, the fact remains that, having failed during the days of highest tension to adopt its own stance on the issue of publishing the communiques, while all kinds of threats and pressures were being exerted on the press to publish them, the government is now shirking its duty--which, after all, would not require any particular courage--to express its full solidarity after the event with a clear political act. And it really is not enough to say that the Republican's motion does not contradict Deputy Forlani's remarks.

Berlinguer, who was heeded with silent attention by the entire house, stressed that this is the latest instance of the cowardly and petty conduct displayed by the government during the events that began with Judge D'Urso's kidnapping, and especially following the sudden note from the Socialists at Christmas, which the prime minister essentially epoused.

He declined to point out the events which marked the stady collapse of the steadfast line. This has been done excellently, however, he pointed out, by Comrade Natta [PCI floor leader] and several other colleagues--from the sudden and brazen evacuation of the Asinara top-security wing, to the conversations and meetings tolerated and authorized at the Trani, Palmi and Milan prisons, to the silence on the issue of what stance the press should adopt: a mockery of legality and an unprecedented abdication by the government of its duty to specify, pursue and make known a clear policy line.

One thing that is certain is that rarely has such a glaring contradiction been seen between words and deeds, between the pompous declarations of steadfastness and the deeds of specific submission. The aim was thus to mislead the country, by throwing it into confusion in order to conceal the real and undeniable fact that some kind of pact was reached with the terrorists.

The PCI secretary general pointed out next that the verbal resourcefulness of some DC and Socialist leaders has led to this being defined as a policy of "balanced steadfastness." These are meager expedients, he said, since this expression is not new to anyone acquainted with our country's history. It was used very frequently between 1920 and 1922 by politicians and members of government with respect to the fascist attacks on the Socialist and Communist parties, on the workers' associations, on the other workers organizations and on their newspapers.

We all know where Italy was taken by this "balanced steadfastness" which, through a blind hostility to the workers movement, disguised tolerance and capitulation, following which there came the collapse which brought down even those who had tolerated and capitulated. On other occasions, we have criticized previous governments for shortcomings in determination, efficiency or sensitivity in the antiterrorist struggle. But at the same time we have not neglected to give due recognition to results, when achieved. But never before have we witnessed an out-and-out surrender.

This is the most serious reason for our alarm and for the appeal which we make to the country; and at the same time this too is the principal reason for the vote of no confidence in the government that we will issue. This is not the only reason, of course. Consistent with opposition policy which we announced when this government was presented to Parliament, when we said that we would judge it by its performance, we now note that, on the basis of its performance, the government is worse than anyone forecast.

It has been so in its approach to the moral issue, namely the explosion of scandals of all kinds, with its dismissive and secretive attitude. It was so in the inefficiency and confusion displayed in the tragic first few days after the earthquake. We do not forget these things, and neither will the public, despite the veil which some people have tried to draw over these very serious problems in recent weeks. But we will not tire of proclaiming your responsibilities and of exerting pressure on you.

But, I repeat, the major reason for the Communists' vote against the government, Enrico Berlinguer stressed, is that you have committed an abdication of authority--for which the prime minister is primarily responsible--with respect to the supreme task facing every government of the republic, namely to safeguard the democratic institutions and to guarantee the security, freedom and the lives of all citizens. The concessions have opened a breach: It must be closed as soon as possible. What prompts the greatest indignation and even wrath, especially among those--first and foremost within the forces of law and order--who have most exposed themselves and involved themselves in the antiterrorist struggle, is that this submissiveness occurred at the time when the terrorist gangs were split, weakened and in a state of crisis, as a result of the blows--including some hard ones--received in both the political and legal fields.

Their crisis began in fact with the response which the government of the time, supported by us among others, gave during the Moro case. Now the remains of those gangs have regained their arrogance, are boasting a success and announcing further deeds and kidnapings. This is possible because this time their blackmail opened a breach, found an audience in certain political sectors and forced the government to shirk its duty.

It is not true, therefore, Deputy Forlani, that the terrorists' logic and the dynamic of their moves are unconnected with the attitudes of the government and of the political forces that support it. Actually, the facts show that they are used as a reference point by them and taken into their calculations.

Next, some points about the post-D'Urso situation. The judge, he said, has returned to his family, and we welcome this fact with the same expressions of "human solidarity" addressed to him and his family by the president of the republic. But the following question looms over the country: How many lives might now be in greater danger?

The terrorists--who destroyed the lives of Alessandrini, Bachelet, Galli, Casalegno, Tobagi, General Galvaligi, Rossa and so many other citizens, magistrates, policemen, Carabinieri and journalists--have in fact been emboldened by the submissiveness.

Can they be stopped, repelled, defeated and subdued? Berlinguer asked. We still believe that they can, because we feel that this is the country's wish and because even during the very confused events of the past 3 weeks we have seen how many forces--in all strata of the population, in the Carabinieri and police forces, in the majority of the courts, in the newspapers which, it is reckoned, account for 90 percent of readers, among the workers, trade unions and men and groups from all the democratic parties, as well as the whole of our own party--have resisted and are demanding a truly vigorous response (and not hypocritical words) to the maneuvers and blackmail of terrorism and its accomplices.

But there must be no repetition ever again of anything like what the government has done during this period. This has been demanded even by representatives of the DC leftwing, as well as the PRI and the Italian Liberal Party and by sectors and individuals of other democratic parties. We want to know clearly whether this clear undertaking will be made by the present government; and we will not be satisfied with contorted and generic statements that evade this very specific demand that we are making to you.

Next, Berlinguer pointed to the proposal that the Communists have made to the country, to the democratic forces and to all honest people of a government solution based no longer on the DC but on the PCI--a solution, he added, that we consider more valid than ever. In view of what has happened in recent months and weeks, in order to guarantee the safety and future of the republic. We are certain that this proposal will penetrate our people's minds with the mass movement and will prompt a response from the most responsible and farsighted forces within every democratic party.

But meanwhile, the priority right now is to stop terrorism and to block the path of submission. This is why we have urged all our party organizations to mobilize, to be vigilant, to work amid the working class, the workers and the entire people, to support the forces of law and order and to struggle to isolate the terrorists. But also this is why, the PCI secretary general concluded, amid prolonged, enthusiastic applause, we now appeal to and call to action all the democratic forces which, irrespective of their stances or silences during the recent events, feel that from now on the republic's safety, freedom and life can no longer tolerate any deviation from the line of consistent, rigorous and real steadfastness.

PAJETTA CALLS FOR 'GREATER DEMOCRACY' WITHIN PCI

LD191515 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 11-12 Jan 81 p 5

[Sandro Viola interview with PCI Directorate member Gian Carlo Pajetta in Rome: "Now, Comrades, Make Up Your Own Minds and Don't Wait for Orders"--date not specified]

[Excerpt] [Question] Deputy Pajetta, how would you sum up the reassertion of democracy announced by the last PCI Central Committee meeting?

[Answer] I would sum it up this way: The party has been reminded of the old saying, "physician, heal thyself." At a time when the PCI is advancing itself as a determining force in Italian democracy, as its guarantor, it could not fail to think again about the problem of democracy within itself. Clearly we could not plan a mobilization of the working people, of the citizens, and greater participation and involvement by them in supporting democracy if that involvement and participation were not first adopted within the PCI. You see, a Social Democratic representative needs very little--an important friend he can call, a few friends to patronize--but it is different for a Communist representative, who either succeeds in arousing his comrades' interest in a particular project and so secures advice and help and sets in motion a process of democratic consultation, or proves worthless, in which case it is better to replace him.

For Greater Democracy

[Question] But what is the source of the "sharp turn" of which [PCI Secretariat member] Napolitano and [Secretary General] Berlinguer spoke: Could it be said that the party leadership recognize the need within the PCI for greater democracy?

[Answer] That need was there. And by that I mean not just the right to vote but also the demand for criticism on the leaders' part, the need for a broader comparison of ideas--in sum, a broader movement in terms of what in other parties comes down, when all is said and done, to the irregular exercise of the right to vote. Let us take what has come to be called the November "turn." Some of the leaders talked very clearly at the last Central Committee meeting. They said: We must take care because, although the democratic alternative proposal has received a positive welcome and some people are even talking about the "breath of liberation," there is a danger that, as has happened before, the rank and file will stay home and do nothing and wait for the leadership to resolve the problem of the "new way of governing" or other questions of equal importance. There has been a general recognition that it is not just a question of sending out new policies from the top. What we want now is for the activities and the membership to understand that the leaders need more than just agreement. What we want is for the activists to stop believing that the best Communists are those who simply declare themselves ready to carry out orders.

[Question] But are we not seeing here the overturning of the party tradition, the tradition that fashioned democratic centralism?

[Answer] Napolitano answered that question when he said that the expression democratic centralism contains two elements and that we now want to put the accent on the second. We are convinced among other things that this emphasis can produce greater unity and a kind of unity which is more effective and less formal than in the past.

[Question] But how did this course correction come about so suddenly and in so drastic a manner, without any intervening stages?

[Answer] It is not quite true to say that it came about suddenly. Back as the last congress we said that there should no longer be any taboo about unanimity. After that, it is true, the inevitable inertia and traditionalism slowed down the evolutionary impetus. Now we have made things clear. Of course, the party still considers it positive to seek unitary positions; but no one should think any longer that a position is not unitary just because it is reached after full or even sharp debate and following a motion on which opposing votes are even recorded. I will go further and say that a position can be one of unity even if the conclusions of a debate prove different from those advanced by the leading group.

I Am Among Those Who Proved To Be in the Minority

[Question] While we are on the subject, is it true that at the last Central Committee meeting the Secretariat was placed in the minority. Did it submit a document which was then rejected by the majority of those present?

[Answer] That is true. I was one of those who found themselves in the minority. But the episode should not be viewed, as some overimaginative reporters have viewed it, as the confluence of a particular "current" in the majority which then rejected the chair's [presidenza] proposal. Let me tell you what really happened. At the end of the debate the chair proposed the approval of a short document dealing mainly with the organizational problems illustrated by Napolitano. The proposal looked inadequate and reductive, insofar as it failed to deal with the multiplicity of topics and problems considered in Napolitano's report, and in general to indicate the "sharp turn" of which both Napolitano and Berlinguer spoke. So the majority of the Central Committee decided to reject the proposal and asked instead for a document approving Napolitano's report and Berlinguer's conclusions.

[Question] It is strange that, just as the last Eurocommunist party remaining at the PCI's side--the PCE--is experiencing a return to "Leninism," the Italian Communists should be raising the subject of internal democracy again....

[Answer] We believe that we are mature enough to do that, and events like those in Spain teach us that a communist party which wants to be vanguard and a mass party cannot be held together with Secretariat circulars....

[Question] How do you think that the invitation to greater internal debate and wider comparison of opinions will be viewed by the mass of Communist functionaries?

[Answer] I hope it will be accepted without difficulties. If there are some who are unable to accept it, they will help us to see that we must change our way of working or indeed that we must change our profession.

FOREIGN MINISTER ON TRADE RELATIONS WITH IRAN

LD210024 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0014 GMT 21 Jan 81

[Text] The Portuguese foreign minister told Portuguese television tonight that his government will resume trade relations with Iran as soon as the release of the 52 American hostages is officially confirmed.

Asked to comment on the reported departure of the hostages to Algeria, Andre Goncalves Pereira said:

[Begin recording] Portugal never broke off diplomatic relations with Iran, contrary to that mistaken belief among many Portuguese. We only suspended commercial relations and these will be promptly resumed on the reported release of the hostages being confirmed. [end recording]

PINTO BALSEMAO VIEWS CURRENT ISSUES, POLICIES

[Juan Luis Cebrian 10 January interview in Lisbon with Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Pinto Balsemao: "Armed Forces' Reintegration Requires Dialogue With Military"]

[Excerpt] Question: It seems that the reform of the constitution will be the main topic in Portuguese politics in the immediate future. What role will the government play in it and what criteria will govern this reform?

Answer: As I said in my inauguration speech, the government as such has nothing to do with the subject and has no authority to initiate a specific reform. But obviously my party and the Democratic Alliance can take the legislative initiative in this connection. As far as I am concerned, there are three basic aspects to the reform, apart from several other points of detail or constitutional technicalities: First, the reintegration of the armed forces--which are now accountable to the Council of the Revolution and the chief of general staff, who is now the president of the republic--into the government sphere. Second, the clear definition of the powers of each of the institutional bodies (the presidency, the executive, the assembly, and so forth.) And last, what we call the economic organization of the state, in other words the state's function in economic life. I believe that we must make a constitution which will not divide us Portuguese on these points.

Question: What process can be forecast in this connection? Will the reform take place this year?

Answer: I believe so. The reform requires a two-thirds majority in parliament in order to be passed, and obviously we--I mean the Democratic Alliance--needs consensus with the Socialist Party, which I hope will be achieved. At present all the parties are examining their various plans for constitutional reform and I believe that the Democratic Alliance will be in a position to present its own in a few weeks' time. The armed forces' reintegration into the government sphere will mark the beginning of full democratic life in Portugal.

Question: What is the significance of the armed forces' return to government control?

Answer: The disappearance of the Council of the Revolution and of its legislative capacity and the armed forces' subordination to political authority. This will mark the beginning of full democratic life in Portugal following the revolutionary transition.

Question: Is the military well-disposed toward it?

Answer: Several members of the Council of the Revolution and President Eanes himself have stated on various occasions that this is the final step needed in the building of Portuguese democracy, so I do not believe that there are any major problems. If there are any problems of procedure, the government itself is preparing structures capable of handling this reintegration so that there will have to be both a frank dialogue with the military and technical work. Obviously this reintegration will not take place by decree: it is a process in which we will have to examine the actual reequipment of the armed forces and Portugal's military obligations and commitments.

Question: The second point which you indicated was a clear definition of institutional power. Will this affect the president of the republic? What is your opinion of Eanes' role?

Answer: I believe that a clear definition of the powers of every institutional body in the system can only benefit everyone, and of course everyone will be affected to a greater or lesser extent. As far as Eanes is concerned, he has said repeatedly that though his political blueprint is not the same as the Democratic Alliance's, he will respect the election results. In his speech at my government's inauguration, the president confirmed these ideas. In any case, the executive holds not a provocative stance, but a stance of institutional cooperation, though always maintaining its aim of fulfilling the Democratic Alliance's blueprint.

Question: Let us talk about the economy. In your inaugural speech as prime minister, you forecast that inflation would not exceed 16 percent in 1981.

Answer: Our economic plan is based on three objectives: greater development, with an increase in investments, which I hope will reach an 8 percent increase in the next 4 years; greater productivity; and price control. This is a continuation of the plan which we pursued in 1980 and which yielded us good results and undoubtedly also victory in the latest elections. It must be borne in mind that in 1979 inflation in Portugal was over 24 percent. In 1980 it barely exceeded 17 percent and in 1981 it will be even lower, as I have said. And I am sure that the Portuguese workers will accept controls on pay increases as long as prices control continues to be effective and their purchasing power remains constant or improves.

Question: What about energy?

Answer: Here we have a serious problem, because we are 80 percent dependent on oil and Iraq has been our main supplier. I estimate that in view of the difficulties in supplies, we will have to strengthen our relations with other friendly Arab nations.

Question: Does your plan envisage a reduction of unemployment?

Answer: Already in 1980 we managed to contain unemployment figures, which are still high. However, in the near future we intend to promote civil construction and to carry out an ambitious housing construction plan with a credit system for home buyers. I believe that both plans will immediately be reflected in reduced unemployment.

Question: How do you intend to finance the growth of investments? Will you increase the foreign debt?

Answer: Portugal's foreign debt is already very large. Bear in mind that in this year's budget 70 billion escudos have been allocated to servicing and discharging it. This does not worry us too much, because our gold reserves are still abundant. But I do not believe that it would be wise to increase our indebtedness significantly.

Our Public Sector Too Large

Question: With regard to the public sector, do you envisage a denationalization plan?

Answer: Our public sector is too large with regard to the economy as a whole and too many enterprises within it are sustaining enormous losses at the expense of state subsidies. This is why I believe that some sectors can and must be denationalized. I am not talking about complete denationalization, but about allowing competition from private enterprise in some sectors which are now public monopolies, such as banking and insurance. A bill in this connection has already been passed by the assembly, but the Council of the Revolution, which has the functions of a constitutional tribunal, has vetoed it three times.

Question: Let us talk about your party's congress which will be held next month.

Answer: The Social Democratic Party [PSD] is the largest in Portugal. It is the one with most deputies and the strongest party in the municipalities; it also has an absolute majority in the autonomous regions of Madeira and the Azores, an increasing strength within the trade unions and good support among young people. In recent months it has been growing and, following Sa Carneiro's tragic death, there has been an out and out avalanche of new members, doubtless as a homage of solidarity and support to him. I believe that the congress will be one of consolidation at which members must realize that the party is an essential factor in Portugal's political stability. The PSD is a party that has reached its maturity and has demonstrated the fact at the most difficult moments, such as the death of its leader. It must remain consistent with this.

Question: Will the posts of party chairman and prime minister be separated at the congress?

Answer: It is too early to say anything yet. The present situation has its defects but also its advantages, and the various groups within the party are suggesting very different options.

Question: But are you worried about the congress--I mean you personally?

Answer: Not at all.

Question: Are you worried about the possibility of the Democratic Alliance splitting before the end of the legislative period?

Answer: At present I do not consider that possible either.

Question: You mentioned your predecessor Sa Carneiro. Many people believe that toward the end he pursued an excessively conservative policy.

Answer: I do not believe so. The Sa Carneiro government pursued a genuine social democratic policy, channeled public funds toward the needy classes and imparted a thrust to the struggle against corruption, tax evasion and speculation. It pursued a policy of modernizing the country.

Question: What policy will your government pursue in foreign relations?

Answer: One of continuity. With Spain, specifically, we will have the best of relations, though aware of the specific problems--such as fishing, for instance--which must not in any way confuse the overall agreement. As for the general framework of foreign policy, we are worried by the situation in Poland. Neutrality is impossible when human rights are seen to be threatened, and Soviet expansionism cannot be accepted impassively. We condemned the Afghan invasion at the time and we would do the same in Poland's case. Moreover, Portugal is a member of NATO and will fulfill all its commitments within it.

Question: You mentioned the need for consensus with the Socialist Party on constitutional reform. Is it in fact possible?

Answer: I have already said so. Dialogue with the democratic opposition and an agreement on certain basic points remain essential.

Question: What is the state of your relations with Mario Soares?

Answer: Extremely cordial, on a personal level.

Question: Last, in your inauguration speech you indicated two fundamental points: On the one hand, the need for economic development, on the other, the pressing need for the democratization of civilian society--and you even urged society to organize itself not against the state but independently of the state. What did you mean by that?

Answer: I meant precisely that there is excessive state involvement in Portuguese life and that the state has no reason to maintain its predominance in several areas of social organization--and not only the economic field. For instance, the government does not have to intervene continually as mediator in labor negotiations and collective bargaining. On the other hand, social involvement and pluralism must be dynamized in all sectors and bureaucracy must be contained. In Portugal there are 400,000 officials working for the central administration, and that is in addition to the ones working for local and peripheral administrations.

PCE COMMUNIQUE ON PSUC STANCE ON EUROCOMMUNISM

LD191125 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 14 Jan 81

[Text] Madrid, 13 January--Following yesterday's meeting, the PCE Executive Committee issued the following communique:

"The Executive Committee has met to analyze the result and consequences of the Fifth United Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] Congress.

"It considers that the congress marked the abandonment of the policy pursued hitherto by both the PSUC and the PCE. It constitutes a serious regression in the Catalan communists' stances, with very negative repercussions for Spain and even Europe.

General Offensive

"The Executive Committee is aware that this result is framed within a more general offensive against Eurocommunism which, based on objective factors (the exacerbation of the crisis, unemployment, international tensions and the revival of the right) and on errors and inefficiencies in our work, has as its aim a return to traditional stances which became obsolete in our party years ago.

"This abandonment of the former policy has been reflected not only in the elimination of the term Eurocommunism but in an entirely different political substance on international topics and in the policy on alliances, the analysis of the transition and of the crisis and the nature of the party. This all represents an attitude of capitulation on the party of the working class and other progressive forces which, if it took place, would lead us to isolation, impotence and banishment to a ghetto.

"The Executive Committee reasserts its determination to vigorously carry forward our party's Eurocommunist policy. It believes that, looking ahead to the 10th congress, the essential issue is the defense, development and amplification of this policy, which logically implies a self-critical analysis of the work done since the previous congress and a consideration of the new problems posed to us by the crisis, the state of autonomies and the need for stronger and more democratic party increasingly well integrated into the social fabric.

"Inalienable Eurocommunist Policy"

"The Executive Committee declares that the essential components of what is known as the Eurocommunist policy, which the PCE considers inalienable, can be summed up in the following points:

"First, the defense of world peace; the elimination of blocs; detente and disarmament, uniting all forces wanting such a policy and the vigorous rejection of Spain's entry into NATO.

"Second, internationalist solidarity with all those struggling for socialism and national and social liberation from imperialism.

"Third, independence from other states, including socialist states, which implies the freedom to criticize stances which we judge detrimental to peace, socialism and other peoples' independence; the condemnation of any interference in the internal life of other parties. The reaffirmation of our well-known stances on Czechoslovakia, Afghanistan and Poland.

"Fourth, the struggle for a new unity of the international workers; and communist movement, within respect for the differing stances of each party and refuting in word and deed any concept of a leading party or state, in an effort to regain communism's international prestige.

"Fifth, the struggle for the unity of communists and socialists, surmounting, under present conditions, the consequences of the split of the twenties, and for the unity of the left and the progressive forces in Europe to defend peace and to provide a solution to the crisis favorable to the workers' masses and the peoples.

"Sixth, socialism within freedom, political, pluralism and alternatives, democracy and a state that is laical--with respect not only to religions but also to philosophies--and with the citizens' active involvement in decisionmaking. And within this perspective, the defense, development and intensification of political democracy and its extension t the socioeconomic field. The recognition and support of the social movements. The combination of political activity within the representative institutions with mass action, the exercise of which is guaranteed by the constitution. The defense of the national and regional rights and freedoms of the peoples of Spain.

"Seventh, full freedom of theoretical, philosophical and scientific research and of education.

"Eighth, the concept of the revolutionary Marxist party as a workers' and peoples' party which, within a pluralist framework, must demonstrate, through its ability to provide solutions and to cooperate with other workers' and progressive forces, its fitness to guide the process of society's socialist transformation.

"Obviously this policy embodies manifestations, in its international and domestic aspects, which we cannot renounce without distorting our political blueprint.

"The Executive Committee believes, proceeding from the points laid down above, that the foundations for PCE-PSUC cooperation, as stated in articles 20 and 42 of their respective statutes, have been broken by the conclusions of the Fifth PSUC Congress.

"It resolves to support the stance adopted by the PCE secretary general at his 11 January meeting with the PSUC chairman and secretary general, and agrees, in accordance with the decisions reached at the meeting, to continue conversations to examine on what bases to establish this cooperation at the present state.

"The Executive Committee believes that the solution of this abnormal situation depends on the PSUC members, who have the PCE's full support in this. It expresses its support for and solidarity with the efforts being made by everyone who is determined that the PSUC should regain its character as a Eurocommunist party."

Felipe Gonzalez Respectful

[Spanish Socialist Workers Party Secretary General] Felipe Gonzalez, who at first declined to make any statement on this controversial topic, has told EFE his thoughts and stated that "nobody will be surprised if I say that I do not agree with the thesis approved by the PSUC. I do not agree at all," he continued, "with the assertions on foreign policy. But the debate within that party seems strange to me, because it is completely alien to my ideological family, which is the socialist one.

"I have," he added, "made some rigorous criticisms, I believe, of Eurocommunism. But they are criticisms from a socialist stance and in no way from stances close to the Soviet Union or to Leninism. However, we must respect the internal communist debate. The right should always be warned to be careful of the use that it makes of these debates." He concluded by expressing the wish that these internal crises, both among the communists and among the centrists, would be resolved.

CATALONIAN COMMUNISTS DEFEND EUROCOMMUNISM

Further Reportage

LD201914 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1600 GMT 20 Jan 81

[Text] Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] leaders in the province of Gerona have sent a document to the Spanish Communist Party Central Committee declaring their unanimous support for the Eurocommunist line and premises. In the document they call on the Central Committee to implement an internal debate to lead to an extraordinary congress to correct the pro-Soviet, Leninist line adopted by the recent congress of the PSUC. The outcome of the Fifth PSUC Congress, in which the pro-Soviet line and theses came out on top of the Eurocommunist ones, has opened up a wide-ranging argument between the Spanish Communist Party and the Catalonian communists.

IRAQ, SPAIN ISSUE JOINT STATEMENT 14 JANUARY

JN141846 Baghdad Domestic Service in Arabic 1715 GMT 14 Jan 81

["Text" of joint Iraqi-Spanish statement issued in Baghdad and Madrid on 14 January 1981 at the end of the visit to Spain made by 'Izzat Ibrahim, vice chairman of the Iraqi Revolution Command Council]

[Text] At the invitation of the Spanish Government, 'Izzat Ibrahim, vice chairman of the Iraqi Revolution Command Council [RCC], paid an official visit to Spain from 12-14 January 1981. 'Izzat Ibrahim and the delegation accompanying him were accorded a friendly and hospitable welcome, something which reflects the cordial historical relations as well as the mutual friendship and cooperation linking the two countries' peoples.

During 'Izzat Ibrahim's presence in Madrid, he was received by His Majesty King Juan Carlos I. He also held talks with Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez. Meanwhile, Hasan 'Ali, RCC member and trade minister in the Republic of Iraq; Juan Antonio Garcia Diez, Spanish minister of economy and commerce; Hamid 'Alwan, Iraqi minister of state for foreign affairs; and Jose Pedro Perez Llorca, Spanish minister of foreign affairs, held working meetings.

During these contacts and in an atmosphere permeated by mutual frankness and understanding, the two sides held talks on the development of bilateral relations and the international situation, particularly those issues pertaining to west Europe, the Arab region and the Arab Gulf.

The two sides expressed their satisfaction with the excellent status of their bilateral relations and expressed the desire to continue strengthening these relations in a manner that is in harmony with the strong ties in all fields that concern the two countries' peoples. They stressed their desire to promote and expand the economic, scientific, technical and other spheres of cooperation in the interest of the two countries.

The Spanish side has highly evaluated the economic and social accomplishments that have been achieved in Iraq under the leadership of President Saddam Husayn. It has also commended President Saddam Husayn's role in the Arab and international spheres. In this respect, the Spanish side stressed its interest in the national declaration announced by President Saddam Husayn on 8 February 1980 on relations between the Arab world and the neighboring countries, considering it a factor that can contribute to stability and balance in a region of great importance for world peace.

The Iraqi side stressed its appreciation for Spain's firm stand in support of the just Arab causes in its international relations, both in the bilateral and multilateral fields.

To develop bilateral relations, the two sides discussed ways of developing their economic and trade cooperation. Accordingly, and following the meeting held by the joint Iraqi-Spanish committee, the two sides expressed their satisfaction with the positive development of their economic and trade relations and with the results contained in the minutes of the fifth meeting of the joint committee, which took place on the occasion of this visit. The minutes detailed a search for new ways to achieve and develop economic cooperation, particularly in the fields of transport, communications, agriculture, housing, construction, oil industry and other industries in general. It also contained ways to increase and diversify trade exchange and to develop technical cooperation between the two countries.

Contacts were also held between the members of the Iraqi side to the joint committee and Spanish institutions and firms with the aim of increasing trade exchange in the future. Agreement was reached to hold meetings next year.

The Iraqi side explained the dangerous situation in the Arab region that has ensued from the signing of the Camp David accords, which represent a unilateral attempt that contradicts the Arab nation's interests and the Palestinian Arab people's rights. The Iraqi side outlined the efforts made by Iraq and the other Arab countries to cope with these dangers. The Iraqi side underlined the necessity of restoring a balance to the region as an important condition for the establishment of a just and durable settlement.

The two sides expressed their concern over the deteriorating situation in the Middle East. They reaffirmed their faith that the Israeli forces' complete withdrawal from all the occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem, and the establishment of the Palestinian people's national rights, including their right to self-determination in their homeland, are two basic conditions without which a just and durable peace cannot be achieved.

The Iraqi side explained the situation in the Arab Gulf region and the developments in the confrontation with Iran. The Iraqi side also outlined the serious situation stemming from Iran's continuous violation of the principles of good neighborliness and coexistance and its refusal to recognize Iraq's legitimate rights and sovereignty over its waters and land.

The Spanish side expressed its concern over the outcome of the dispute. It also expressed support for the various efforts being undertaken on all international levels to achieve a cease-fire and a just settlement through direct negotiations between the parties concerned, to secure their legitimate and just rights and to establish the bases of coexistance, cooperation and friendship among the region's states.

The Iraqi side pointed to the threats of the increasing foreign military presence and the superpowers' continuing attempts to obtain military facilities in this region, the thing which jeopardizes the region's peace, stability and progress.

The two sides reasserted their desire to contribute to the establishment of a new world economic order based on the principles of equality, solidarity and independence, putting an end to the unfair imbalance existing between the developing and industrial states and guaranteeing fairer and better utilization of the productive forces, scientific achievements and technology.

The Spanish side highly appreciated Iraq's proposal to establish a long-term world fund to help the developing states overcome the impact of inflation.

The two sides agreed to exchange periodic visits and meetings on the highest levels to further promote, entrench, and maintain bilateral relations and joint cooperation to bolster world peace and stability.

His Majesty Juan Carlos, King of Spain, renewed his invitation to his excellency President of the Republic of Iraq Saddam Husayn to visit Spain. The invitation was accepted. Its date will be fixed upon the two sides' contacts through the proper channels.

'Izzat Ibrahim expressed his appreciation for the hospitality and welcome accorded him and the delegation accompanying him and highlighted the friendship he felt during his visit to Spain.

FOREIGN OFFICE INCREASES STAFF IN TEHRAN

LD201414 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1345 GMT 20 Jan 81

[By Tom McMullan]

[Text] Britain is increasing its diplomatic staff in Tehran, the Foreign Office confirmed today.

Two diplomats were flying from London to Tehran today to join the British interests section in the Swedish Embassy. This will bring the number of British officials from the Foreign Office in Tehran to four. But a Foreign Office spokesman said this increase in staff "does not mean that relations between Britain and Iran can be considered as having returned to normal." The spokesman said it was hoped that a release of the American hostages would bring about an overall improvement in relations between Britain and Iran.

Meanwhile Britain was continuing its efforts to secure the release of the four British subjects held. In September last year, Britain withdrew all its diplomats from Tehran except one who then served in the British interests section of the Swedish Embassy. A month ago, an administrative officer was sent out to help him. The Foreign Office said today that the increase in staff was intended to cope with the extra work load there.

GOVERNMENT SET TO RESUME TRADE TALKS WITH USSR

[Nigel Wade dispatch: "Britain Offers to Resume Russian Trade Talks"]

[Excerpts] Moscow--Britain has offered Moscow a resumption of regular ministerial trade talks which the government put off last year to show disapproval of Russia's move into Afghanistan.

Russia has yet to reply formally to the proposal, but British officials hope that the joint commission on trade and economic matters will convene in London in May.

Trade officials in Whitehall believe a move should be made now to help British companies win their share of orders under Russia's new five-year economic plan, which is in its final stages of preparation.

In another move, Mr Gavin Dick, under-secretary for trade, is to lead a delegation to Moscow next week for three days of trade discussions. His group will review the development of economic and industrial links since the signing of a bilateral co-operation agreement in 1975, and also explore prospects for further study at the proposed joint commission meeting in May.

The proposed May session in London would be attended by Mr Parkinson, trade minister. The Russian delegation at joint commission meetings is usually led by a deputy minister of foreign trade.

British officials say that while there are bound to be continuing political differences with Russia over Afghanistan, the government has always stipulated that it stood for mutually beneficial trade, and never intended that trade should cease.

Provisional figures show that British exports to Russia totalled 452,750,000 pounds last year, an increase of about eight per cent, over the 1979 figure of 419 million pounds. Imports from Russia fell about five per cent, from 828,900,000 to 786,170,000 pounds. Officials in London say few major export contracts were signed with British companies last year, and much of the increased export volume was the result of deliveries made under contracts from previous years.

PAPANDREOU VOICES VIEWS ON NATO, DEFENSE ISSUES

NC191445 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 17-18 Jan 81 pp 1, 11

["Text" of interview with PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou on Greek national affairs--date not given]

[Text] The dialogue with the government concerning the present existence of stored nuclear warheads in Greece has been concluded. The dialogue has been concluded by irrepairably exposing the policy of the "New Democracy" government because there are really unknown quantities of NATO and U.S. nuclear weapons stored in our country. While this is known to all the governments in the world and to all the foreign state agencies, it has been kept a secret for the Greek people, who would suffer the tragic consequences in the event of a worldwide conflagration.

The government intentionally simplifies the question of foreign bases in Greece because the storage of nuclear weapons is actually a separate issue. The USSR has warned Greece that for as long as there are nuclear installations in our country, it would be a nuclear target in the event of a conflict between the two superpowers. Under these conditions, it is obvious that this huge issue should be submitted to the judgment of the people and the national representatives.

It is the intention of PASOK to raise this issue in the Chamber of Deputies as soon as it assumes the government of the country.

However, the question of nuclear weapons in Greece has been clarified recently by the United States and greatly discredits the government before the Greek people. It has now been affirmed that when Greece withdrew from the NATO military wing, the NATO and U.S. nuclear installations in Greece were not touched. Here is the proof:

The report by the subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East of the congressional committee on international relations dated 27 March 1977 (1), pages 30 and 32, says:

"The major installations utilized by the United States in Greece include the Ellinikon airbase near Athens and the Nea Makri communications station on the Greek mainland near Marathon. The main facilities on the island of Crete include the Iraklion air station on the island's north central coast and the Soudha complex located on the northwest coast near Khania. Other U.S. communications facilities and five NATO NADGE sites are spread throughout the country. In Greece, there are also nuclear weapons storage sites which serve both U.S. and NATO purposes."

(Note: It should be pointed out here that this subcommittee report is not classified but was circulated in a publication that can very easily be bought in the United States!...

During the foreign policy debates in the Chamber of Deputies, the government gave us the assurance that there were no nuclear warheads in Crete and specifically not in Soudha. However, in an article the other day (14 Jan 81) in the INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE, U.S. journalist Sulzberger informed us that there are nuclear weapons in Soudha. The U.S. journalist writes:

"At the same time, the Atlantic alliance--and especially the United States--depends heavily on the Soudha base for naval and ammunition support including nuclear storage; on Iraklion, Crete--as well as on the Ellinikon base near Athens--as air command bases, and on N. Makri near Marathon as a telecommunications center and on five special communications posts in northern Greece."

Therefore, it is obvious that the New Democracy government not only exposes the country and our people to nuclear destruction but also mocks the Greek people.

However, in addition to the really huge issue of nuclear weapons, there is also the issue of negotiations for Greece's reintegration into NATO's military wing and for the renewal of the "Greek-American defense agreement on the bases."

Of course, the PASOK positions on these two issues are well known and immutable. Thus, we do not deem it necessary to repeat them. What we would like to stress at this time is that the government's way of handling the issues has been and still is unacceptable, even to all those who supported both Greece's participation in the Atlantic alliance and the presence of foreign bases in Greece. This is because this handling entails concessions in the country's national sovereign rights and a critical downgrading of our country's defense position.

The government has anxiously pursued Greece's reintegration into NATO's military wing based on the allegation that if it did not, the United States would upset the balance of power in the Aegean to the benefit of Turkey. Moreover, the Greek Government set the country's reintegration as a prerequisite for the U.S. and NATO bases to remain in Greece. And "they attained" the reintegration!

"They attained it" by agreeing to limit national airspace from 10 to 6 miles!

"They attained it" by agreeing to upset the Aegean status which was in force before 1974. (The creation of the Larissa command raises for the first time the question of redistributing the Aegean operations control between Izmir and Larissa. It is supposed that an agreement will be sought within the framework of a committee composed of the Turkish commander in Izmir, the Greek commander in Larissa and the U.S. commander in Naples. However, until an agreement is reached--if it is reached--Naples will be making decisions on the operational control in the Aegean!)

"They attained it" without binding the United States on the maintenance of the military balance in the Aegean!

And we have reached the amazing result of Greece having returned to the military wing of NATO with the main goal to maintain the Greek-Turkish balance in the Aegean without even having secured this condition. Thus, the government has managed to reenclave Greece into NATO and let the United States and NATO free to convert Turkey into a major arsenal in the eastern Mediterranean.

The negotiations for the U.S. bases are continuing. The United States is pressing the government to agree to the extension of U.S. range of action beyond the conventional area of NATO.

The United States is pressing the government to finalize a new status of operational control in the Aegean to the benefit of Turkey.

The United States is pressing the government to agree to the complete demilitarization of the Aegean islands.

And whereas the government should be in a position to at least set as a condition--according to its official planning targets--the maintenance of the Greek-Turkish military balance in the Aegean, just the opposite happens.

That is, the United States is threatening to upset the balance in the Aegean completely in favor of Turkey, should Greece not accept all the conditions set by the United States--range of action of the bases, nuclear weapons, new status in the Aegean and so forth.

It would probably be worthwhile to also stress that the five secret protocols accompanying the "U.S. agreement" almost certainly include the U.S. commitment to support in the long run all the Turkish demands at the expense of our country's territorial integrity.

Consequently, both the present and the previous governments of "New Democracy" have fully proven that they are incapable of handling our national affairs (always within the framework of their own policy) without serious national losses; and that they are prepared to finally yield to the demands of the Atlantic alliance which would result in the shrinkage of our national sovereignty!

Therefore, it is nationally momentous that the president of the republic should immediately proceed with the dissolution of the Chamber of Deputies and the proclamation of elections so that the Greek people may be able to participate in the making of decisions, which in the long run will determine the nation's fate.

Averof Response

NC192135 Athens APOYEVMATINI in Greek 19 Jan 81 p 18

["Text" of Defense Minister Evangelos Averof's 18 January statement in answer to Papandreou's interview with EXORMISI]

[Text] In his EXORMISI interview and in an editorial of the same weekly newspaper, Mr Andreas Papandreous again brings up the possible existence of nuclear warheads in Greece. He affirms their existence. He doubts the accuracy of my relevant cautious statement, and he even says in the editorial that "serious doubts are being created about my general mental condition."

I will not answer this last point. If we speak about mental conditions of Greek statesmen in national struggles, I will have to say tough self-evident things, things that I wish to avoid. Besides, all this is well known to the public. What the public is not well aware of is nuclear weapons, certain aspects of which are kept secret in all the countries.

The PASOK chairman is trying to throw light on these aspects, but he makes a mistake in basing his views on presumed official U.S. texts, which he has first released here. Because they give rise to misinterpretations both here and abroad, the following clarifications are necessary:

First: his interview in the 17-18 January issue of EXORMISI (and other reports in the newspaper) refers to a report of the U.S. House Foreign Affairs Committee. This reference is misleading. The matter is about a study made by the Library of Congress, through a British contributor. It is categorically stated in the preface of the study that the contents do not reflect the official views of the Congress. Some variation then, in the direction that accidentally helps Mr Papandreou in his declarations, [kapio lathos lipon sti dhiefthinsi pou kata tikhi dhiefkolini ton K. Papandreou sta kirigmata tou] and some ignorance of the preface [kai kapia agnoia tou prooimiou], prevent us from stating officially either that there are or are not nuclear warheads, because we believe that either of these two statements is detrimental to the country's security.

Second: In the same interview, the PASOK chairman refers to a recent article by Mr Sulzberger to draw the conclusion that there are nuclear weapons at the Soudha base. If this is the meaning of the article, which chronologically is somewhat vague, (exactly as Mr Papandreou translates the article himself), then the distinguished American journalist is a victim of inaccurate information. On Crete, in particular, the government decided that it should disclose the reality by stating both in the Chamber of Deputies and to the press that there are no nuclear weapons anywhere on the island. If Mr Papandreou continues to prefer unofficial U.S. sources over official Greek sources, this is another matter.

Third: The PASOK chairman insists that there are nuclear warheads in Greece, that Greeks and Americans have separate keys to their storage sites and that this is enough for Greece to become a target of nuclear attack. There are others who support the opposite opinion, that is, as long as they can only be used with our consent, these weapons will be used only for the defense of our nation in the event of a world war.

However, in the event that Mr Papandreou's view is correct, the following question arises: These weapons systems were developed in Europe between 1953 and 1962. The most accurate of these systems--two kinds--were developed in 1964 when Greece was ruled by the late Yeoryios Papandreou. The present PASOK chairman was then one of the top ministers, son of the all-powerful prime minister. The cold war during that post-Cuban period was more aggravated than today. Consequently, according to Papandreou's argument, the storing of nuclear warheads has made us a more probable target of a nuclear attack.

However, what were Mr Papandreou's actions, while he was in a high government position, toward the protection of his country from the dangers that he is pointing to today and which were greater at that time? How can such a radical change of position on such a basic issue be explained? Could it be that he did not know there were nuclear weapons in Greece which, if they are here today, have been here since then? If we support that all of the countries mentioned in the Library of Congress study (that is, including Greece) accepted the nuclear weapons, was he unaware that they had accepted them, two of the most accurate ones, in 1964, that is during the period he was in power and during his newborn anti-Americanism?

But if he was unaware of all this, then another conclusion is drawn: That Mr Papandreou was less interested in the country's defense when he was in power than now when he is in the opposition. While in the opposition, Mr Papandreou is mainly interested in popular sloganeering which will attract sometimes one side sometimes the other side of citizens. However, sloganeering misleads toward taking public stances that could harm the country, because there are delicate matters which dictate restraint, prudence and responsibility.

PRESS REACTION TO EVREN'S 15 JAN KONYA ADDRESS

NC201036 [Editorial Report] Istanbul's Turkish press has carried the following recent comment on Turkish Head of State Gen Kenan Evren's 15 January public address in Konya, Turkey.

On 16 January, HURRIYET, on page 3, carries an editorial by Oktay Eksi who says: "Head of State Gen Kenan Evren has made another disclosure long awaited by the public. He said 'since the day we came to power we have been saying that we will rectify the present corrupt situation. We have set out with a plan: We will establish a constituent assembly and we will return to a democratic system. This is a soldier's word, a word of honor. Now I am declaring here in Konya: The constituent assembly will be established on a date between 30 August and 29 October. Let me point out, however, that the National Security Council will not remain outside.'" After saying that the Turkish nation should consider this declaration as a reliable assurance, Oktay Eksi continues: "However, there are certain points in Head of State Gen Evren's address that we deem it our duty to dwell upon, to express our views: Every sensible fellow countryman wishes to see the abandonment of an economic policy which has pushed Turkey into the grip of inflation and which considers creating a deceptive welfare paradise by minting money without counterbalance as a great achievement. It is a fact, however, that even those who most earnestly desire to see the 24 January 1980 measures achieve success have recently been worrying about the outcome. This apparently is due to the fact that the public economic enterprises have not been placed under a rational administration and that the inflation has not yet been curbed as much as has been expected. We believe that the present administration should bend on these issues in a specific manner."

On 17 January, MILLIYET, on page 2, carries an article by columnist Mumtaz Soysal who comments on Gen Kenan Evren's announcement that the constituent assembly will be established on a date between 30 August and 29 October, and that present political parties will not be represented in it. Soysal says: "Such a solution was tried after 27 May 1960 when the 1961 constitution was being prepared. . . The law establishing the constituent assembly contained this provision: 'Those who, through their activities, publications and behavior, continued until the 27 May revolution to support acts and policies contrary to the constitution and human rights may not be elected members of the House of Representatives. . . .' This provision excluded from constitutional debates a section of the political cadre in the country, including those who cherished specific views on the future of the country. These people never ceased to question the legality of the constitution. This is the great danger which lies behind the statement that 'no one will be included in the constituent assembly from the political parties.' If we wish to see Turkey enter a long healthy period, this danger must unavoidably be averted."

On 17 January, CUMHURIYET, on pages 1 and 5, carries a commentary by Ugur Mumcu who quotes passages from Gen Kenan Evren's address in Konya on 15 January and says, among other things: "The Turkish Armed Forces have so far taken over the administration of the country three times, but in each case withdrew to its barracks after handing over the administration to the civilians. No military dictatorship has been experienced in our recent history. Honorable Evren most authoritatively accentuated this fine tradition of our armed forces in his recent speech in Konya. We therefore happily welcome the disclosure about the constituent assembly." After stressing the importance of the manner in which the constituent assembly will be formed, Mumcu continues: "If the constituent assembly to be established is open to all sections of our population, this will extensively reflect the democratic character of the constitution to be drafted. Undoubtedly, if discussions on the constitution are to begin simultaneously with the formation of the constituent assembly, such discussions will lend strength and respect to the text of the constitution."

Mumcu concludes: "If we do not wish to go back to the period before 12 September, we must see to it that all issues are discussed, without any prejudice, in the light of the bitter experiences of the past. If the constituent assembly is open to all sections of our society this will undoubtedly add to the strength of the 12 September administration.

"In such periods silence becomes an unknown enemy and freedom becomes an unwanted friend. The friendship of frank speech and the enmity of silence will become much clearer later on.

"It is a fact that discussing the constitution is much more important than preparing it."

On 19 January, MILLIYET, on page 1, carries an unattributed editorial entitled "A Difficult Quest" which says: "It is clear that we are in quest of a multiparty model of democracy. This quest will begin in the autumn of 1981 and will continue until concrete clauses find their way into the constitution to be drafted by the constituent assembly. It is difficult to say that those institutions which are occupied with politics as well as individuals possess clear-cut views on the outlines of the new model. To be more frank, no one knows what is desired. But we all know what is not desired, and that is the kind of democracy practised before 12 September."

The editorial then draws attention to the blunders that led to the military takeover on 12 September and continues: "At this juncture, we wish to point out certain dangers which may adversely affect the structure of the new model. True, no one wishes to return to the conditions which prevailed before 12 September, but this wish springs from the circumstances which resulted in the wrong implementation of the principles; that is, the danger we wish to avoid stems not from the principles but from the method of implementation." The writer then concludes: "We all know that a guided model of democracy will, in the end, create more serious problems than those in the past. Nor can we deny that quests which aim at containing the progress of our society will meet the opposition of the masses in a short time. It is not easy to find a solution.... In its quest for new solutions, the 12 September administration has a duty to refrain from sowing the seeds of blunders committed in the past. To put it briefly; a difficult period of searching is beginning."

MINISTERS DISCUSS TRADE WITH IRAN, HOSTAGE RELEASE

[Alan Osborn dispatch: "EEC To Drop Trade Sanctions"]

[Text] Brussels--Common Market foreign ministers yesterday expressed "great satisfaction" at the release of the American hostages by Iran and said the trade sanctions they imposed last May "are no longer called for."

It would be up to each member state however to restore "adequate trade relations in the areas concerned," said the ministers.

They added that they now looked to the Iranian Government for the "accelerated release of all British citizens held in Tehran against whom no charges have been made."

Lord Carrington is expected to announce today the British Government's policy towards Iran. This is likely to be that normal trade could be resumed but that arms sales will not be permitted until the four British hostages--three missionary workers and a businessman--are released.

Although no dramatic changes in trade between Iran and the EEC are likely because of the disorderly condition of the Iranian economy and the war with Iraq, in time there will be two important developments.

First, Iran is likely to increase its oil exports substantially--they could more than double by the end of the year. This will have repercussions for world oil supplies and prices generally.

Secondly, the Iranians are likely to be in the market for armaments, and since America is likely to prove an unwilling provider this means a lot of business could come Europe's way if the governments permitted.

Most, however, are expected to take a dim view of selling arms to Iran, both because of that country's behaviour over the hostages and because of the continuing war with Iraq.

Britain's exports to Iran in the first 11 months of 1980 were 368 million pounds compared with 215 million pounds in the same period of the preceding year. But virtually all the 1980 business came before May 22 as companies hurried to beat the trade sanctions.

The EEC countries will now presumably lift the restrictions placed on Iran's diplomatic establishments in their territory and withdraw the tougher visa requirements imposed last May.

But there was little feeling in Brussels yesterday that much warmth would return to either trade or political relations in the near future.

British officials were divided over whether release of the American hostages made it more or less likely that the four Britons would soon be freed. Some argued that Iran would now become more conciliatory and try to re-enter world diplomatic circles. But others speculated that the Iranian Government could encounter some political back-lash at home for giving up the hostages.

RESEARCH TO CONTINUE ON MIDEAST INITIATIVE

[Alan Osborn dispatch: "EEC To Go Ahead With Middle East Initiative"]

[Text] Brussels--The Common Market is to press on with its Middle East peace initiative, but it was clear from a meeting of EEC foreign ministers in Brussels yesterday that no dramatic developments are likely for several months yet.

The ministers entrusted Mr van der Klaauw, the Dutch foreign minister, and president of the EEC Council, to undertake another round of visits to the countries involved.

His purpose will be confined to seeking more detailed information on specific aspects of a possible settlement, such as the precise meaning of "self-determination," security arrangements and the status of Jerusalem.

Senior officials said yesterday that it was not certain that the EEC's researches would find a useful role for the Community in future Middle East peace moves.

But it was felt that the Venice Declaration of last June, calling for the Palestine Liberation Organisation to be associated with Middle East peace negotiations, had already been helpful in reassuring the Arab countries.

The chief reason for the low-key attitude to be taken by the Nine over the next few months is uncertainty over the Reagan administration's policies on the Middle East.

The general impression in Brussels is that the new American Government will take a more pro-Israeli line than its predecessor and this could make it even less tolerant of a separate peace initiative by the EEC.

Dr Kissinger, who has been involved in foreign policy consultations with Mr Reagan, recently strongly attacked the EEC initiatives and said it would prove useless.

Officials in Brussels also believe that the elections in France and Israel, in April and July respectively constitute an important reason for deliberation at this stage.

There seems general acceptance that if the Reagan administration does refuse to support the Middle East peace initiative then it would be abandoned. To persist in the face of American opposition would be "posturing" in the words of a senior official.

It is expected that the American attitude will be fully explored when Mrs Thatcher and Lord Carrington visit President Reagan next month.

Everything now points to the crucial EEC decisions being taken during Britain's EEC presidency beginning on July 1.

Lord Carrington will then become the president of the EEC Council and will have the job of presenting any EEC initiative in the United Nations, if indeed that is the form in which it is launched.

KREISKY COMMENTS ON U.S. HOSTAGES' RELEASE

AU211301 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1140 GMT 21 Jan 81

["Excerpt" of Chancellor Bruno Kreisky's statement on the release by Iran of the U.S. hostages in the Austrian Nationalrat at the beginning of its 21 January session--recorded]

[Text] On behalf of the Austrian Government, from this rostrum where the most important government statements are delivered, I would like to say how very much we congratulate the American nation on this event, how much we have understood how it regarded this taking of hostages as a humiliation. [applause]

I would also like to say from this rostrum that this event, which was prepared by the former administration, the former president, but which occurred on the first day of office of the new President, that I consider this event as a good omen for the policy of the coming years.

I also believe that it is the Austrian Government's duty to thank the Algeria president and the Algerian Government for acting as mediators in such a prudent and circumspect manner and for having brought this difficult problem now to a successful conclusion. [applause]

This event has great importance in itself, for whoever has ever been deprived of his freedom for political reasons, if only for a few days, realizes what this long de facto loss of freedom meant for the people who had to suffer it. But apart from that, I believe that it is one of the few positive events that have occurred in the past few months and that there is reason to hope that other positive events will follow it.

On the part of the Austrian Government we will at any rate do everything to lend our good offices to a policy of understanding.

VAN AGT SEES NO REASON TO STOP TAIWAN SUB SALE

[Own correspondent report: "Cabinet Stands by Decision: RSV Order Must Go Ahead"]

[Text] The Hague--The cabinet sees no reason for going back on the decision on the supply of two submarines to Taiwan. This decision would only be revoked if there were "very strong reasons" for doing so, Prime Minister van Agt said yesterday after the weekly cabinet meeting. "We see no such strong reasons, we regard full employment as very important," van Agt said.

According to the prime minister the cabinet had a "thorough discussion" about the supply of the submarines to Taiwan. Van Agt remained vague about Foreign Minister van der Klaauw's standpoint now that the PRC has threatened sanctions. Van Agt said yesterday that Van der Klaauw had not explicitly stated in the cabinet meeting that the delivery should now definitely not go ahead.

Shortly before the Christmas recess the second chamber voted by a narrow majority (76 for, 74 against) to support the cabinet's decision to grant Reijn-Schelde-Verolme [RSV] an export license. The chamber will debate the matter again next week. Van Agt said yesterday that the chamber is free to express opposition to granting an export license but he doubts "whether that is wise." The prime minister refused to say what conclusions the cabinet would draw from a possible rejection of permission by the chamber.

Contrary to earlier reports, Van Agt said that before the cabinet decision on the export license (at the end of last November) the PRC already knew about the intention to award the order to RSV. The Netherlands Ambassador to China Kenppelhout had informed the Chinese about it, Van Agt said. According to the prime minister the Chinese did not threaten sanctions when initially informed.

Van Agt said yesterday that before the cabinet decision, "a Chinese Government official" already knew about the intention to assent to the supply of the submarines. According to Van Agt the Chinese threat to impose sanctions is influenced by the fact that Ronald Reagan takes over as the new U.S. president shortly. Reagan has invited five top Taiwan officials to his inauguration on 20 January.

GOVERNMENT GUARANTEES POLISH FOOD SHIPMENT CREDITS

[Text] The Hague, 17 Jan--The cabinet has decided to grant 125 million guilders in export credit guarantees for food supplies to Poland. Prime Minister van Agt, who announced this yesterday, stressed that this is merely a government guarantee for financing such supplies. The EC countries had earlier announced the intention to take initiatives to improve the precarious food situation in Poland.

SCHMIDT COMMENTS ON RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

[Text] Bonn, 21 Jan (DPA)--According to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, the Federal Government will have consultations without delay with the administration of new U.S. President Ronald Reagan who was inaugurated on Tuesday. Addressing the SPD parliamentary group on Tuesday, the chancellor said that Bonn strongly will stress the need for diplomatic cooperation with the Soviet Union in its talks with the U.S. administration and will insist on a policy of balance.

According to the parliamentary group today, Schmidt said the prospects for a meaningful division of labor within the overall concept with which the West intends to respond to the Soviet Union's policy of expansion, particularly in the case of Afghanistan, are good.

The chancellor confirmed that he will travel to the United States for talks with President Reagan "somewhat later" than Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, who is to visit the United States in March.

Schmidt said with regard to the policy of the new U.S. leadership that new Secretary of State Alexander Haig advocated arms limitation before the Senate, not an expansion of NATO's sphere. Haig will adhere to the U.S.-Soviet SALT process, which affects the Federal Republic in particular, as well as to an early start of talks with the Soviet Union. Schmidt described Haig's views as a realistic presentation of the world situation as well as an opportunity for a sensible policy.

According to the SPD parliamentary group, the chancellor places hopes in the continuation of the Geneva talks between the United States and the Soviet Union on medium-range weapons. He expects the next round also to have a positive influence on the SALT process. NATO's twin decision on the introduction of new nuclear medium-range weapons in West Europe with a simultaneous offer of talks with the Soviet Union was described by Schmidt as indispensible for the alliance. Anyone who questions this decision casts doubts on NATO's cohesion, he stressed, alluding to several SPD deputies who, because of the U.S. Senate's failure to ratify the SALT II agreement, regard the basis for the NATO decision as having been removed or believe a new situation exists. Schmidt said it is inconceivable for the West not to respond when the Soviet Union weekly is adding a new nuclear SS-20 medium-range weapon to its potential.

On the subject of arms exports, Schmidt stated that the Federal Government has no intention of making decisions in the near future on the export of tanks to Saudi Arabia. The government is not committed on this issue. The lower house parliamentary groups should participate in the decision process of reexamining and possibly revising Bonn's principles on arms exports. Criteria have to be found which take into account expediency as well as moral considerations. Schmidt further made it known that the government's serious efforts to reverse its decision on supplying two submarines to the military dictatorship in Chile have not yet been concluded. Schmidt promised that this decision will be reexamined as strong opposition was expressed in the SPD parliamentary group and executive against an arms deal with Chile.

Urges Contacts

LD211936 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1800 GMT 21 Jan 81

[Excerpt] Chancellor Schmidt has urged all ministers to avail themselves of all possibilities to establish contact with the new U.S. Government. Government Spokesman Becker said at the end of today's cabinet meeting in Bonn that the chancellor is anxious to establish good relations with the Reagan administration from the outset. The chancellor welcomed Reagan's announcement that he will seek good relations with Europeans and specifically with the Federal Republic.

CSU CHAIRMAN STRAUSS VIEWS REAGAN PRESIDENCY

[Text] Munich, 21 Jan (DPA)--In the view of CSU Chairman Franz-Josef Strauss, the inauguration of new U.S. President Ronald Reagan marks the start of a new chapter in relations between the Federal Republic, Europe and the United States.

Strauss expressed his conviction that Reagan's policy will reflect a unity of thought, word and deed. "It is our wish that he puts a stop to the U.S. slide from a position of world power and makes clear again the U.S. leading role in the free world. Finally, he should replace the policy of detente, which is based on dreams and which the Federal Government also pursues, with a realistic one," says the statement published by the CSU regional executive today.

The union urged the federal chancellor not only to endorse with words the shared fate linking Germany and Europe with the United States, but also to prove it by action. It also urged him to emphasize the common political beliefs and values instead of seeking disparities with U. S. interests out of consideration for the leftwingers in the SPD. "We cannot accept a division of labor between the United States and Europe under which the United States is responsible for our security and defense while we are responsible for detente and trade with the East." Within a combined political-economic military strategy between the two pillars of the transatlantic alliance, Europe should stand by America's side out of its own convictions and take on greater responsibility on our continent if the United States is to protect the vital flanks of the free world, in the interests of peace and freedom, said Strauss.

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON REAGAN INAUGURATION, POLICY

[From the press review]

[Excerpt] SAARBRUECKER ZEITUNG comments: 'Rarely before have such manifold hopes been concentrated on a new U.S. president as they have on Ronald Reagan. People hope for a rebirth of American strength from him, just as they hope for predictability and solidarity. It was but a few months ago that we heard different words. At that time, people spoke of a has-been Hollywood actor who lacked the intellectual ability to lead a world power. How quickly times change. However, in Reagan's case, the wishful thinking of the Americans as well as that of the Western world will have to adapt to realities very quickly.

The Muenster WESTFAELISCHE NACHRICHTEN writes: In Ronald Reagan a man has moved into the White House who has placed his political program under the motto of national renewal, just as he did with his election campaign. The 40th president of the leading Western power made it absolutely clear what he means by that: the rebirth of American self-awareness, of the very pioneering spirit in which the Americans take so much pride and which suffered such serious harm in the jungles of Vietnam, in the dark shadows of Watergate and in the Iranian imprisonment of the 52 hostages. The hard and obviously more determined Reagan probably has better chances of attaining this goal than did Jimmy Carter who started out with the same claim 4 years ago.

BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG says: Is Ronald Reagan, the actor, the cowboy, now a superman all of a sudden? No, definitely not. A lot already will have been gained if U.S. policy becomes predictable again, if partnership based on identity of interests replaces the hot-cold showers to which friend and foe have become accustomed, and if the U.S. adversaries can count on straight perseverance in the fundamental issues of world politics along with a simultaneous readiness to compromise in matters of secondary importance.

In this connection, MUENCHNER MERKUR notes: The climate clearly has changed since Reagan's election victory. Haig has told the Soviets that the United States is prepared to apply its powers to protect peace. This is a motto under which the United States proposes to conduct politics in the future; hopefully better politics than the dangerous complaisance of the past several years.

The Duesseldorf RHEINISCHE POST expresses the view: Carter in his erraticism on many issues was often an unpredictable partner for America's allies. Reagan promises to embark on a course which might be straighter. It is Reagan's declared goal to put the United States back into the status of a power which will not be humilated or pushed around by anybody. This requires economic stability and military strength, not to mention diplomatic skill. Superficially, strength might be measured by the number of missiles whose MIRV's can kill millions of people. Washington's future political credibility in the troubled states of the third and fourth worlds may be derived from Reagan's future policy in Central America. Dealing with the allies will require sensitivities. Reagan more than his predecessor will demand that they abide by their alliance commitments, says RHEINISCHE POST.

The Koblenz RHEIN-ZEITUNG also discusses the U.S.-European relationship and writes: By all indications Reagan would like to lead the loose relations between the United States and Europe away from harmful misunderstandings. In the frank dialogue which he announced for this particular purpose, he probably will, however, make no bones about the fact that the United States expects even more defense efforts from its NATO partners in Europe in return for the U.S. superpower's engagement in their behalf in the whole world.

The Dortmund RUHR NACHRICHTEN stresses: No doubt Reagan is willing to use an unimpaired relationship to power. No doubt whenever the world prestige of his country is at stake he puts his reliance on material rather than moral strength; that is to say, not only on economic strength, but also on military power. This necessitates the restoration of balance wherever it has been disturbed. Reagan's goals also include the control and reduction of military potentials. Yet his security policy will rely more on the U.S. strength than on the good will of the other side. The West Europeans will come to feel this too. The clear relationship which they hope will emanate from Reagan's leadership also will demand clarity in the readiness to carry additional burdens.

REPORTAGE ON GREETINGS, WELCOME TO FREED HOSTAGES

[Excerpt] Berlin/Munich, 20 Jan (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister and FDP Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher said after the release of the hostages: "As during the months of worry and oppression, the Germans feel themselves closely united in the hour of joy with the friendly American people, the released hostages and their families."

Bavarian Minister-President Franz Josef Strauss telegraphed outgoing President Carter: "The conclusions to be drawn from the suffering of the American hostages for all civilized and constitutional states must be to stand together so that terrorism and kidnapping do not become the everyday instrument of international political disputes."

The freedom bell, which was presented to the people of Berlin in 1950 as a gift from the American people on the lifting of the Berlin blockade, was rung. Heinrich Lummer, president of the Chamber of Deputies wrote to U.S. city commandant Calvert P. Benedict: "All of us in Berlin are relieved that the right to freedom is at long last returned to the hostages."

Bonn, 20 Jan (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt sent a telegram to U.S. President Ronald Reagan after the release of the hostages: "This is a happy day for all Americans and their friends." The freed hostages will be most cordially welcomed during their stopover in the Federal Republic. Schmidt added: "We wish these brave men and women a happy return to their families."

Foreign Minister's Statement

[Excerpt] Bonn, 21 Jan (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today expressed "great joy and relief" at the release of the American hostages. Genscher, who flew to Rome on a visit this morning, stated in a congratulatory telegram to U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig: "For 14 long and anxious months, we have followed with great sympathy the fate of the hostages with the families and entire American people. On this happy day, we share the joy of the reunited families, the U.S. Foreign Service and the American people."

At the same time, Genscher expressed a cordial welcome to the released embassy personnel during their temporary stay in the Federal Republic on their way home.

In other congratulatory messages to former U.S. Secretary of State Edmund Muskie and his deputy, Warren Christopher, Genscher stressed that they had both contributed decisively to the long-awaited success of the hostages' release.

Carter Arrival in Frankfurt

[Text] Frankfurt, 21 Jan (DPA)--Jimmy Carter tonight arrived in Frankfurt as President Ronald Reagan's special representative. The former president was welcomed at the U.S. military airport, amidst the cheers of his fellow countrymen, by Chancellor Schmidt, Hesse Minister-President Holger Boerner and U.S. Ambassador to the Federal Republic Stoessel, who had arrived a few minutes earlier. Carter is accompanied by former Vice President Mondale and former Secretary of State Muskie.

After a brief private talk with Schmidt, Carter will proceed to Wiesbaden to the U.S. military hospital to meet the freed hostages who arrived this morning. He will fly back to the United States before midnight. Before his departure, Carter will give an account of his meeting with the freed hostages to several hundred of his fellow countrymen and journalists.

MINISTER OF STATE ON HOSTAGES, U.S. RELATIONS

[Excerpts from reporter-held interview with Dr Klaus von Dohnanyi, minister of state in the foreign office, date and place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] What does the release of the U.S. hostages mean to Bonn-Tehran relations?

[Answer] I think that it means first of all that a barrier has been eliminated, namely the Tehran arrest of the diplomats in violation of international law. It certainly will remain a matter to be remembered which will complicate several things. But I am certain that our side will try to make a beginning with what is available.

[Question] Regarding the German-American future, a number of statements have been made by German politicians, addressing the new American president and his government. The federal chancellor made hopeful statements on cooperation, the federal foreign minister pointed out in a telegram to his American colleague Haig that he is certain that the excellent agreement between both states will be further strengthened. Did President Reagan in his speech yesterday strengthen the Bonn confidence by saying, for example, that the historical ties with our friends will be strengthened?

[Answer] Every presidential change in the United States in past years was accompanied by speculations on European-American cooperation. It turned out in the end that continuity prevailed. I am very much under the impression that the new administration--as the previous--will try to develop and strengthen these probably most important relations between the United States and Europe in the coming year. For Europe and the United States exists, after all, just one common security and probably also just one future. I believe that this is known on both sides of the Atlantic.

[Question] But Reagan clearly indicated that these ties will cost something. We will negotiate and make sacrifices for the sake of peace, Reagan said that too. What will these sacrifices be for us?

[Answer] That will be decided on--as in the past--in the respective situations. It was interesting to hear in the talks about the nomination of Secretary of State Haig, how Mr Haig said--as well as his colleague, the current secretary of defense--how seriously one assesses the defense contributions of the Europeans. It is important for us that America will know its way and that Europe can introduce its influence with regard to decisions to be made in the United States. To do that, Europe must be first of all in agreement with itself.

[Question] Can one roughly assess the Federal Republic's preparedness to make sacrifices or do you see the danger that the limits will be quickly achieved under Washington's claim to be the leader of the free world again?

[Answer] That must be decided on in individual situations and under consideration of long-term planning. Regarding security policy, the Federal Republic of Germany makes considerable contributions not merely through the strong Bundeswehr, which was strengthened and developed last year despite world price increases. We have pursued a policy--the Federal Republic and Europe, together with our allies--namely Ostpolitik, which made considerable contributions to safeguarding Europe, just think of the additional safeguarding of Berlin, which has been facilitated that way.

Security contributions should not be mainly seen, or at least not only, in the form of money or arms? Security in this world in mainly a political matter. We produce considerable achievements in connection with development aid or financial help for NATO partners. I believe that the Federal Government and the Federal Republic of Germany have good reason to see with satisfaction how the American side appreciates our contribution and I would not fear that this could change in the future.

[Question] Do you think the Federal Republiccan depend on the rest of the EC members or is there any danger of ending up in a counterposition when it is necessary, for instance, to use some harsher tone vis-a-vis Moscow? After all, Haig used rather plain terms when he spoke of a so-called linkage policy which works after the motto: Whatever you dish out, you will be getting in returns.

[Answer] Such general theses and principles will then show their meaning and weight in each individual case. And surely differences of opinion will occur over one case or another. Only, I have learned in the past years, also during the discussions of the EC which we conducted with the United States also in the critical times after Afghanistan, that ultimately the different perspectives converge into one. It is my impression that it is necessary for Europeans to phrase their common position in awareness of the American interests, and vice versa, for the Americans to be aware of the interests and contemplations of the Europeans. This is why it is also important that the federal foreign minister will be going to Washington in the spring.

[Question] There seems already to be a dissension between the Federal Republic and the United States. I read here in an Associated Press dispatch that German aid to El Salvador has been discontinued since May last year and that this aid will not be resumed as long as the political and economic stability in El Salvador does not warrant it or as long as stability has not been restored.

[Answer] Surely, there will be discussions on this with the Americans. In Europe, too, different judgments prevail about the future development. We are interested in seeing the democratic forces in Central America strengthened. There will not be any true stability in the world without increasing democratization and without increasing economic and social justice. This is the topic in El Salvador. And if anybody can show any way to better contribute to this end, then we definitely will make that contribution. But we do not intend to support any dictatorships which oppress people and ultimately are incapable of attaining needed stability in social, political and security respects.

[Question] And this is the very point in which the Americans differ, for they are paying.

[Answer] You cannot yet say this so definitely today. After all, we have not yet discussed this issue with the new administration. But I want to underscore that from our point of view security is not, or not solely, a military question but also and always a political question and thus also an economic and social question. It is necessary to view the whole picture. It may be that there will be some shades of differences there. But that does not do any harm. Despite all differences which will crop up time and again in details, ultimately the great community of interests will be predominant.

GOVERNMENT MAY NO LONGER COORDINATE AID FOR TURKEY

[Report by Bonn correspondent Rolf-Dietrich Schwartz]

[Text] Bonn, 19 January--The Federal Government does not particularly intend to continue the role of Western coordinator of help for Turkey, a role it took over 2 years ago. It was learned on Monday from Federal Government circles that Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer (SPD) has lost interest in taking over this coordination for the Federal Government. Last year, Matthoefer organized economic and financial help for Turkey by OECD countries, consisting of Western industrial states, amounting to $1.1 billion (about DM2.2 billion), with the Federal Republic contributing a share of DM560 billion, as much as the United States. It was learned from Bonn that the main reasons for the consideration to give up the coordination role were, first of all, the financial situation. Because of the Federal Government's financial budget problems, it is hardly in a position any more to make the greatest financial contribution to Western economic help as the coordinator. In order to help the military junta ruling now in Ankara, it is desired that the OECD top echelon in Paris take over the entire coordination.

A contribution to the consideration to give up coordination was the military putsch in September in Ankara, which reportedly "hit Matthoefer in a sensitive spot." It was stressed, however, that Western economic help had "a good effect," because the international liquidity of the Turks has been reestablished, in the meantime, so that imports and exports work smoothly. People in Bonn understood the special situation of Turkey which led to the military's taking over, because democratic rules obviously did not work in the country prior to the military putsch. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt explicitly stressed on Monday in a French television interview that Turkey made considerable progress last year in fighting terrorism. He views that with particular relief, he said, "because it was a country where terrorism had reached enormous proportions." As regards turning over the coordination of Western economic help to the OECD, it is still uncertain what attitude the United States will take, because it is not known whether its new government will release the Federal Republic from its responsibility. Finance Minister Matthoefer wants to preserve the economic character of this help to benefit the people. Last year, strong forces within the Federal Government wanted to stress the military help, particularly for foreign policy considerations. If these trends are again noted in this year's preparations, circles around Matthoefer indicated he could still make up his mind to continue this coordination. It was stressed, however, that no decision has been made on the entire coordination problem or on its extent and timing. The entire aid action would make sense only if it were continued for several years.

APEL INTERVIEWED ON DEFENSE POLICY ISSUES

DW161428 Munich ARD Television Network in German 1915 GMT 15 Jan 81

[Interview with Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel by journalists Martin Schulze, ARD correspondent in Brussels; Diethelm Schroeder of DER SPIEGEL; Thilo Schneider of the Bayerischer Rundfunk Network; and program moderator is Rudolf Muehlfenzl, chief editor of the Bayerischer Rundfunk Network; date and place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Muehlfenzl] The defense expenditures of the Federal Republic are making headlines. To be more specific, an estimated deficit of DM10 billion for the next 5 years will present the defense minister with some problems. What is involved here, I think, is not only slovenliness at Hardthoehe [FRG Defense Ministry] or inept bureaucrats, as the press has written, but also the fundamental question of whether our security, our security policy, can still be financed in view of the dangerous budget situation. For the television discussion devoted to this subject, I welcome Defense Minister Hans Apel. The questions will be asked by my colleagues Martin Schulze, ARD correspondent in Brussels; Diethelm Schroeder, SPIEGEL correspondent in Bonn, and Thilo Schneider of the Bayerischer Rundfunk Network, television branch. Mr Minister, the deficit of DM10 billion recently estimated for arms expenditures alone during the next 5 years is not a simple matter for you. Considering the really tight budget situation, and in this context I not only mean the DM30 billion deficit in the overall trade balance, but also the mountain of debts and other things. How could something like this happen, anyway? Were you informed too late or did you take action too late?

[Answer] Well, Mr Muehlfenzl, first of all, we critically must ask about this DM10 billion. In early March, we will have an arms meeting here in Bonn. I also like to refer to it as a money meeting because it essentially involves the matter of finances and, naturally, we are in the state of preparatory work. But there is no such thing as a DM10 billion [deficit]. Naturally, you can write down maximum demands and create the best of all worlds and then you might arrive at the sum of DM10 billion. However, this order of magnitude is not at issue. What is at issue is: Over many years, it was possible to handle the funds paid by the taxpayer in a generous way because the money kept flowing in. This is true for the Bundeswehr and for our Republic as a whole, ranging from Bonn down to the communities. The Federal Government, the laender and the communities are facing budget consolidation, and in that respect, the defense budget cannot be an exception. We have to match up the arms ordered by my predecessor, the equivalent of between DM55 and DM66 billion, with the anticipated funds. That is to say, we must not cancel orders of arms but must set priorities, and if necessary make some postponements. What is decisive, however, is something else altogether. This meeting is also supposed to show alternatives which will then provide the federal cabinet, the Bundestag, and also the German public with the means to see what the alternatives are and what they stand for. That is, a judgement on my part following an inventory: DM10 billion is not at issue.

[Question] Mr Minister, this DM10 billion is at issue indeed. If you simply desire to pay for the programs already ordered and if you take the increase rates stipulated under medium-term finance planning, you are short this DM10 billion. In the case of the Tornado plane, we already have a large deficit of more than DM1 billion. If you take the other programs and add the increase in prices then consider what you have been allocated, we do arrive at a total of DM10 billion. It is a very simple account by your budget people.

[Answer] Well, Mr Schroeder, there is no sense in DER SPIEGEL or you telling me: Apel, you are wrong. You must acknowledge that these orders of magnitude are involved only if you use maximum yardsticks. I proceed from the assumption that the arms conference will come up with the result that this or that program cannot be implemented as desired and expected. But I do not assume that we are facing these orders of magnitude. They would not be manageable either. To be more specific, we will have to pay for the weapons systems ordered and introduce them. But these systems must not be taboo since it also must be possible to ask whether a highly modern weapons system needs the highly modern arms. So far, this has not been considered in the procurements. You can add up all sorts of things and then you can surely come up with a sum of DM10 billion.

But this is not the problem. The problem is to make it possible to pay for what has been ordered and, I admit, not to expect federal budget increases as has been done for 10 or 20 years that, should they materialize as expected, would solve the problems of the Bundeswehr and the federal defense minister.

[Question] May I be allowed to follow up on this? If you say that our procurement programs will cost between DM55 and DM66 billion, every citizen will wonder what kind of estimates there are. After all, this makes a difference of DM11 billion. How does this come about?

[Answer] Essentially, this is attributable to the fact that we definitely cannot forecast price increase rates very exactly. These weapons systems excel in having average price increase rates which range above the price increase rates of normal life, of the normal costs of living. Hence, it is impossible to tell exactly what prices will be like in the end.

Let me add just another sentence. The figure designed to throw a scare into people which I quoted here is not a scare sum which will be payable and due by 1985; a large part of it will become due later. It is not true that the Tornado program to which you referred will be concluded by 1985. The plane will be introduced up to the end of the decade and what will then be imperative about this system in the way of its further development will come later. The same is true for other arms systems. After all, we will not have wound up the general new equipment program for the Bundeswehr by 1985, so that we can indeed say that in this respect too, you can plan ahead in a half-way exact manner for only 5 years. For the time thereafter, you must set expectations about which you cannot know exactly today whether it will be possible to fulfill them. This is why I instructed the planning people to plan with a lower range rather than setting expectations too high, otherwise we would be making the job too easy for ourselves.

[Question] Mr Minister, do you expect the time to come when you no longer order what you would like to have to order? You mentioned alternatives. Are these alternatives of a budgetary nature or of a military nature? After all, these alternatives will have to include all levels, the ordering party, meaning the military side, as well as industry, which will have to produce in a different way and at lower costs. Where do you see the end of the flagpole in financial respects, seeing as the personal costs burden the budget so greatly and the available maneuvering room is constantly narrowing. Where is the point where you will have to put up with a reduction in defense quality?

[Answer] Mr Schneider, let me correct your question on one point, and then I will come back to the matter. Personnel costs certainly are a burden for us. But since we are a conscript army and because the low military pay is a burden to the young people, we always have kept the procurement [as heard] part as low as 30 percent. That is the advantage of a conscript army. There are other advantages as well. The fresh spirit of the young people is important for an army. A professional army is naturally more expensive with regard to personnel costs.

But let me return to your question. I would like to divide it into three parts. First, in the coming years there will be little room for those who want to think along new and radical lines on armament. Frigates have been ordered for the navy. New track and wheeled vehicles have been ordered for the army, particularly tanks. Planes have been ordered for the air force. This brings me to the end.

My predecessor determined these things. This is not a reproach. We must have this arms generation. We want them. They will be good and very modern arms. They must be financed. Now, there will be little leeway. Later, however, and that is very important [Apel is interrupted]

[Question] When will this later begin?

[Answer] I think it will begin in the mid-80's because we will then have passed the financing problem, not in full but still to a certain extent. We will then face the decisive question of whether we could or should [order] a tactical fighter plane for the 90's, something which would have to be designed now. Tornado production was initiated in 1967. It will be introduced in 1980 and it creates financing problems for Apel.

Decisions must be made now, and I say, therefore, that I am not at all prepared to say yes to a tactical fighter plane because first of all alternatives must be examined. Second, it must be clarified whether we can afford this kind of financing. This plane could cost a quarter of a billion.

I will give you another example where we have made considerably more headway. The next generation of armored personnel carriers will not move on tracks but wheels. That will amount to just one third of the purchase costs and just a fragment of maintenance costs because the replacement of tracks is expensive. We also must think about ships. The navy will not be too happy to hear it. But since one can work with missiles deep into the Baltic Sea and since ships are expensive, one has to bring this up for radical discussion. I say again that this is the phase to be handled after the financing of the current arms generation. But, Mr Schroeder, you are right in saying that the thinking must be done now. Preparatory decisions must be made in the next 24 months because otherwise we will lose contacts.

[Question] Mr Apel, this discussion is important. Money is involved. Money probably will be very scarce for us because the growth rate probably will be zero in Europe. But I am a bit baffled by this whole discussion so far. Why do we pay all this? Must we do so? Who forces us to do so? Our American allies want us to make greater efforts. You say you want to fulfill them. Would you make the same efforts if there was not a demand by the Americans?

[Answer] The arms being introduced in the three branches of the armed forces, the navy, air force and army, are in answer to the threat of the Warsaw Pact, particularly regarding the much-criticized Tornado plane. It is just the right answer to the threat, a conventional plane capable of carrying out missions. This has nothing at all to do with the Americans. It has something to do with the alliance and with our contribution.

Let me now discuss the Americans. I am rather happy that the new administration apparently says, this is how I understood Al Haig at his hearings: Let us stop this silly figuring in percentages, let us take a better look at what is being done with the money. In 1981, we are well off. The budget will increase by about 4 percent and defense expenditures, including personnel costs, by about 6 percent. This is quite good.

[Question] Mr Apel, the concern of the people in all of Europe is: Are we again in prewar times? We have lots of hotbeds of conflicts. You must discuss the matter of whether German tanks suddenly will be sent to Saudi Arabia. The Americans mention a scenario of threats, which certainly exists, the Russians are deployed around Poland. Do German citizens need to have more fears now than 1 year ago? That is the question behind the entire financing debate. Must we spend more money on defense? And, Mr Apel, thereby will the world become more dangerous? Wouldn't you rather say that it is better to disarm, while you publicly have to represent rearmament?

[Answer] I object to the term rearmament, most definitely so. I am convinced, and it has been proved by German history, that the military balance between East and West in Europe, which was always unstable and unequal, that this balance went up and down [as heard].

[Question] Everybody looks at that the way he wants to.

[Answer] There are certainly different ways of looking at it. But as a whole, we at this table probably agree that preservation of the military balance is one, one, prerequisite for peace in Europe on which policy, detente policy, can be based. The whole task is to maintain this precarious balance and to make the necessary means available within the framework of the possible.

But now comes the important point. He who tells people that this [balance] contains all the security does not tell them the truth. In the Third World, where I believe a decision also will be made, not military matters but development assistance will play a great role. It is part of the security policy. I am happy that development policy expenditures have grown much more than other expenditures.

I would like to discuss something else which curtails my demands. If this country does not remain satisfied in social terms, which includes the creation of jobs, training of young people and all the things we call the social and economic network, the best army in the world will not help us much. This creates the need to tell the soldiers that we must achieve the optimum with the means at our disposal. You cannot demand everything. You must understand that we cannot (?make as many debts) as we want to from [words indistinct].

[Question] Would you admit, Mr Apel, that in the years to come more and more of the responsibility for security and by far the greatest part of costs will have to be handled by the Federal Republic alone, almost alone, and that thus the threat emanating from the Soviet Union will increase in a concentrated way vis-a-vis the Federal Republic? I just want to make the following clear: The Dutch do not want to station these missiles, nor do the Danes or the Belgians. We will have to bear all of this.

I would like to take up the term pacifism. When it becomes known in 2 or 3 years where these missiles will be deployed, some of that already is known, don't you fear that this could create many small Gorleben incidents [public protests against nuclear powerplants]? Don't you have the impression that a mood is growing in the Federal Republic that could destroy all your plans so that one could not even adhere to the commitments to the Americans?

[Answer] When you say we alone, I consider that slightly exaggerated. When I look at the bigger medium-size European powers here in central Europe, let us take particularly our French neighbors, one really cannot say that they are unwilling to spend money on defense. I have the feeling that in reality they will be spending more in 1981 than we will. But I agree with you very much on one point. There will be no development that will make NATO into an alliance with two or three countries bearing the burdens, while the others are passive NATO members.

[Question] Will there be a NATO of that type?

[Answer] There will be no NATO of that type. One must point out over and over again to our friends and neighbors in Europe that they must bear some of the burden.
Mr Schulze, I object to the sharpness of your remark. Our neighbors in The Netherlands are making quite remarkable achievements in the field of conventional defense. The question which ultimately comes up, namely, where do medium-range weapons go, has by no means been thoroughly discussed. I do not, by answering such questions, give any pretexts which might encourage those who say that we should move away from our share in the responsibility. It must be our German position that there be no such thing as an alliance divided into three parts: the United States, then a couple of medium powers including the Federal Republic and then many others which are affiliated and participate symbolically. This would spell doom and it also would spell the doom of West Europe.

[Question] [Words indistinct] but that can also be wishful thinking. Because of the exaggerated way the question is posed, I would like to make a minor addition: The Catholic Church in The Netherlands urges the governing CDE [Christian Democratic Appeal] to adopt a resolution against stationing. Elections are upcoming in The Netherlands in the spring and in the Labor Party, your sister party as it were, decisions are under discussion concerning resignation from the NATO alliance. I believe that this development is downright dangerous and I am inclined to accuse you of underrating this.

[Answer] Whether you accuse me of it or not, what matters is for me as a politician, and I do bear responsibility for the Federal Republic of Germany, to seek to wage the debate with those having this attitude, which is quite honorable, in such a way that he will be talking with them on conditions of peace and security in Europe in such a way that they will understand us and that we will make it hard for them to dodge reality, without attacking their position. This is what irked me about the abbreviated reports from the cabinet giving the impression that I wanted to call some people onto the carpet. This is not the point at all. I am expressly offering to conduct a controversial debate on conditions of safeguarding peace in Europe today.

[Question] Mr Minister, I might pick up the word of pacifism again which you used in cabinet. After all, pacifism is not a (?fashion) which emerges by coincidence. It is the consequences, perhaps, of upbringing and habit, and possibly of the general political climate. Could it be that we have to make up for a considerable loss of ground in that respect, that we have neglected matters a little or a lot with respect to the realization that it is necessary to propagandize defense readiness and that this defense readiness is necessary? Did we not commit mistakes in this respect?

[Answer] I believe, Mr Muehlfenzl, that this is a general problem which confronts us. The problem is that it is very difficult to make the highly complicated interconnections, be it nuclear energy or security policy, even pension questions, so clear that a debate will ensue which will be a debate of equals, between the expert Hans Apel, who considers himself one, something that some people might contest, and the citizen across the table from me. This makes things very difficult and naturally leads to a point where the temptation to escape into emotion is quite great.

This is why we, the defense politicians, must now wage the debate in a different way, namely, saying that article one of the basic law provides that man's dignity is unimpeachable. It is our task to ensure this and to ensure the whole series of rights and liberties of the people. How do we do this anyway? How do we propose to ensure the German people's self-determination? This requires an armed force, an army, a NATO which will ensure the German people's right to self-determination without threatening anyone, without being aggressive.

[Question] That need not necessarily be so.

[Answer] This has to be that way, begging your pardon. You know, looking at it on a long-term basis all of us will be dead, said one of my economics teachers once, and unfortunately he is right. But in the present situation, Mr Schroeder, I am convinced that it is a good thing to be in an alliance, not to threaten anyone, offering arms control and saying: All we want is to implement our right to self-determination, keep our dignity unimpeachable, and, therefore, service in the Bundeswehr is service to peace. Yet I am prepared, Mr Schroeder, to take seriously and also to debate with anybody who says: I arrive at a different result out of Christian conviction and on the basis of the sermon on the mount.

In the near future, I will have again what I often have, namely, a meeting dealing with the question can a Christian, which I consider myself to be, fill the post of defense minister? The sermon on the mount: I also am prepared seriously to wage that debate.

[Question] In your party, too, pacifism has a tradition, a good tradition.

[Answer] This is perfectly alright, is it not?

[Question] And this does not cause you any problems?

[Answer] You know, the Social Democrat is a difficult party. I have been affiliated with this party for 25 years now and I am proud of it, really. The highly controversial debates that need to be waged, be on nuclear energy or on humanizing jobs, or even on questions concerning security policy, must be controversially waged, because the simple answers are really too simple. What is decisive to me ultimately is that my party backs me and the policy I pursue. I am too old to adapt opportunistic ways. Surely, a time will then come when the party will say: This is not the way it should be handled.

[Question] What you have said so far is a bit simple. I am not affiliated with your party, yet I cannot but take up the catchword of nuclear energy. Looking across the Rhine, I find that the French without any great excitement or great debate have been covering a considerable percentage of their energy requirements from nuclear energy. We quarrel for years, and will for years to come, over nuclear energy installations to be set up which run up against reservations in your party. And you go and say you consider nuclear energy necessary, and so do I. But tell me, please, where is the end of it, where will we go from here with the realities and [words indistinct]?

[Answer] As far as I am concerned, Mr Muehlfenzl, we might well debate nuclear energy. I am well prepared for such a debate as I have just come from Hamburg where we talked about Brokdorf for quite some time. Let me say just one sentence on this. The political will-forming processes, be they in the CSU in Bavaria along the lines of do we want to have an interim storage here, or be they among the Social Democrats in northern Germany, they constitute important elements, to be sure. But the progress in this field which I desire, as you do, is currently essentially being halted by German courts and by nobody else.

[Question] I would like to return to counterarming and the debate on counterarming, the catchword being the SPD, your party. There is a qualified opposition, a minority, against this counterarming decision. They call into question the decision of the SPD party congress of December 1979 with the argument that the decisions are no longer valid because the United States has not ratified the SALT II treaty. This is one of the justifications used by the opposition. My question is this: Will the opinion of this minority affect the official government policy and the decisions made by this government?

[Answer] We will have to debate this with our fellow party members. Our party's next congress will be held in the spring of 1982. This will be a central topic of the party congress. Anybody who, like the chancellor, myself, and I think the entire government, seriously wants arms control must also want the counterarming decision in both its parts. In other words, it is my conviction that we will attain arms control and arms limitation on the basis of equality of forces on both sides only if we also have the firm will to implement the counterarming decision for as long as no results of arms control are available.

[Question] A supplementary question on this point: Retired General Bastian currently claims in public that the Soviet's SS-20 medium-range missile carries only one warhead, that this reduces the dimension of the threat by one third at least, meaning simultaneously that the counterarming decision actually will not be necessary because the Western, the NATO, potential is actually still sufficient. Is this objectively correct?

[Answer] I think it is objectively wrong and this is not the problem either. The problem is that the Soviet's statement is correct that they have not increased the number of rocket launchers. But they have basically enhanced the quality and they have increased the number of warheads on each missile. If at the same time, our potential quickly grows obsolete, essentially this involves airplanes which are constantly less capable of making deterrence credible, then there are indeed considerable leads in quality here which, by the way, continue to develop further because the Soviet Union unerringly continues its program of building up its potential.

[Question] You always have said that the counterarming decision was an offer of simultaneous negotiations with no wrapping paper, no Christmas paper. Now, following the initial hearings of the new secretaries of the Reagan administration, we find that it was meant to be wrapping paper after all. SALT will not be discussed for at least 6 months. Clearly, priority is being given to military strength. The coming pressure will force you to add more. How do you plan to handle that when you have hardly managed to handle the current situation? How do you plan to handle the difficulties in your party, which I understand to a certain extent?

[Answer] First, I would like to comment on the decision to close the arms gap. This is not a monetary problem because these are not European but American arms. I must state here that I understand some of the remarks of my fellow party members very well. But they ought to understand the situation the United States is in. First, immediately after the Brussels decision, a serious and credible attempt was made by the Americans to enter arms control negotiations. The Soviets let many, many months pass. The federal chancellor had to visit in May or June last year, I think it was June, to make a begin ing. Then it was October of last year before preparatory talks began.

[Question] And now they have almost failed again.

[Answer] One must keep in mind who let almost 1 year pass.

[Question] Namely, the Soviet Union.

[Answer] I will be finished in just a minute. And now there has been a second event in the meantime, namely, Afghanistan. It has nothing immediate to do with SALT II, but it certainly has changed our perception, our awareness. There is a new administration now. This administration presently is formulating its own idea. I would consider it most unwise to speak loudly in such a situation, as if we wanted to dissociate ourselves from NATO decisions. No, we do not want to do that. We say that there are two sides to each coin. An old NATO principle says: Balance of military strength to be achieved if possible through arms control. This must remain as it is.

[Question] The new administration demands more from us than was done before, more not less.

[Answer] Not in the field of medium-range missiles. Mr Schroeder, it may be that they demand more in other fields, but so far there has been no quantification permitting us to say: You, the German taxpayer, will have to face new demands running into billions.

[Question] Mr Minister, may I introduce another question which may not be so decisive for our discussion, but which is of public interest. How about the possibility that the financial bind could be reduced somewhat by Saudi Arabia's buying German tanks? What do you say to that?

[Answer] Mr Muehlfenzl, I am not prepared to comment on that. The Federal Cabinet and the Federal Security Council have not decided on that in any way which would give reason to comment on such a question. I think that such highly political questions ought to be reserved for the federal chancellor. This will have to be discussed most thoroughly. We know that German arms production in this field is first rate. This does not give us the right or even the duty to become the world's No 1 arms exporter. So far we found enough for our skilled workers to do in other areas of production. Skilled workers will be scarce even in the current recession. That is one of the great problems.

[Question] Mr Apel, as of 20 January, such people as Reagan and Al Haig will not be there purely as individuals, they will be supported by a broad trend of American public opinion. The Americans have become more aggressive. Could you imagine an independent German defense policy coming about? Could you imagine in case of greater difficulties with the Americans, that we might have an independent European defense community? It seems to be rather clear that the Americans have other interests in significant fields than the Europeans who depend considerably more on their relations with the Eastern bloc?

[Answer] An independent German or even European defense policy never existed. Even detente policy was only acceptable in consensus with our neighbors. One of the reasons for the failure of the CDU-FDP coalition was the fact that others had thought further in these fields and had made more progress so that we were holding things back. So no such autonomous policy existed. It will not exist in the future either.

But now comes the important point: If we want to introduce European interests into the policy of the American superpower, we need first of all solidarity and friendship with it. One does not listen to somebody who is not one's friend. This will be an art, if I may say so, to achieve again what was achieved in past years--linking European matters, beginnings and necessities in such a way that solidarity is preserved. We have made a number of contributions to this in the past year. In the end we were one of the few who did not appear at the Moscow Olympics. I see no extreme problems here.

I am very reassured by the fact that a number of politicians will enter this administration who know Europe very well and who have very good relations with it. Be it Walter Stoessel, the present ambassador in our country, or Al Haig, these are people who know what Europe thinks and what it needs.

[Question] And what it can achieve. This is what they will demand.

[Answer] That is quite clear, Mr Schroeder. But may I add that if security policy is to be defined the way I define it--defense, detente, development aid, social security--help in the European Community is very important. One can make fun of the agricultural policy, I like to do it, but it is part of preserving the social structures in Italy, Ireland and elsewhere. If one puts all this on the scales, one will see that we Federal Germans do not need to be ashamed.

[Question] The new Pentagon chief, your future colleague Caspar Weinberger, has already signalled something that was assumed here, namely, that the Americans will not reintroduce conscription. This means for us that we cannot expect assistance from this area with regard to the possibly intensified tasks mentioned by Martin Schulze. Everybody in this country knows that as of 1985 the number of possible conscripts will decrease radically. There may be some things that can be done about it, such as extending basic military service or drafting women. This would call for a change in the basic law, in article 12 A. What considerations exist in this respect? Considerations must be made now.

[Answer] You do not expect me to comment on compulsory military service in the United States, I gathered that much from your question. This is not called for, it ought to be thoroughly discussed with our American colleagues. Our difficulties will come up not in 1985, but probably in 1987. I admit that one cannot postpone the issue indefinitely. What can really be done? First, and this belongs to the debate on the medium-term structure of the Bundeswehr, we must think about whether we have to cope with all the current tasks we now have in the interest of fully preserving the defense ability of the West. One must be able to think along radical lines, not leftist or rightist, but radical with regard to the root. A mixture of possibilities still remain.

I would like to mention just a few: Some of the tasks can be handled by civilians. We will have to discuss a possible prolongation of military service. We will have to discuss whether women can be used voluntarily in noncombat units such as transport fliers or in telecommunications. The basic law need not be changed in this respect, not in this respect.

[Question] Armed service alone is banned.

[Answer] Correct. And since none of us has in mind compulsory military service for women or their action in combat units, this would be a possibility. I admit, however, that this would create great problems for me as an individual as well as an official. I would get very hard words from the conservatives as well as from the leftists.

[Question] The question is whether you will survive these months. [laughter]

[Answer] A (?justified) question, Mr Schroeder, but in contrast to you I can be terminated any day. [laughter]

[Question] Mr Minister, the federal chancellor announced several times in past years that we must strive for political solutions beyond the continual counting of tanks, as he put it. This means achieving such solutions as arms limitation and [word indistinct] negotiations in the Vienna MBFR talks. How will these things proceed?

[Answer] Very hesitantly, very difficult, and regrettably there is not much impetus at present.

[Question] Why is that so?

[Answer] There are a number of political-psychological framework conditions which do not simplify matters. The conflicts outside Europe bring influence to bear on it, too. Afghanistan certainly also has an effect. There is the question of how matters will develop in Moscow, how matters will develop in Eastern Europe. There will be a change in the American administration. But if I may return to what we can introduce into the alliance--Martin Schulze has asked about it--I would say that our great interest in the continuation of all these negotiating rounds must be obvious, not for emphasis, but as an element of West German policy within the framework of the alliance.

[Question] Mr Apel, you pointed out twice--once by hinting at it and once by saying it clearly--that it is the fault of the Soviet Union that some things did not take place with regard to disarmament talks. You must have a thesis or theory about why that is the case. Why was it so?

[Answer] Mr Schulze, this is something I do not like. That is, for a responsible minister to join the Kremlin astrologers. I am in favor of acknowledging facts. I described a fact, namely NATO's dual decision of December 1979, an immediate offer to negotiate on these arms through the Americans. Then there was long hesitancy, well into October 1980 before matters got going. This date has a significance. If I am supposed to begin to speculate why this is so, I would get carried away. It is my task to find an answer to such developments. The answer is: Since the balance of military forces is the prerequisite of our policy, the balance must be safeguarded. I am convinced that if we can explain this in a credible way to the Soviet Union, it will be interested, together with us, in arms limitation.

[Question] Could it possibly be correct that both superpowers, the Soviet Union and the United States, are not so unhappy about each other because they are two conservative powers, because they want to get their respective alliance partners somewhat better under control?

[Answer] I cannot speak on behalf of the Soviet Union, but I can speak on behalf of the West inasmuch as there is a fundamental difference between the alliance systems. One of them is an alliance of sovereign states, while the other is an alliance of another quality. The American policy, therefore, is certainly not aimed at getting us under control or calling us to order. Quite the contrary, what Al Haig said was most impressive. He said: I will pretend that Helmut Schmidt is sitting here, and then he argued very impressively.

[Question] Yes, yes, but then came the demand.

[Moderator] I would like to say that we have just 4 minutes more to go. Maybe some short questions and some short answers.

[Question] Two quick questions: Will the neutron weapon issue reappear once the former NATO commander in chief becomes U.S. secretary of state? Second, do you think that within the foreseeable future, maybe within 1 year, SALT II will be ratified after all by the U.S. Congress?

[Answer] I see no reason to assume at present that the debate on the neutron weapon will be revived in the foreseeable future, but I am not a prophet. I must fear that SALT II will not be ratified so quickly, although many American military men, as well as my friend, the U.S. secretary of state-designate, are convinced that ratification would service American interests. I cannot bring political influence to bear here.

[Question] No, I just laughed a bit when you said, my friend. You had quite some clashes with him when he was NATO commander in chief. [laughter]

[Answer] All my friends have occasional problems with me.

[Question] That was at your first appearance. Mr Apel, can you tell our audience roughly what we will face in 1981, this year? What conflicts and burdens do you expect?

[Answer] Well, I am under the impression that we stand on the threshold of one of the most difficult years of all. I have had several posts in the Federal Government since 1972, and I believe that this will be the most difficult year.

[Question] What might happen?

[Answer] The economic problems are immense. The energy problems are open and must be debated. In my own sphere there are enough possibilities for conflict outside Europe which could bring influence to bear on Europe. My answer is: Frank debates with the people on the problems, covering up nothing--it does not make sense to do so. But one must not say that one has a solution for everything. Frank talks must also be held with those who say they do not want our defense policy. But one must particularly talk with everyone, in the East and in the West, in such a way that we will realize that we can safeguard peace only together--with our membership in the alliance being clear.

[Question] So is that a confirmation of the alliance and its mission?

[Answer] Confirmation of the alliance and its mission--on the contrary--the alliance as the basis of German policy. But that must not be understood as if there were no neighbors in Eastern Europe who are significant for our peace and our future. Please take notice of the fact that we are a divided nation with all the problems that brings. This must be introduced into Western policy.

[Question] So it does not mean: Take the hat off and put the helmet on?

[Answer] I have neither a hat, nor will I ever put a helmet on.

[Moderator] That's a final word to ponder on, Mr Minister. I thank you for your willingness to answer our questions, I thank my colleagues for the questions and time, and you, ladies and gentlemen, for your interest. Good evening.

GOVERNMENT ENDS ECONOMIC SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN

[Text] Paris, 21 Jan (AFP)--The French Government today began dismantling its economic sanctions against Iran, it was learned here today.

An Economy Ministry source said regulations are being devised for the abolition of a decree last May prohibiting export of goods, except food, medical equipment and medicines, to Iran. Contracts concluded before the U.S. Embassy take-over in Tehran were not affected.

Meanwhile, the Norwegian and Dutch Governments also announced the end to their economic sanctions in response to the taking of the American hostages last year. Britain earlier announced that its sanctions would end at midnight.

MARCHAIS 12 JAN REPORT TO PCF CENTRAL COMMITTEE

LD200801 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 14 Jan 81 pp 4-6

[PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais' report to the PCF Central Committee on 12 January.]

[Excerpts] The following is the text of the report submitted by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais to the Central Committee:

There are now just over 3 months to go before the presidential election. The object of our meeting and of this report is naturally to review our campaign and take all the necessary decisions for extending it in the coming weeks and making the whole party's work as efficient as possible.

The Conditions for the Presidential Election Campaign

To do that we must first never lose sight of the current political situation, the significance of the current intensification of the class struggle and the place which the various political forces have in it. I would like to review these questions in the first part of this report.

To take up an expression which we have already used, I would say that the situation in which we are fighting the Presidential election battle is not the same as the situation in 1974 or 1969, not to mention earlier dates. This is 1981.

The most recent events confirm the detailed analysis which we made at our 23d Congress. I would like to mention the three most significant elements in that analysis.

First element: The seventies, through which we have just lived, were undoubtedly characterized by new and at times spectacular progress by the workers, democratic and national forces in the world. That progress was made in close liaison with the extension of the crisis in capital's system of domination and exploitation. Suffice it to mention in this connection the Vietnamese people's victory, the peoples' assertion of their will to have control over their own resources, the disappearance of the last fascist dictatorships in Europe and the rise of the struggle for sweeping democratic changes, notably in countries like Italy and France.

Second element: In this period capital's forces obviously did not sit back and watch that development.

To put it more precisely, they made new and large-scale efforts, especially from 1974-1975, to turn the tide, launching what we rightly called a veritable counteroffensive.

The means used were diverse: widespread use of austerity and unemployment; redeployment of multinational trusts to sources of higher profits; massive use of public finance, and currency instability, speculation, inflation and trade inequality; attempts to speed up the process of integrating national economies into units dominated by multinational firms and of strengthening Atlantic solidarity, under U.S. leadership; revival of the arms race and impeding the detente process and the ideological war against progressive forces and values.

Forced to carry out that enterprise in the framework of a world balance of forces modified against them, and being unable, in those circumstances, to resort at will to the crudest methods of domination, capital's forces stepped up their pressures to secure political powers in the various countries which are in a position to implement the desired policy. The Socialist International, dominated by the SPD, has played and is playing an essential role in this context.

Third element: We are now observing the extent of those efforts made by imperialism with some degree of hindsight.

It should, however, be noted--and this is very important--that those efforts are also limited. The balance of forces has not been modified in the ruling bourgeoisies' favor. Many recent events demonstrate this, notably the victories won by the peoples of Iran, Nicaragua and Afghanistan, Kampuchea's rebirth, the evolution of the situation in Chad or the national forces' offensive in El Salvador. We will not return to the thirties or even the fifties. No amount of noise and fuss should make us lose sight of that fundamental fact.

Naturally there must be a struggle, and initiatives to unite the peaceful, progressive, revolutionary forces in action and on the basis of objectives corresponding to the workers' and peoples' interests and to the possibilities of our time.

For there are dangers.

For instance, the arms race is fraught with dangers and is considerably curbing the peoples' progress toward a better standard of living and toward the solution of the problems which mankind is facing. Every effort should be made to defeat imperialism's aggressive machinations, to boost international detente and peaceful coexistence and to move toward effective disarmament measures. The battle has grown more difficult in the present period but the means of making progress do exist, provided we raise our effort to the level required by the circumstances.

It is essentially in this way and in this overall context that the situation in our country should be assessed.

Faced with the rise of the people's movement, the French bourgeoisie--backed by capital's international forces, essentially American and West German--has done all it can to safeguard its power and its exploitation system. Thanks to the PS' abandonment of its joint program pledges and the leftwing union, it has succeeded in doing so. In these conditions it has been able to pursue, and even step up in the most recent period, its policy of austerity, redeployment and national abandonment.

However, that policy is encountering bitter resistance from a major section of the workers in cities and rural districts. The struggles are numerous, diversified and combative.

Over the months and throughout the various events the PS leaders have adopted stances whose convergence with the government and rightwing forces stances is striking.

The PS' Real Positions

In their economic proposals they have abandoned the idea of reviving the people's consumption as the priority in a new policy, replacing it with the revival of investments. This means abandoning some wage demands and giving increased aid to the employers. That is exactly what Barre advocates. The PS leaders are also advocating acceptance of job mobility and capitalist redeployment provided it is done "gently." In the European bodies they are taking part in drawing up plans to dismantle whole sectors of our industry and are supporting common market expansion, which would have disastrous effects on our economy. In these conditions it is not surprising that they oppose social struggles, as Francois Mitterrand did, calling for calm and a wait-and-see attitude and attacking the CGT's activity. That attitude is also being taken by the socialists who lead some trade union federations such as the Workers' Force, the CFDT or the National Education Federation. We are now even seeing socialist representatives using repression against struggling workers and communist militants. That brings back bad memories.

In the international policy sphere the socialist leaders are calling for European integration and the abandonment of national sovereignty to be speeded up, for the Atlantic alliance to be strengthened and for fiercer confrontation with the Soviet Union. They approve of the manufacture of the neutron bomb and support the deployment of U.S. nuclear missiles in Europe. They support the annexation of the West Bank and Jerusalem by the Israeli Government. They have just expressed their concern over events in Chad in virtually the same terms as Giscard's foreign minister. The destinations chosen by Francois Mitterrand for his pre-election travels are highly significant in confirming all that: Washington, Jerusalem, and Beijing. Probably the first result of the pilgrimage to the other side of the Atlantic is an article in this week's edition of L'UNITE which dares to write, and I quote, "The record of Carter's mandate for democracy in Latin America is relatively positive."

The similarity in the policy lines followed by the right and the PS--as I have already noted--has been complemented by the establishment of direct contacts between the RPR and the PS--contacts which, as the recent by-elections demonstrated, are not purely a matter of forms. Furthermore, the PS leaders are already indicating that the RPR could join a possible PS government after the presidential election.

Meanwhile Pierre Mauroy has been establishing a "republican dialogue" with Giscard d'Estaing and strange arrangements between the UDF and socialists have arisen in some by-elections.

Faced with all these facts, because they are strictly facts, leftists who had sincerely believed in PS renewal after Epinay are shocked and surprised at the rapidity and serious nature of this swing to the right. They are wondering whether the policy which Francois Mitterrand might implement on that basis would bring any change even if it did not make things worse. This is an important question which deserves further consideration.

The Lessons To Be Learned From Experience

It so happens that 25 years ago, almost to the day, an election was held which returned a leftwing majority to the National Assembly. Although it is true that the situation at that time was considerably different from the present situation, a review of the facts is important for our consideration.

While the war in Algeria was continuing, the PS leaders, allied to the radicals and a Gaullist party to form a "republican front," had promised to make peace and adopt a different policy. The communists were, of course, campaigning for that. Then came the 2 January 1956 election victory. A great wave of hope swept the country and enabled the left to win.

Immediately the PS leaders ruled out the possibility of including communists in the government. However the communists had enough good will to support the republican front leaders in their efforts to form a government alone and they even went so far as to vote for it to be given full powers.

Everybody knows what the result was: the implementation of a policy which the right alone was no longer able to implement--all-out war and the repression of the struggles launched by the workers and young people in France. At the end of all that, after 2 years, democratic change was set aside for a long time owing to the nation's great disappointment and demoralization, the development of a strong antiparliamentarian and antidemocratic trend and the abrupt swing to the right following the putsch of 13 May 1958.

Of course, that was 25 years ago and the workers' and democratic struggles have led to concrete achievements and achievements regarding people's awareness.

"Tripartite Consensus" for Clampdown

However, the men who bore most responsibility at that time are still here: Francois Mitterrand, Chaban-Delmas and Gaston Defferre. Above all, there is a lesson to be learned from that experience and PS behavior since 1977 shows that it still essentially valid. In times when the class struggle grows fiercer, owing to its nature and under pressure from the bourgeoisie and also when the people's movement does not have the strength and influence required, the PS agrees to act as a backup or replacement for the right in safeguarding capital's domination and ensuring the continuation or even the aggravation of its policy.

Who can honestly claim that Francois Mitterrand has not now placed himself in a position to play that role?

It must be remembered that virtually since 1968 the bourgeoisie has been forced to implement its policy with a government resting on a narrow foundation and whose existence is fought at each election. It must be remembered that, because of this situation, the bourgeoisie was forced to include all rightwing forces in the majority coalition as from 1974. It no longer has any reserves on that side and its problem has, moreover, not really been solved. It therefore wishes to expand the basis of support for its policy and all the rightwing forces are not adequate to do that; it needs PS help. There is no inconsistency in the fact that the bourgeoisie is behind Giscard d'Estaing and at the same time--as the attitude taken by the main sections of the media shows--is exploiting the petty political maneuvers by the PS and RPR leaders.

The aim of this vast political operation is clear: "to channel discontent into a blind alley, to avoid change and to establish, in one form or another, lasting cooperation between the entire right and the PS with a view to ensuring the continuation and aggravation of capital's policy.

Together For Muzzled Campaign

It should be noted that this "tripartite consensus" has already begun to operate, even though it is still doing so within certain limits.

Aside from the fact, which already has been noted, that the PS is encouraging the implementation of the austerity policy by curbing struggles, I will give two examples. First example: There is a tripartite consensus to try and make the presidential election campaign a muzzled campaign, a rump campaign, by dodging the fundamental political debate on the major issues of concern to the country.

Giscard d'Estaing is pretending to ignore the presidential election but at the same time he is campaigning by creeping around handing out candies. According to the latest reports, he will wait until March before officially declaring his candidacy.

Jacques Chirac is registered but absent. It seems that he is waiting until February while taking care to have his political friends compose hymns of praise to him.

Francois Mitterrand, moreover, is using such a crafty procedure that he is a candidate and not a candidate at the same time. Meanwhile, he is traveling.

In keeping with this petty political operation, the main sections of the media are using opinion polls to lend weight to the idea that there are in fact only two serious candidates who will definitely still be in the running in the second round, although neither has yet clearly announced his candidacy.

What a caricature of democracy. What disdain for the French people, to whom an attempt is being made to deny the right to reliable information about the record and stances of the various candidates and the right to freely choose their candidate!

It is clear that this procedure is also aimed at preventing change.

Together in Anticommunism

Second example: There is a tripartite consensus in anticommunism. Our party, together with the CGT in the trade union sphere, is the target of violent attacks from both the right and the PS. The main channels of the media readily act as vehicles for this with complete accord.

Full-scale operations are being mounted and carried out, operations in the military sense of the word with all the organization, coordination and intensity which that implies. The most varied events in national and international life are being used to this effect, being treated in such a way as to distort them, present them in the desired light and disguise the reality of the problems when lies and falsification are not being directly used.

We have just seen an example of this with the Saint-Muir affair [reference to PCF mayor's opposition to transfer of immigrants to his district] to which I will return.

However, we can mention the constant harping on the events in Poland, and that has been going on for 6 months now. The French receive full information on the slightest demonstration of anger by a few dozen workers in the depths of Poland but they hear nothing about the suffering and struggles of hundreds of thousands of French workers who have been occupying their factories, defending their rights, sometimes forced to resort to a hunger strike as in the Paris Transport Authority workshops in Championnet, Paris.

I would like to add an example which illustrates the systematic and deliberate nature of those attacks.

For months, CFDT leaders in the Loire district have urged the idea of forming a workers' cooperative at Manfrance [French company due for closure]. There was reason to think that CGT cadres' initiative to form that cooperative would meet with a warm welcome from the CFDT leaders. Well, exactly the opposite happened, the CGT just had to decide to suggest and support the creation of cooperative--with the communists' support--for the CFDT to immediately find as many ludicrous faults as possible.

There are other examples which show that the CFDT leaders seize any pretext and will even contradict their previous statements to try and undermine us, in keeping with their move to a central position.

This fact alone shows that the extent and current bitterness of the anticommunist attacks cannot be explained by some alteration in our strategy, an alteration which only exists in the imagination of our critics. Nor can the cause be found in the fact that the bourgeoisie is now in a position to do what it likes.

In fact, because it makes a crucial contribution to defending the workers' interests and to the struggle for change, our party constitutes the main and decisive obstacle to the realization of capital's plans and more especially to the political operation which I mentioned. This obstacle is all the more annoying because of the crisis and the problems which it poses for the bourgeoisie.

The Main Stake in the 26 April Poll

Moreover, this is why it has become a fundamental objective for the bourgeoisie to weaken our party and relegate it to the side-lines. It was no accident that Francois Mitterrand said, the day after the joint program was signed, that the only reason he had made this move was to "obtain 3 million Communist Party votes." It was no accident that Giscard d'Estaing declared on 16 May 1974, and I quote: "One of the objectives I would pursue if elected would be to ensure that the Communist Party's electoral support declined appreciably in France.... If the Communist Party ever represented say 15 percent of voters, the French political situation would be altogether changed.... The problem of Socialist participation in a majority would arise then... A president of the Republic can perfectly well envisage and pave the way for Socialist participation in a majority."

That was 7 years ago, and Giscard has not been able to reduce the Communist Party to an insignificant role any more than Francois Mitterrand has. They have failed.

Small wonder that, given the country's situation and the approach of the presidential election, in which their objective is that which I have recalled, they are trying to achieve what they have been unable so far as to achieve by intensifying still further their attacks on us. And anticommunism, it must be remembered, is the vanguard of the attack on the working people and the nation.

Yes, their desperation, the current sharpening of the class struggle is a measure of the bourgeoisie's difficulties and failures. It reflects the importance of what is at stake. In a way it confirms our party's original and crucial role in the struggle for change.

That is why it is right to say that in point of fact the thing that will, above all, attract attention in the 26 April poll, the thing that will constitute the main stake in that poll will be the size of the support rallying around the communist candidate.

It is the bourgeoisie's prime objective to weaken our party, because that is the way to eliminate the principal obstacle to establishing a political arrangement--whose terms and conditions perhaps remain to be defined--for which the bourgeoisie could count on all other political forces, insofar as the Communist Party would carry insufficient weight.

Conversely, achieving the broadest possible grouping around the communist candidate will give the working people--whatever the circumstances and the men--a solid prop, a major trump in order to defend their interests, bar the way to capital's underhanded attack and pave the way for real change.

Our whole campaign is aimed and must be aimed at facilitating this rallying of support on 26 April.

Our Orientation

It is 3 months now since we launched this campaign. It may be said to have made a good start and is meeting with a profound response. Indeed, since the national conference we have adopted various initiatives--first and foremost the publication of the struggle plan--which have all been crowned with success. There have been 24 people's meetings, involving 220,000 people. The latest, in Paris on 19 December, indicates a power and militancy which, I believe, may be said to be growing.

Over these 3 months the entire party has launched great activity--Gaston Plissonnier will come back to this. I will only mention: 300,000 copies of L'ESPOIR AU PRESENT have been published and paid for, 21,000 people have joined the party (as against 15,000 in the same period last year), 10,000 new readers for L'HUMANITE DIMANCHE, and 1,328 million old francs collected in subscriptions. Not to mention all the other diverse activities.

This attests to the good health, dynamism and confidence of our party and its capacity for initiative and action.

We Are Heard Because We Speak the Truth

These good results--only the first results, because we are to go further and higher--obviously we owe these results to what makes our party unique in French political life, to its capacity to go beyond the workers' concerns and demands by bringing them, in words and deeds, answers which no other political force proposes. We have chosen clarity, frankness, courage, struggle and confidence in the future.

We are heard, and we can and will be heard still more widely, because we speak the truth, because working men and women need what we offer them, what we alone bring them.

We reject the idea of a world subject to misfortune and moving toward the abyss.

We reject the idea of a predetermined crisis allegedly coming from elsewhere, against which nothing can be done.

We say no, categorically no, to unemployment, to a high cost of living, to injustice, to a decline in freedoms, to national decline.

We say no, categorically no, to the game of those politicians who want a muzzled campaign, an illusory election and a bitter outcome for the workers.

We say yes to the struggle to defend the rights, the life of working people and their families.

We say yes to change. Yes to a job for everyone, to more humane labor, to justice, liberty for all, security, fraternity. Yes to a new growth for France, its economy, its culture and its people. Yes to an independent, strong France, speaking in its own voice, not aligned with any bloc, having the ability to play a more active part, in this moving, changing world, in the service of peace, disarmament, justice and friendship in relations between nations.

And we assert, we demonstrate, that all this is possible, on condition that the evil is attacked at the roots.

To this end, we rely on the initiative and responsibility of working people, of the citizens themselves.

That, in essence, is the entire meaning of the struggle plan and of our 131 proposals.

The Only Way Toward Change

What we are proposing is certainly not easy. But taking the easy way out means giving up. Whether we like it or not, whatever tempting disguises may be adopted, taking the easy way out means submitting to the demands of capital.

Either we must submit and agree to plunge ourselves into difficulties, crisis and adventure or we must fight to defend every inch of the way the interests, rights and positions of the working people, all the people's masses, and to find a positive way out of the crisis.

Those are the alternatives. We propose struggle. Today, it is, indeed, the only way, the only prospect which offers the working people progress, hope and change.

Our course, as we have said, is in no way a last resort, a palliative or a withdrawal. We have considered the experience of the past. We observe economic, social and political reality and we bring to the problems raised substantiated, clear, attacking answers, together with the will go to forward. And the conviction that speaking and acting as we do, while standing firmly on class grounds, is the only way of advancing.

You only have to look at real facts to become convinced of this.

I said just now that it was a question of an attacking line, looking toward the future, the only way to open the road to change, starting from a realistic viewpoint.

Yes, it is only in this battle, by rallying the forces of change around clear and well-founded objectives, that a popular movement can be built capable of imposing it. It will not be achieved by way of unprincipled electoral combinations or by deals among chiefs of staff, as proposed by the small groups playing the role of Francois Mitterrand's touts. Our 23d congress was perfectly clear on this basic question.

In effect, what we want is intangible. We want to go forward toward democratic change and achieve in the struggle to gain acceptance for it a majority popular rally, a new more solid and more durable left union.

We want to go further still, to extend this change by an original democratic path, which does not mean without a struggle, toward a French-style socialism which is itself democratic.

There is nothing in our attitude which contradicts this choice. It is with the greatest strictness but also with a spirit of initiative that we are applying the political strategy defined by our 22d and 23d congresses, and moreover, for the first time at such a level and in a battle for such stakes.

I repeat that we are inclined to favor any real step forward and to advance as far and as fast as will be decided by the working people themselves, on whom this depends. We are prepared to assume all our responsibilities in implementing the new policy which France needs, including in governing the country. Those who say that we do want to govern are only seeking to mask their refusal to give the PCF its due place in the government. Should the PCF be in position to possess that place and take it, it will assume all its responsibilities.

The key to the response to the operation of achieving consensus for a further clampdown, the key to change is the number of votes rallied around the Communist candidate on 26 April. Everything depends on that and on an attacking battle to achieve a good result.

This good result is possible. It is fair to say that nothing is settled, including the question of knowing who will take part in the second round. It is fair to have as one's ambition, as we do, that of enabling the Communist candidate to participate in the second round. All the more so since numerous democrats who turned toward the PS from 1972 onward are in the process of realizing that Francois Mitterrand is now overtly applying the policy which was that of the old French section of the Workers International. This explains PS present difficulties.

Everything Depends on Rallying Around the Communist Candidate

In more general terms, it is enough to travel the country and talk with people to establish not only that the discontent is very great but that there are also numerous working people sickened by the present situation and who are asking questions. There are even more available, including for joining in our action, even if they do not share all our beliefs. They can be won over to the single idea that they absolutely need us and will be able to count on us to defend them and to do everything in favor of change.

Naturally, that will only be gained at the cost of a great, very great battle.

PCF LEADER STATEMENT ON EL SALVADOR SITUATION

LD191143 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 15 Jan 81 p 8

[Text] [PCF Secretary General] Georges Marchais delivered a condemnation yesterday on behalf of the Committee for the Defense of Human Rights and Freedoms, of which he is chairman, against American intervention in El Salvador. He stated:

"Blood is being shed in El Salvador. A whole people are rising and arming themselves to end the dictatorship of a junta which was responsible for almost 10,000 deaths in 1980 alone.

Time is running out. Battles are raging and victims are falling in the hundreds. The tyrants must give way and allow the people of El Salvador to decide freely. We stand resolutely beside the Democratic Revolutionary Front, which includes all the opposition forces in the country We express our solidarity with the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, which has taken up arms for freedom and the homeland.

We call on democrats in France to show their solidarity with the people's forces of El Salvador.

We demand that all foreign support for the dictatorship of Napoleon Duarte cease immediately. U.S. military aid to the junta, amounting to several million dollars a year, must cease. The training of hundreds of officers from El Salvador at a U.S. base in Panama and the active presence of American advisers alongside the torturers must cease.

We call on French opinion to confront the threat of military intervention by the Pentagon, whether directly or through troops from Honduras or Guatemala. Freedom for El Salvador! No to U.S. intervention! Solidarity with the revolutionaries.

PCF'S GREMETZ CRITICIZES GISCARD'S AFRICA POLICY

[Statement 16 January by PCF Politburo member Maxime Gremetz: "Stop Threat of Intervention in Africa!"]

[Text] The formidable campaign waged by the French Government and the mass media with reference to a plan for an agreement between Chad and Libya throws light on the essence of Giscard d'Estaing's African policy. As the representative of the interests of big French multinational companies and as Africa's self-appointed policemen entrusted with the task of preserving the imperialist order, he cannot resign himself to the fact that he has lost control of Chad. He is trying to recapture his positions there by any means.

Sensing an increase in the opposition by various African countries to continued French domination, he is trying to impose through blackmail and intimidation a strengthening of the French military presence to which several African countries have objected.

Following military intervention in West Sahara, Zaire, Djibouti, the Central African Republic and Chad, Giscard d'Estaing is now threatening to involve France in yet another colonial adventure. In order to preserve the profits of multinational companies, support class interests and slow down the process of African peoples' liberation, Giscard d'Estaing ignores the interests of France, friendship and genuine cooperation with the peoples of Africa.

In this dirty work he has received some valuable support from the RPR and the PS which, in order to distinguish themselves, criticize "his lack of firmness" with respect to those peoples.

Together with the PCF, all justice-loving people caring for France's image in the world call for a stop to Giscard's intimidation of and threats of intervention against African peoples.

France has a major, positive role to play in Africa. This presupposes an end to a neo-colonialist policy and support for the peoples' struggle for social justice and national independence.

It also presupposes support for the implementation of genuine cooperation with all countries on the basis of mutual interests and a new international order. This is where the interests of France and the interests of peace and entente among peoples lie.

FORMER MEMBERS EXPLAIN REASONS FOR LEAVING PCF

[Unattributed report: "Mrs Parmelin, Mr Merle and Mr Pignon Explain Their Departure From the PCF"]

[Excerpt] Some 35 former PCF members, mostly intellectuals, who left that part last year, issued a pamphlet on Sunday 18 January explaining their decisions and replying to statements by [PCF secretary general] Georges Marchais. The latter had stated on 21 December that those who were leaving the party were doing so "under pressure from the adversary."

"No, Georges Marchais, it is not 'pressure from the adversary' which is prompting us to leave the PCF," the signatories state. "This is a well-known allegation. It is hackneyed. Our options are the same. It is the PCF's existing apparatus which is turning its back on them."

They continue: "Among other things we denounce the following as irresponsible and dangerous:

"The unqualified attitude [apparition] to the Soviet regime and to the invasion of Afghanistan and the attitude adopted toward events in Poland;
"The abandonment of any unitary strategy;
"The fall into a policy of workers' control;
"Chauvinism and xenophobia;
"Replacing debate by viciousness, slander and disdain;
"The support given to a hypocritical morality;
"The total lack of democracy in the party.

"Our departure is not a sign of resignation. It is a battle--a battle for socialism with freedom."

PARTY LEADERS TO STAND DOWN IN MITTERRAND FAVOR

MRG's Crepeau

LD211333 Paris LE MONDE in French 20 Jan 81 p 12

[Excerpt] Left Radical Movement [MRG] Chairman Michel Crepeau, who is a presidential election candidate, indicated in Toulouse on Friday evening 16 January that he will stand down in the second round of the election in Francois Mitterrand's favor, on certain conditions. He specified that he hopes to obtain enough votes in the first round for the PS candidate to agree to adopt some of the ideas put forward last June in the MRG's manifesto.

PSD's Hintermann

[Excerpt] Speaking to the Eighth Congress of the Social Democratic Party [PSD] which he founded in 1975, Eric Hintermann stated on Sunday 18 January that he hopes to stand down in Francois Mitterrand's favor in the second round of the presidential election (Mr Hintermann wants to stand in this election but has not yet received enough support). The PSD secretary general said: "We want social democracy. We will have to opt for the solution which is closest to social democracy; failing a Social Democratic president, I would like a Socialist president in the second round provided his election does not mean giving government posts to the PCF." Mr Hintermann expressed the view that the PCF "will not play the role which some people expect since the existing leadership will probably not wish to enter a reformist government" if Mr Mitterrand wins.

The Social Democratic Party founder also said: "The day we are told that the Social Democratic group can express its views and organize freely within the PS I will propose returning to the PS...."

PRESIDENT HITS ALL-TIME LOW IN OPINION POLLS

LD190941 Paris LE MONDE in French 11-12 Jan 81 p 4

[Text] The French people's "level" of confidence in Giscard d'Estaing as it is analyzed each month by SOFRES is negative. In FIGARO magazine of Saturday, 10 January the monthly poll shows that 49 percent of the people questioned have no confidence in the president of the republic "to solve the problems posed in France today." Only 47 percent have confidence in him.

Thus, the head of state loses 6 points in one month (53 percent had confidence in him in December 1980), while the percentage of French people who have no confidence in him increases by 7 points (42 percent had no confidence in him last month).

Since the question of "confidence" has been formulated in this way by SOFRES, that is since October 1978, it is the first time that the response has shown a negative balance for the head of state. Thus, SOFRES joins IFOP, whose popularity pool published every month by FRANCE-SOIR has shown a negative balance 10 times. This latter was constantly positive when Jaques Chirac occupied the post of premier.

In December 1980, the IFOP popularity poll established the level of satisfaction with Giscard d'Estaing as 40 percent and of dissatisfaction as 46 percent.

The SOFRES-FIGARO magazine poll also measures the level of confidence in the premier. He loses 2 points, 31 percent having confidence in him as against 33 percent last month, while 62 percent have no confidence in him (against 61 percent in December).

Among the other personalities of the majority, Jaques Chirac and Michel Debre advance by 2 points: 33 percent of the people questioned want the mayor of Paris to "play an important role in the months and years to come"; 29 percent express this wish for the mayor of Amboise.

In the opposition, Francois Mitterrand gains 3 points over December: 35 percent wish to see him play an important role. But Michel Rocard remains very much at the head of the personalities for whom the French express this wish: with 50 percent he gains 1 point while Georges Marchais loses 2 (He goes from 20 percent to 18 percent.).

16 January Poll

[Text] FRANCE-SOIR-IFOP's monthly popularity poll published on Friday 16 January confirms the president's deteriorating image in public opinion. According to this poll carried out between 6 and 13 January on a national sample of 1,610 people aged 18 years and over, only 37 percent of the people questioned said that they were satisfied with Giscard d'Estaing. The head of state lost 3 points since the December 1980 poll. The percentage of dissatisfied people, on the other hand, is up 1 point (47 against 46 percent).

The president's popularity rating has never before been so low. The poorest result previously recorded by Giscard d'Estaing in FRANCE-SOIR-IFOP's monthly "barometer" was in December 1976, after the RPR was formed: 39 percent of people were "satisfied" and 47 percent "dissatisfied."

In addition, 27 percent of the people questioned said that they were satified with Raymond Barre and 57 percent said that they were dissatisfied. The premier's popularity rating was just as bad in December.

FRG'S GENSCHER PAYS 1-DAY VISIT FOR TALKS

Arrival in Rome

AU211607 Rome ANSA in English 1550 GMT 21 Jan 81

[Text] Rome, 21 Jan (ANSA)--West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher flew in here today for talks with the Italian leaders which local observers noted as being the first meeting between European statesmen since President Ronald Reagan's inauguration yesterday.

Genscher's schedule includes sessions with head-of-state Sandro Pertini, Prime Minister Arnaldo Forlani, and Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo.

Genscher's meeting with Pertini covered bilateral relations, some EEC problems, and the prospects for the international situation in the light of the most recent development.

Pertini also asked Genscher to convey his own and the Italian people's thanks to the West German president for the generous aid supplied by West Germany to the areas in southern Italy hit by an earthquake last November.

Meets Leaders

AU220900 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 22, Jan 81

[Text] Rome, 22 Jan (ANSA)--West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher made a work visit to Italy yesterday when he met with Italian head-of-state Sandro Pertini, Premier Arnaldo Forlani and Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo. The talks centered on international problems, East-West ties in particular, and Community matters.

Censcher pushed for a Community foreign policy and greater coordination among EEC partners in matters of security. He stressed that a relaunching of joint European endeavors was not to be seen as any attempt to weaken the Atlantic alliance, however.

Forlani agreed that a stronger and more united Europe improved Europe's partnership with the United States.

Europe's role was also the focus of talks Genscher had with his Italian counterpart. Genscher said that this was a decisive moment for East-West ties as in a few weeks the Soviet Communist Party congress will lay the groundwork for Soviet foreign and economic policies. The congress cannot help but be influenced by the West's behavior, he said. If the USSR got the idea that there were areas of disagreement between the United States and Europe, it would spend years trying to exploit this dissension before realizing it was an illusion, Genscher maintained. In the meantime, that would be the end of detente, he added.

Colombo agreed that this was a critical moment for East-West ties. He added that "European union and the solidarity between Europe and the United States are essential to deal with any eventual negative changes in Soviet policy and in order to pursue detente." "If the USSR has achieved successes in recent times this is due to Western weaknesses which, should they continue, could induce the Soviet Union to mistakenly think there is no European union," he said.

CIVIL TRADE SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN LIFTED

[Text] Sanctions on civil trade with Iran will be lifted from midnight tonight, the Trade Department announced today. This follows the release of the American hostages. Other Common Market and OECD countries are taking similar steps, the department said.

The department added that the lifting of British sanctions would involve two procedures. A statutory instrument had been made which revoked the order prohibiting the export of embargoed goods to Iran. A second order, which prohibited the making of contracts for the sale, supply or transport of goods from Britain to Iran, would be revoked by order-in-council, as soon as convenient.

In the meantime, Trade Secretary Mr John Biffen has issued an open general licence which immediately authorizes the making and performance of contracts which would otherwise have been prohibited under the second order.

THATCHER SENDS CONGRATULATIONS TO CARTER, REAGAN

LD211319 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 21 Jan 81 p 5

[James Wightman report: "Mrs Thatcher Hails Carter's Tenacity--and Says Farewell"]

[Text] The prime minister has sent a message to Mr Carter expressing pleasure at the release of the hostages and congratulating him on his part in securing their freedom.

The message, prepared on Monday when it looked as if the hostages might be released then, reached Mr Carter soon after Mr Reagan became president yesterday. Diplomatic soundings had been taken to ensure that the new president would not be offended by Mrs Thatcher's sending such a message to Mr Carter. The message said:

I was delighted to learn that the 52 members of your embassy held hostage in Teheran for over a year have at last been set free. Their safe release is a tribute to your skill and tenacity in handling an agonising problem. We congratulate you and rejoice with you and the American people. Our hearts go out to the hostages and their families whose long ordeal, so courageously borne, is now over.

The message was Mrs Thatcher's second to Mr Carter yesterday. She first sent him one of farewell as he relinquished the Presidency. At the same time she sent a message of congratulations and welcome to President Reagan with whom she will have talks in Washington next month.

Mrs Thatcher told Mr Carter she had admired his courage in tackling the formidable problems facing the United States and the free world. She also thanked him for his close friendship and cooperation and said how much she had appreciated his hospitality to her in Washington in 1979. She and her colleagues sent Mr Carter best wishes for his future, said Mrs Thatcher.

Congratulating Mr Reagan on his assuming the Presidency, Mrs Thatcher spoke of the formidable task of leadership which he faced at a dangerous time. She assured him of her government's confidence and support as they worked together to meet the challenges of the 1980's. Mrs Thatcher added that she looked forward to renewing her friendship with Mr Reagan in Washington next month and to consolidating the close relationship between the two countries. She met Mr Reagan twice when she was in opposition.

She is to visit Washington on February 25-28 and will be the first European head of government to go to the White House under the new Presidency. She will be accompanied by Lord Carrington, foreign secretary. There are hopes in Whitehall and in Washington of close ties between Mrs Thatcher and Mr Reagan, particularly when they seem to have so much in common on economic policies and defence.

DAILY TELEGRAPH ON REAGAN 'ABILITY TO COMMUNICATE'

[Editorial: "Hostages Out, Reagan In"]

[Text] So Ronald Reagan, sworn in yesterday as the 40th president of the United States, will at least not have the problem of the American hostages in Iran on his plate. The Iranians had them airborne too late for President Carter to enjoy the small consolation of welcoming them to freedom while he was still in office, while at the same time avoiding the unknown perils of having to deal with President Reagan. All very cunning of the Mullahs. Nevertheless, it is in its way quite a happy augury. Americans will find thankfulness at the safe return mingling with hopes for the Reagan presidency. Not only thankfulness either. It will lend body to Mr Reagan's warning against "those who practice terrorism and prey upon their neighbors."

Mr Reagan's speech was a good example of its kind, and better than many recently. It was neither too flamboyant (John F. Kennedy) nor too pious (Jimmy Carter). In substance it did not depart from many pronouncements he made during the election campaign but it neatly presented the philosophy he is offering the American people: Less government at the center rather than in the states; lighten the "punitive tax burden"; reawaken "this industrial giant"; renewal for friends and allies: "We will match loyalty with loyalty." For potential adversaries: "We will maintain sufficient strength to prevail if need be, knowing that if we do so, we have the best chance of not having to use that strength." Perhaps more important than the homely substance was the manner; it was Mr Reagan's ability to "communicate," in the jargon. That is not to be sneezed at.

All remains to be done. If Mr Reagan can achieve say 80 percent of the prospects he has set forth, he will have worked a mighty work. He has been handed a rather miserable inheritance, as he clearly recognised in his speech. Everything will depend on how the economy performs, and on whether inflation can be held at bay and then cut back. Familiar terms for British ears. Mr Reagan has some shrewd men in his economic team, a mixture of businessmen and theorists. If some reports are correct, the team has lost its earlier fascination with the economic performance of Mrs Thatcher's government and intends to follow a rather modified model of monetarism. Mrs Thatcher will no doubt be interested to find out about that when she goes to Washington next month.

Mrs Thatcher will be accompanied by Lord Carrington, who must be avidly looking foward to discussions with Mr Reagan's secretary of state, Gen Haig. So far as the big questions are concerned--nuclear arms control, the Middle East, for two--the Reagan camp has made it clear that it is going to take its time about formulating policy lines. One somewhat shadowy area so far has been Africa. The question of Namibia and South Africa is one of the more immediate subjects likely to come to the fore in the fairly near future. Both Gen Haig and Lord Carrington will have a strong interest in staying off United Nations moves for sanctions against South Africa. In general, however, Lord Carrington should be aware that Gen Haig, with Mr Reagan's complete backing, intends to place America's interests first always.

MORNING STAR FINDS REAGAN PRESIDENCY 'FRIGHTENING'

LD211459 London MORNING STAR in English 21 Jan 81 p 1

[Editorial: "Immoral Rearmament"]

[Text] Crucial to yesterday's welcome release of the Iranian hostages is Iran's insistence that the U.S. will never try to interfere in its internal affairs again; for the modern history of Iran since before the last war has been one of first British, then U.S. imperialist interference.

To exploit the country's vast oil wealth for the West, British and U.S. interests have imposed on the Iranian people their own puppets.

After the CIA overthrew the democratically elected Iranian leader, Mossadeq, Iran lived under the terror of the Shah, armed and upheld by the U.S. and Britain, a key to dominating the whole of the Middle East.

And even as the hostages finally flew out of Teheran yesterday, the U.S. Defence Department authorised the sale of two billion dollars worth of arms to Saudi Arabia. Meanwhile U.S. warships remained off the Gulf.

The ousting of imperialism by the Iranian people was a bitter blow to the confidence of a U.S. determined to dominate the world's resources.

Yesterday the U.S. response was reflected in the inauguration of President Reagan. For Reagan this is to be a moral crusade of strength. To back up the growing arsenals of the U.S.--of which Britain is a major offshore base--is the "will and moral courage of free men and women," he said. But Reagan is not interested in free men and women. On the contrary, U.S. military might is interested in the subjugation of men and women to the will of the U.S. With Gen Haig, ex-Nixon aide and advocate of first-strike nuclear attacks, at his right hand, it is a frightening prospect.

The U.S. is in deep economic trouble. Inflation, unemployment are wreaking havoc, as Reagan admitted yesterday. His answer is moral rearmament and military might.

For the moment Iran has rid itself of the U.S. presence. On paper it has U.S. agreement. But for us in Britain, U.S. interference is still very real.

The Thatcher government is a willing ally in putting Britain in the front line of a nuclear holocaust in Europe. Taking hostages can never be condoned. But like the Iranians, the Beitish people must fight to throw out U.S. interference in our defence policy. Instead we must defend ourselves not with U.S.-controlled nuclear weaponry, but with a vigorous independent diplomacy for peace--not on the warmongering bravado of a sad B movie.

CABINET FREEZES PLANS TO IMPLEMENT DEFENSE CUTS

[Desmond Wettern report: "Defence Cost Cuts Frozen"]

[Text] Plans to implement defence cuts of at least 400 million pounds have been frozen on Cabinet orders, so the new defence secretary, Mr Nott, can start with a clean sheet.

It will be up to him whether he accepts proposals for spending cuts which Mr Pym, his predecessor, had approved.

The full amount to be cut will not be known until after the end of the financial year as only then will it be possible to ascertain the amount the services have overspent on their current budget.

Mr Nott is expected to look with disfavour at any proposals to increase purchase of equipment from America such as the Harpoon missile as an allegedly cheap replacement for the British Sea Eagle.

It seems certain he will favour the proposed British developments of the Harrier fighter rather than the slower and less maneuverable American modification of the design.

Mr Nott will certainly be influenced by the prime minister's advocacy of a maritime defence policy for Britain.

STATEMENT ON NATIONAL GUARD COMMANDER'S RECALL

NC211230 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 21 Jan 81

[Text] The Defense Ministry has issued a statement on the issue of appointing a new National Guard General Staff [GEEF] chief. The statement says that there has never been any question of an ultimatum from the Greek Government to the Cypriot Government or of imposing any officer as the new GEEF chief.

As has already been announced, the statement adds, the established procedure has been followed by informing the Cypriot Government about the decision to transfer Lieutenant General Komninos after 6 years of service in Cyprus, and by submitting a recommendation for a replacement, who would take over as chief--if and for as long as he is approved by the Cypriot Government.

CONSTITUTIONAL ASPECTS DISCUSSED AT 21 JAN TALKS

NC211631 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in English 1610 GMT 21 Jan 81

[Text] The Cyprus intercommunal talks resumed this afternoon at the Ledra Palace conference area. At today's session the two sides continued discussion of constitutional aspects of the Cyprus problem. Speaking to reporters before the meeting, the UN special representative in Cyprus, Mr Gobbi, said the subject of discussion is the most complex from the technical point of view. Referring to the arrival of Mr Sherry, of the UN Cyprus desk, to Cyprus on Sunday, he said he is going to advise him, but he will not play any specific role. He also said Mr Sherry is not bringing any message from Mr Waldheim nor is he going to Ankara or Athens. Replying to other questions, he said: For the time being there is no concrete progress. We are still negotiating.

A communique issued by the United Nations after the meeting, which lasted about 2 hours, said both sides have submitted substantive proposals. The stage has now been reached for a detailed comparative study and discussion of these proposals. The next meeting will take place on Wednesday when the item territorial aspects will again be examined.

Ioannidhis, Onan Comments

[Excerpt] In a statement prior to today's Cyprus intercommunal talks meeting, Greek Cypriot Representative Ioannidhis said that it was expected a useful exchange of views would be held on the meaning and the principles of the proposals which have already been submitted at the negotiating table.

Answering a pertinent question, Ioannidhis said the Greek Cypriot side has definitely submitted proposals on the question of initial practical measures. He added that the Turkish Cypriot side has also submitted proposals at the negotiating table. Ioannidhis clarified that these are written proposals.

In answer to a remark that the impression prevails that the atmosphere is no longer so good, Ioannidhis said that the atmosphere continues to be good. In answer to another question he said it can be said that negotiations have not yet started. Turkish Cypriot interlocutor Onan made a statement prior to the meeting and expressed the belief that today's talks were to proceed in depth and that an effort was to be exerted to arrive at an agreed constitution.

In answer to a remark that the Turkish Cypriot press reported that the talks are continuing for the sake of talks, Onan said: I can assure you that I do not come for the sake of talks, but I come in order to find a solution to the Cyprus problem. I can say that the same applies for Mr Ioannidhis.

Answering another question, Onan said that the atmosphere has been constructive from the beginning. He added, however, that no results have yet been achieved. Answering another question, Onan said that the talks are not deadlocked, and he expressed the hope that there will be no deadlock.

Today's meeting lasted almost 2 hours. From the Greek Cypriot side, the talks were also attended by advisers Triandafillidhis and Mrs Soulioti, and by Mr Poliviou, special adviser to the Greek Cypriot interlocutor on constitutional and other related matters. From the Turkish Cypriot side, the talks were attended by Mr Onan's advisers, Ertegun and Tatar.

CABINET ACCEPTS UN PROPOSALS ON NICOSIA AIRPORT

[Text] The Cyprus Government has informed UN Secretary General Waldheim that it accepts his proposals for resettlement in Famagusta and the reopening of the Nicosia airport, although it has some reservations on certain provisions of his proposal on the airport. This decision was taken by the Council of Ministers after a serious study of the secretary general's proposals which had been conveyed to the government by Foreign Minister Rolandhis.

According to reliable information, Mr Sherry, the UN secretary general's special adviser, will be bringing to Cyprus Dr Waldheim's proposal which exclusively concerns the reopening of Nicosia airport and which will be submitted at the negotiating table. Diplomatic circles consider the Turkish Cypriot side's attitude toward the reopening of Nicosia airport as a "political maneuver" with the aim of pursuing, during the discussions, political gains that would serve its partitionist plans.

MIKHAILIDHIS COMMENTS ON TURKISH CYPRIOT RIGHTS

[Text] House President Alekos Mikhailidhis has given a clear warning that the Cyprus Government is not going to recognise any sovereign rights for the Turkish Cypriot administration in the north.

Speaking at a memorial for two Greek Cypriots at Trakhani who lost their lives in the national struggle, Mr Mikhailidhis said that their sacrifice must provide courage for those who survive to undertake their responsibilities.

Referring to the intercommunal talks, he said there is much talk about mistrust between the two communities but the building of trust cannot be through division.

In an obvious reference to reports that the Turks are demanding sovereign rights as part of their position about good will measures, Mr Midhailidhis said:

"It is inconceivable that someone could suggest that we should disband as a state or that we should recognise sovereign rights to the Turkish Cypriot administration, at a time they know that such a step not be the road to settlement but the avenue to legitimisation of partition".

In another speech at Kolossi refugee establishment, Mr Mikhailidhis defended the right of refugees to return to their homes as part of the observance of the fundamental freedoms of movement, settlement, work and ownership in a federal state.

TURKISH CYPRIOT OFFICIAL ON SOVEREIGNTY RIGHTS

NC210917 Nicosia TURKISH CYPRIOT NEWS BULLETIN in English 21 Jan 81 p 1, 4

[Text] Both the Turkish and Greek Cypriot peoples must have equal sovereignty rights said Mr Oguz R. Korhan, president of the Legislative assembly of the Turkish Federated State of Kibris.

He was commenting yesterday on a settlement by his Greek Cypriot counterpart, Mr Milhalidhis reported in the 'CYPRUS MAIL', when the Greek leader warned that the south Cyprus administrations would not recognize any sovereign rights for the Turkish Cypriots.

"This is a surprising statement because the Turkish Cypriots' right to sovereignty and independence in Cyprus is undeniable and inalienable as embodied in the 1960 agreements", Mr Korhan declared.

"It is this right which the Greek Cypriot onslaught during 1963-1974 tired to destroy, and it is for the defence of this that the Turkish Cypriot people put up such heroic resistance for eleven years. It is on the basis of this inalienable right that the Turkish Cypriot side consolidated itself in the north and extended its hand of friendship to the Greek Cypriot aggressors for the re-establishment of a partnership republic on a bizonal, bicommunal and nonaligned federal basis.

"The question of recognition of the right of sovereignty of the Turkish people of Cyprus does not arise because it is a reality entrenched in the 1960 agreements and Mr Mikhailidhis's attempt to question it serves no other purpose than to undermine the current peace talks. In fact, as the last session of the talks has shown, the Greek Cypriot side has not reciprocated Turkish Cypriot good will.

"Any future political settlement must be based on the equal sovereignty rights of the Turkish and Greek Cypriot peoples."

O AGON: GOOD-WILL MEASURES MUST BE RECONSIDERED

NC170945 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 17 Jan 81 p 1

["My Opinion" column by the Observer: "We Must Disengage Ourselves From the Good-Will Measures"]

[Excerpts] At the time of the opening of the intercommunal dialogue, the government took a number of measures to assist the climate in which the talks were to be held.

For example, the government agreed not to raise the Cypriot problem for discussion at this year's UN General Assembly session. Our problem has not been taken to international rostrums as frequently as it should; the voice of Cyprus is not being heard as loudly as it was in the past; official reaction to provocations or activities by the Turkish side has been soft.

However, the Turks have failed to reciprocate, take any measures or proceed with any gestures in response to ours. On the contrary, by submitting the recent mock proposals on Famagusta, they have continued their provocative statements and activities and have escalated their intransigence and negative stand. Although we have proceeded with new concessions, the Turks have escalated their provocations and increased their demands.

We believe that the government must now reassess its good will activities following the totally negative stand and intransigence of the Turks. It must disengage itself from the decision it has made if the Turkish side continues the same negative policy. The competent authorities must proceed with Cyprus' reactivation in the international field and hold a campaign to brief the foreign governments and the international public on the Cypriot problem.

If the Turkish side continues to fail to constructively reciprocate, then the good will measures taken by the government must be withdrawn.

Therefore, the government must warn the United Nations, the Turks and others that it cannot possibly continue to remain idle and that it will be compelled to withdraw the good will measures and disengage itself from its decisions if the Turks fail to respond accordingly.

WEEKLY SEES CARTER, REAGAN, HAIG ALL ANTI-CYPRUS

[Editorial: "Viewpoint"]

[Text] Four years ago when Jimmy Carter was elected president, church bells peeled joyfully in free Cyprus to welcome the advent of a man who promised to uphold human rights everywhere and to maintain the U.S. arms embargo against Turkey, until the Turkish invasion troops were withdrawn from the island.

Jimmy's departure from office this week is greeted with silence and sadness over the fact that the promises of even an avowedly God-fearing politician have proved hollow and hypocritical.

The new president, Ronald Reagan, also took a moralistic attitude before his election, going as far as to promise that if elected, he would reimpose the arms embargo on Turkey.

This promise has collapsed even before Reagan's inauguration, however, with the congressional testimony of General Alexander Haig, the man nominated as secretary of state, who not only admitted but defended his support of the lifting of the arms embargo against Turkey when he served as NATO's supreme military commander under Carter.

The simple moral of this brief tale is that Cyprus should not bank on the promises of politicians, particularly the bible-thumping or defenders-of-real-values variety, for their words turn out to be even more hollow in the end than those of their more prosaic colleagues.

The real pity is that the politicians, who may be well-meaning, finally succumb to the advice or pressures of military types like General Haig, who clearly believe their concept of stragety stands far above the upholding of human rights.

AVRIANI ON PLANS FOR NEW CRETE U.S.-NATO BASE

NC211756 Athens AVRIANI in Greek 21 Jan 81 pp 1,6

[Exclusive report by Stelios Agouridhis]

[Excerpts] Crete is definitely being transformed into a powder keg. According to exclusive information received by AVRIANI from political and financial circles, as well as from official documents, it emerges that the government has recently received:

A detailed NATO plan--this is being studied carefully by the government--drawn up by the United States and the member-states of the EEC, whose main purpose is to force the population of Soudha to abandon the area and to establish the largest NATO base in the Mediterranean, and in southwestern [as printed] Europe in particular, that would have a model airfield and harbor.

According to the same sources, the government is giving careful consideration to this proposal while, in the event that agreement is finally reached, the command of this new supermodern base as well as of the others will be assigned to a joint command in which our country will also participate.

As these circles have emphasized, U.S.-NATO circles are particularly concerned with the establishment of this superbase following the new turn of events in the Middle East, the continuing Iran-Iraq conflict and their "ostensible" abandonment of quite a number of Middle East states (Afghanistan and others).

This base will cover the entire Middle East region and be equipped with supermodern heavy weapons and maybe "Lance" nuclear warheads.

Meanwhile, the abandonment of the Soudha area by the responsible state services is more than obvious. According to information received by AVRIANI from competent and authoritative sources, there is a special long-term plan to force the population to abandon the area and to establish this superbase.

This whole situation has filled its people with despair.

OFFICIAL CLARIFIES PROPOSALS ON U.S. BASES

NC21154 Athens ELEVTHEROS KOSMOS in Greek 21 Jan 81 p 8

[Text] Replying to a journalist's question about a press report regarding the supplementary Greek proposals on the U.S. bases, the government spokesman made the following clarification:

"The truth about the drafting of the geographical appendices on the bases in the defense and economic cooperation agreement with the United States is the following:

"A mixed team of officials from the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and National Defense has, over the last few days, worked out the final wording of these texts and is now busy completing their translation into English. No problem of either disagreement or amendments has arisen. The geographical appendices will be handed over to the U.S. side within the next few days.

'Consequently, the published reports about disagreements between the ministers of national defense and foreign affairs do not correspond to reality.

U.S. USES BASES FOR POLISH SURVEILLANCE

[Excerpt] U.S. electronic surveillance aircraft are using the base at Ellinikon as a refueling stop and to gather information within the context of the more general mobilization of the United States and NATO against the People's Republic of Poland. There are reports in this connection that during the November-January period, at least three U.S. spy planes stopped at Ellinikon base for refueling before proceeding toward central Europe. They also collected "intelligence material" from the NADGE stations and the U.S. bases in Greek territory.

The unimpeded use of Greece for cold war aims of the Americans and of NATO constitutes only one aspect of official Greece's alignment with their antisocialist and anti-Polish objectives. From this point of view, the comments of the Soviet media are also instructive. According to our correspondent in Moscow:

Serious reservations are being voiced as to the credibility of the Greek Government's declaration that it desires neighborly relations with the socialist countries.

Latest reports confirm that the government of "New Democracy" has committed itself to participating in the NATO campaign that is being developed within the pretext of events in Poland. It appears, however, that it is concerned with the manner in which the "Greek contribution" will be put into practice to avoid to the extent possible the reaction of the progressive forces and public opinion.

FOREIGN MINISTRY OFFICIAL RESIGNS FOR HEALTH

NC191242 Athens KIPIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 18 Jan 81 p 18

[Excerpt] Viron Theodhoropoulos, the secretary general of the Foreign Ministry, has submitted his resignation to K. Mitsotakis pleading "reasons of health." The assistant secretary general, Ambassador St. Roussos, is held as his most likely successor, though, according to some reports, the possibility of I. Tzounis, the present ambassador in Washington, is also being discussed.

Commenting on Theodhoropoulos' resignation--who really is having problems with his eyesight--diplomatic circles maintain that the reasons must rather be sought in his total inability to collaborate with the foreign minister, with whom he had frequently disagreed regarding the handling of Greek-Turkish differences and reentry into NATO.

EVREN, TURKMEN CONGRATULATE REAGAN, HAIG

TA211657 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 21 Jan 81

[Text] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren sent a congratulatory message to U.S. President Ronald Reagan who assumed office yesterday. In his congratulatory message, Prime Minister Ulusu expressed the belief that the traditional friendship and cooperation between the two countries will be further developed in every field on the bilateral level as well as within the framework of NATO. Ulusu said: on behalf of myself and the Turkish Government, I extend my sincerest wishes for your personal health and happiness.

Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen sent a message to U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and congratulated him on his appointment. In his message, Turkmen said the feelings of trust and esteem inspired by Haig during his NATO assignment will further develop the solidarity needed within NATO.

In a reply message to Turkmen, Haig expressed the conviction that Turkey will fulfill its duty in accordance with NATO interests and the national interests of the other NATO members. Haig also expressed the hope that joint work will be conducted with Turkey in a bid to strengthen NATO and develop cooperation between the member countries.

TURKMEN CITES 'RELIEF, JOY' AT HOSTAGES' RELEASE

TA211247 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 21 Jan 81

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen said that with the release of the U.S. hostages an important source of tension in the region has been eliminated. Turkmen, who is in At-Ta'if, Saudi Arabia, for the preliminary meetings of the third Islamic summit conference, made the following statement to Turkish journalists: We received with great relief and joy the news of the agreement which led to the release of the hostages and of the end of the suffering of the hostages and their relatives. With the agreement, an important source of tension in our region--which is faced with many problems anyway--has been eliminated. I would like to point out that we appreciate the efforts of the Algerian Government, which led to this result.

ISTANBUL PRESS REACTION TO ZIAUL HAQ'S VISIT

NC211215 [Editorial Report] The Istanbul Turkish press has carried the following comment on Pakistan President Gen Mohammad Ziaul Haq's recent visit to Turkey. On 13 January, MILLIYET, on page 1, carries an unattributed editorial, "Pakistan and Turkey", in which the writer comments on President Ziaul Haq's visit to Turkey. After stressing the strong and traditional ties between the two countries, the writer says: "Though we do not approve of President Ziaul Haq's political methods, we welcome him to Turkey as the highest representative of friendly and brotherly Pakistan."

Recalling the full support which Pakistan lent to Turkey in the Cyprus dispute and the special trade relations existing between the two countries, the writer continues: "The Pakistani head of state is the first leader at this level to visit our state after the 12 September takeover. We feel that Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu--who is going to represent our country at the At-Ta'if Islamic summit conference at the end of this month--will find a close ally in the person of President Ziaul Haq."

The writer finally says: "We wonder whether or not Ziaul Haq will brief Ankara on Pakistan's efforts to manufacture nuclear bombs. It is known that Pakistani scientist (Dr A.Q. Han) is pursuing these efforts, which are believed to have secured financial assistance from Libyan leader Al-Qadhdhafi for two separate projects."

On 14 January, HURRIYET on page 3, carried an editorial by Oktay Eksi: "A Guest in Our Country", in which he comments on Ziaul Haq's visit to Turkey. He recalls the valuable help which the Pakistani people extended to Turkey during the war of independence and adds: "That is why those who lead Turkey and those who lead Pakistan have always felt the need to evaluate one another with 'a special care.' Despite the fact that today Pakistan is being run by Ziaul Haq in a manner that the Turkish public has been unable to digest, this same person is being extended a warm welcome in Turkey."

Oktay Eksi appreciates Pakistani efforts to achieve contemporary civilization, and he adds: "But Pakistan is being run by a group that believes that efforts for 'development, modernization and democratization' can be based on a fervent religious fanaticism." The writer concludes: "Irrespective of his motives, Pakistani head of state Ziaul Haq's visit has been useful in that it has given us an opportunity to once again review our own values."

On 17 January, TERCUMAN, on pages 1 and 12, carried a commentary by Nazi Ilicak: "How Far and Yet How Near," stressing the traditional friendship between the two peoples but also criticizing Ziaul Haq personally. Ilicak says, among other things: "In his first speech, Ziaul Haq pledged to hold general elections in October 1977, but he did not keep this pledge. First he postponed elections until 17 November 1979 and then abandoned the idea of general elections completely. As time went by, his attitude toward political parties toughened, Bhutto was hanged and his supporters jailed. All political parties were banned, even the Pakistani National Unity Party which opposed Bhutto and applauded the military regime. Press censorship was toughened. Now he has been trying to restore his lost prestige by turning to the principles of the divine laws of Islam." The article adds: "The above examples indicate the deep chasm that exists between Turkey and Pakistan. That is why we called our commentary 'How Far and Yet How Near.' We are very close in language, in religion and in history, but we are very far from each other in the pursuit of our political objectives and in the interpretation of religious and state affairs." The commentary concludes: "Because of his erroneous behavior, Ziaul Haq gradually broke away from the people, and as he did so began to fear democracy. Ziaul Haq has lost his people's support because he antagonized the press and the politicians."

On 19 January, CUMHURIYET, on page 2, carried a commentary by Ilhan Selcuk who comments on Ziaul Haq's visit to Turkey. The commentator says: "Ziaul Haq visited our country and left. It was natural that as a head of state visiting our country, he should be treated with respect. Now we can talk and ask ourselves: 'What is Ziaul Haq's place in the contemporary world?' He sounds as if he was living 1400 years ago and he is defending a dark world." Comparing him with Khomeyni, the writer adds: "At least Khomeyni has identified himself with a militancy which has unfurled the flag of independence over Iran, while the Pakistan of Ziaul Haq has had to submit to dictatorship. Islam is being used as an ideology of freedom in one place and as an ideology of slavery in another."

COURT ORDERS ARREST OF 223 TRADE UNIONISTS

[Text] The Second Military Court of the Istanbul Martial Law Command has decided to arrest another 223 leaders of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] and of unions affiliated with DISK and the factory representatives of these unions.

The Istanbul Military Prosecutor's Office has started an investigation of some 2,000 persons, including the leaders of DISK and unions affiliated with DISK and the factory representatives of these unions, for engaging in illegal organizational activity with the aim of establishing a Marxist-Leninist order based on the hegemony of the working class by overthrowing the existing constitutional system. Of the persons who were being investigated and detained, 545 were referred to the military court of the Istanbul Martial Laq Command with a request for their arrest. Of these, 83 persons, including DISK leader Abdullah Basturk and former Istanbul Mayor Ahmet Isfan, were arrested and 462 persons were released. Following objections to this decision, the 2d Military Court of the Istanbul Martial Law Command issued arrest warrants in absentia for 223 of the 462 persons who had previously been released.

JAPAN EXTENDS LOANS WITHIN OCED FRAMEWORK

[Text] Two loan agreements for a total of $80 million, which Japan undertook to extend to Turkey for the years 1979 and 1980 within the framework of OECD, were signed in Ankara today. The agreements were signed by State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal on behalf of Turkey and by Japanese Ambassador to Ankara Nobuyasu Nishimiya on behalf of Japan.

In the first agreement, a project loan of $35 million, which the Japanese Government undertook to extend in 1979, will be used to finance the foreign currency needs of the Hasanugurlu dam and the Alaybey dockyard.

In the second agreement, a program loan of $45 million was extended to Turkey. This loan was programmed for 1980 within the framework of OECD. Both loans will be repaid in 25 years with a 5-year grace period. The loans will be subject to a 4.25 percent annual interest rate.

In a speech during the signing ceremony, Ozal said that the agreements will contribute to the development of relations between the two countries. Nishimiya expressed the hope that the loans will positively contribute to the Turkish economy.

SCHMIDT COMMENTS ON HOSTAGES, U.S. COOPERATION

DW221205 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 2150 GMT 21 Jan 81

[Correspondent Eser interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmict at the Frankfurt Rhine-Main Airport, presented within the ZDF's special feature on the released U.S. hostages, entitled "Stopover Germany"--live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] Your visit here in Frankfurt is a gesture to the outgoing U.S. president whose term ended yesterday, and toward the American people, but above all toward the hostages. What political effort might this event have for you in international politics?

[Answer] To begin with, this does not have any political effect for us Germans. Yet, it does have a great effect, one of relief, on the entire American nation. You are quite right in saying that. It is a triumph for the outgoing president a day after his term expired. It is an immense joy to the families of the hostages and to the men themselves. But it is a relief to the American nation. And after so many long months of waiting, God knows, our American friends deserve it. As you correctly put it, it was a matter of the heart for me, for our people, for the Germans today not only to congratulate Jimmy Carter, which I have done wholeheartedly, but also and especially to wish the best to the released hostages and their families in the name of all Germans, and to convey our good wishes to the American nation as a whole. Cordial greetings naturally go to President Reagan as well.

[Question] Do you believe that this event might have a relaxing effect on international politics, specifically on the relationship between Iran and the EC in general and the Federal Republic in particular?

[Answer] The Federal Republic and the other European Community states rescinded their trade restrictions against Iran last night when this agreement was made, so your assumption is right. Detente will gain ground. But one must not overrate the international political effects in the Middle East because there is a war going on between Iran and Iraq, as you know, and there are other tensions in the Near and Middle East as well as in southwest Asia and Afghanistan where shooting is still going on. But we have gotten rid of one problem.

[Question] Isn't it true that the price paid for the release of the hostages was a plain violation of international law?

[Answer] Regarding the release of the hostages, I do not see at present that international law has been violated. The taking of hostages was a breach of international law. That is a bad thing.

[Question] How does the German federal chancellor assess the transition from the Carter administration to the Reagan administration? Will you personally, will the Federal Government have difficulties adapting to it, as is frequently assumed?

[Answer] No, I do not think so. I know the most important persons in the new government very well. I have met President Reagan three times. I know the secretary of state very well. We know other persons of this government quite well. We know that U.S. Ambassador Stoessel, who worked here in Bonn for several years and who is highly esteemed by us, has been appointed to an important State Department position. No, we look forward to cooperation, which was greatly stressed by Secretary Haig in the Senate hearings. We look forward to this cooperation with great confidence. Actually, we are certain that there will be good cooperation.

SPOKESMAN REPORTS SCHMIDT-REAGAN CONVERSATION

[Text] Bonn, 22 Jan (DPA)--The new American President Ronald Reagan said that he hopes soon to be able to see Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt.

Government Spokesman Kurt Becker today stated that this wish was expressed during a telephone conversation between Reagan and Schmidt last night after the chancellor had returned from Frankfurt. At the same time, Reagan underlined positive hopes for good cooperation between Bonn and Washington.

Becker said that Schmidt congratulated the new American president on the freeing of the Tehran hostages. The chancellor also expressed thanks for the many Washington indications stressing the intention of continuing close cooperation with Bonn. Becker said that the telephone conversation between the federal chancellor and the President had not been a proper factual discussion. Problems of the current world economic situation had, however, been discussed. Reagan indicated that he first wanted to "settle in".

PAPER SEES FRICTIONS IN FUTURE U.S. RELATIONS

[Commentary signed Jr.: "Not in the Trenches"]

[Text] The times are past when Chancellor Schmidt believed that Bonn's mediation was required to induce the Americans and Russians to resume their joint talks. On the contrary, it looks as though Ronald Reagan's team is irked by Bonn's contacts with the countries of the East bloc. But this, like everything in the United States, may change quickly. Security adviser Brzezinski, who is leaving the White House with Jimmy Carter, within a time period of few years encouraged the Federal Republic to "build bridges" to the East and then criticized its "self-Finlandization."

If Reagan's security adviser Richard Allen now suspects the Federal Republic, in contrast, of gazing too much toward the East, then the Americans are either not yet rid of the "Rapallo Complex" or else the policy here proceeds along the lines of the Latin maxim of quod licet iovi, non licet bovi [what the master is allowed to do, the servant is not]. This is why Allen also included in his complaint about Bonn the admission that Washington's bilateral relations with Moscow have not always been determined by considerations for the allies. It was especially the Republican team of Nixon-Kissinger which at times lost sight of the allies but proclaimed a "Year of Europe" as a compensation.

Specifically, the Americans seem to be afraid that the planned expansion of the purchase of Soviet natural gas by the Federal Republic might plunge the latter into an alarming dependency on Moscow. The anxieties of the new president, whenever he thinks about Germany, surely do not end at that point. Yet how should we explain the fact that Allen intends to make Bonn's relations with Moscow a matter of the alliance, subject to approval, as it were? Allen says that the Federal Republic is a country on the frontline, simply to justify this special treatment. But thank God we do not feel like we are in the trenches, nor can we see why we deserve Allen's distrust.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE QUESTIONS REAGAN APPROACH

[Commentary signed R.H.: "Differences"]

[Text] The Iranians ended the hostage affair in the brief period of the few hours between the outgoing and incoming presidents so that neither Carter nor Reagan would have an opportunity to enjoy even a modest triumph. At the beginning of the new presidency, the United States--the "decadent imperialism"--as Fidel Castro said yesterday, was reminded once again that it can be maliciously manipulated from outside, even if only the sentimental needs of the nation are involved. That is the starting point of Reagan's presidency for the next 4 years--something not to be forgotten. Expectations and later experience will have to bear that in mind.

Moscow has already reacted. While Fidel Castro warns against the peace-endangering new Washington government, Brezhnev lets him act more papal than the pope: Moscow sent polite congratulations, trying to cover up its evil action in the hostage affair in past days and to make a good impression. As demonstrated by a theoretical article by Gromyko, Moscow plans to remain tough while making the Western world softer through alleged readiness to negotiate. So the attempt by the federal U.S. secretary of state as being somewhat conciliatory, a conciliation we fail to see, does not contribute to finding the truth.

No capitulation just for the sake of peace; that is a tough word from Haig and Reagan. The West's internal quarrel is a problem of interpretation; how is Soviet superiority in the long run, just the old Russian striving for "overinsurance," ridiculed by the West, or is it the barely concealed striving for world domination? The Reagan government seems to take a different view of this than former American governments. Carter pursued a policy of good will. The elites behind Reagan want a policy of good will together with having good capabilities. That does not mean being against SALT and other ways of finding peace. But the starting point ought to be different.

DIPLOMAT REVEALS INVOLVEMENT IN HOSTAGE CRISIS

[Text] Hamburg, 22 Jan (DPA)--The former German ambassador to Iran, Gerhard Ritzel, has confirmed his and the Federal Republic's involvement in efforts to find a solution to the hostage drama in Iran. In an interview with DPA, Ritzel said in Hamburg on Thursday evening that he, in Vienna on 17 May 1980, together with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, had discussed with the then American Secretary of State Edmund Muskie possibilities of how the Federal Republic could help solve the drama.

Ritzel said his objective had been to keep the discussion going concerning a solution to the hostages problem following the abortive American rescue attempt in April of last year. Without giving further details, the ambassador, who will be FRD ambassador in Copenhagen as of 11 February, said that "once the affair looked like it was going nowhere, we held talks." Ritzel refused to say with whom, how often and where these talks were held. "Ask Mr Genscher. He has the details."

Ambassador Ritzel had had frequent and intensive talks with Sadeq Tabataba'i during April and September of last year. This associate of Ayatollah Khomeyni was acting as deputy prime minister under the then Prime Minister Mehdi Bazargan. Following Bazargan's overthrow in connection with the hostage taking, Tabataba'i was supervisor of the prime minister's office where he had no clearly defined duties. He has faded into the background since October.

Gerhard Ritzel spoke about his experiences as ambassador to Iran to the Hamburg Overseas Club on Thursday evening.

GENSCHER SPEAKS AT LUNCHEON FOR OUTGOING U.S. ENVOY

[Excerpts] Bonn, 22 Jan (DPA)--According to Federal Foreign Minister Genscher the friendship between the United States and the Federal Republic is a "central relationship" in the relations between Europe and the United States.

Speaking at a farewell luncheon for outgoing U.S. Ambassador Walter Stoessel in Bonn today, Genscher stressed that President Reagan and his government can count on Bonn. In the present situation, which is characterized by alarming changes and many sources of tension in all parts of the world, "comprehensive mutual consultations among friends" are particularly import, Genscher said.

Earlier today, Federal President Carstens presented Stoessel with the Grand Cross of the Order of Merit of the Federal Republic. Afterwards, Stoessel was received by Chancellor Schmidt.

Replying to Genscher's toast, Stoessel said that Genscher is probably the busiest foreign minister he has ever seen. "You are a tough man for any ambassador who wishes to keep up with you." Stoessel thanked the federal foreign minister for the important part he played in strengthening German-U.S. relations. He added that Secretary of State Haig understands and acknowledges European realities.

FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON VISIT TO ITALY

[Text] Bonn, 22 Jan (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher is confident that fresh stimuli to the European Community will emerge from his political talks in Rome. Genscher said today in a Deutschlandfunk interview that his visit shows that there exists in Italy the desire to make energetic efforts for European unity. At all his talks he heard that Rome is determined to give vigorous support to his proposals for a European union because it is felt that the time has come for a fresh step forward in Europe.

Genscher stressed that he is convinced the states of the European Community are at a crossroads. They have to decide whether they want to limit themselves to being repair work for what has been achieved or a "European building site helping to develop Europe internally and externally, bringing it closer together, consolidating it and giving substance to European policy."

Genscher said that German-Italian cooperation is very close, very friendly and very trusting. Italy is one of the states which knows its duties toward common security and sees the importance of cooperation between the Europeans and the United States as an important and indispensable factor of its foreign and security policy. It is on precisely this point that the Federal Republic and Italy agree so closely.

SCHMIDT HOLDS TALKS WITH ZAIRIAN PRIME MINISTER

[Text] Bonn, 22 Jan (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt received in Bonn today for an exchange of views lasting 1 and 1/2 hours the first state commissioner of Zaire, Nguza Karl-i-Bond, who is on a private visit to the Federal Republic. A government spokesman stated that talks centered on questions of the economic stabilization program for Zaire and of political developments in Africa, above all with regard to the situation in the south of the continent as well as the Libyan intervention in Chad.

Schmidt stressed the importance of developments in Africa for the continent, for Europe and for world political balance. The chancellor also declared that the African partners could continue to rely on the German policy of partnerly cooperation.

The Zairian first state commissioner expressed thanks for the German contribution to the international efforts for economic stabilization in Zaire and paid tribute to German policy in Africa, particularly with regard to the efforts to solve the Namibia problem.

SPD'S VOGEL ALLEGEDLY TO REPLACE SCHMIDT IN 1983

DW221321 Bonn DIE WELT in German 22 Jan 81 p 6

[Report signed W.H.-E.: "Chancellor for Limited Period?"]

[Text] There is news that urgently needs to be denied--for better or for worse. It has nothing to do with the truth contained in it. We published such news today on our front page.

The core of the news is that Hans-Jochen Vogel has the agreement of leading SPD politicians and also of Helmut Schmidt to take over the position of federal chancellor in 1983. As we know, the next Bundestag elections will be in 1984.

We published this news because it contains a statement of highest public interest, and because an FDP politician is the source whose solidity, seriousness and respectability are not called into question by anybody. Hermann Oxfort is a qualified source, even if one must assume that he is pursuing his political aims in the current Berlin situation. Oxfort says he has received information from SPD headquarters without giving the name of his informant. We can assume that as an experienced politician he can assess the reliability of his informant and that he would not publicly voice news of such importance if he did not consider it reliable.

Oxfort also stated that he passed this information in the form of a question on Tuesday night to Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the FDP chairman and vice chancellor. That was done in the presence of more than 20 FDP politicians.

Genscher must have given some thought to whether Oxfort's question might not become known. Nothing has been heard between Tuesday night and Wednesday afternoon as to whether Genscher had done anything to take the explosiveness out of this news. He could have said on a proper occasion that he had called the chancellor and that all this was just rumors and nonsense.

So the public has to deal seriously with the problem of whether the SPD top echelon has decided that Helmut Schmidt will give up his chancellorship as early as 1983. Are we being ruled by a chancellor for a limited period?

The public also has to deal with the problem of who in the SPD headquarters was interested in passing this news to Oxfort, of all persons, of whom everybody knows that as an FDP politician he doesn't think much of the Berlin Social-Liberal coalition. What were the motives of Oxfort's informant? He must have known that his statement would bring Helmut Schmidt into a very precarious situation. He must also have known that it would be harmful to Vogel's candidacy in Berlin if the people of Berlin were to hear that the import with the big name simply planned to use them as a springboard.

FORMER JUSTICE MINISTER ELECTED BERLIN MAYOR

LD231316 Hamburg DPA in German 1232 GMT 23 Jan 81

[Text] Berlin, 23 Jan (DPA)--The former federal minister of justice, Hans-Jochen Vogel, SPD, was elected by the Berlin House of Representatives today as the new governing mayor of Berlin.

The voting was 73 deputies for and 60 against. There were two abstensions. Vogel accepted his election.

FOREIGN MINISTER DISCUSSES ARMS EXPORTS POLICY

DW191504 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1810 GMT 18 Jan 81

[Reporter Hans-Joachim Reiche interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Minister, Saudi Arabia's desire for German arms is obvious, although no official request was made. How long can we still delay a decision without jeopardizing our relations with Saudi Arabia, relations pertaining to security as well as to economic policy aspects?

[Answer] Mr Reiche, the current discussion deals mainly with Saudi Arabian requests. In fact, however, it ought to be a basic discussion of our arms exports policy. The arms export policy of the Federal Republic of Germany always has been restrictive. It has stood its test and this reservation also should prevail in the future. It is, therefore, only a matter of the criteria according to which future arms exports should be authorized. One must firmly state that arms exports policy must never become a means of employment policy. It must never happen that arms capacities will be established which then will demand orders, forcing German foreign policy to obtain these orders.

It must be vice versa. Arms exports policy can be an instrument of our energy policy interests. In the framework of the basic discussion I have mentioned, we must discuss the usefulness of the term tension area. I think that nothing much will come of it. It can well be that in a tension area a country's ability to defend itself may well contribute to stabilization, while the preponderance of one side will have a destabilizing effect.

We must realize by the way, that in view of the Soviet Union's world struggle for power, there are worldwide tensions. As far as German arms export policy is involved. I may add that the special significance of Israel's security interests and our historical responsibility vis-a-vis the Jewish people must be considered in connection with supplies to the Middle East.

[Question] Do you take a similar approach to Chile's request for submarines and Saudi Arabia's for tanks?

[Answer] These are two basically different cases. In the case of Chile, the Federal Security Council made a decision half a year ago, considering very carefully all the points of view that have come up in the current discussion. In the end, it was decided that a dictatorial regime cannot use submarines in support of its own citizens.

[Question] So the matter has been settled for good and will not come up again?

[Answer] Another side may bring it up for discussion. I consider it settled.

[Question] Some days ago, Mr Minister, you demanded an initiative for the promotion and development of the European union, also for a European foreign policy. Could this problem probably be better solved in the greater framework of Europe?

[Answer] Most certainly. But that would be a long-term perspective. Decisions now pending must be decided in the foreseeable future. One thing is important though: All decisions made by us in this framework must be made a part of an overall Western conception. In other words, they must be coordinated with our allies.

[Question] Our policy is dominated by the terms safeguarding peace and peace policy. Are arms supplies to other countries outside NATO's sphere compatible with our policy's general line.

[Answer] If such arms supplies were to contribute to an increase of tensions, they certainly would not promote peace the way we understand peace. But if they contribute to the creation of an equilibrium, even in places where one side is predominant, it would give the other side at least the ability to defend itself and thus have a stabilizing effect. it can therefore very well be part of our peace policy. That has been the case so far.

As a whole, one must say that we wish that all nations would maintain a reserved armament policy as we did in the past and as we will in the future. The aim of our initiative in the United Nations is to achieve this goal, namely, to have an arms export register as the beginning of a worldwide policy of restraint vis-a-vis arms exports. The states of the Third World do not need guns but schools, hospitals and tractors.

SPD'S BAHR COMMENTS ON ARMS SALES TO SAUDI ARABIA

DW191505 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1810 GMT 18 Jan 81

[Reporter Udo Philipp interview with SPD federal manager Egon Bahr; place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Bahr, you have become the successor of Bruno Friedrich, who is in Strasbourg now, within the SPD work group on arms exports. It seems to me that the problem of arms exports is viewed more pragmatically by the European Parliament which has pointed first of all to Europe's own interest in the context of security and oil supplies from Saudi Arabia. Shouldn't the Federal Republic, too, emphasize its national interest rather than the term area of tension?

[Answer] The Europeans have an easier job in this respect, because they are independent and start at zero. For that matter, as you know, the Federal Government has set itself very firm rules. I proceed from the consideration that if we were to supply weapons to Saudi Arabia or other countries we will have to be prepared to review the criteria we have given ourselves.

[Question] But is your party prepared to do that, Mr Bahr?

[Answer] My party has always been prepared to reconsider former resolutions in the light of changing circumstances. But we have to do it comprehensively, we must not confine it to one country. In addition, we must not accept pressure or deadlines. This is not the case anyway. I assume that the SPD will study the arguments the Federal Government has to advance. There are indeed very serious arguments in this respect. Then we will have to find out ...

[Question] Arguments for supplies?

[Answer] Naturally there are arguments for supplies, that just cannot be denied.

[Question] But there might also be arguments against.

[Answer] There also are arguments against. There are arguments for and against supplies. In my view the real discussion has not even started. We must and will not dodge such a discussion. Following that we will see whether it is right to confirm or change the existing rules.

[Question] To what extent do we have to consider the problem of jobs in the civilian sector in this discussion, given the fact that many states, particularly those of the Third World, want to have both arms and civilian goods, making the one dependent on the other?

[Answer] I hold the view that jobs and the safeguarding of jobs naturally must be considered in the debate which should also state the importance they have in this respect. I think they should not be the only and decisive factor, because if this were the case the result would be that whenever we get an order we will accept it in the interest of jobs. So this shows that jobs are an important but not decisive factor.

CDU/CSU CHAIRMAN INTERVIEWED ON ARMS EXPORTS

DW191340 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1810 GMT 18 Jan 81

[Reporter Udo Philipp interview with Manfred Woerner, deputy CDU/CSU faction chairman in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Dr Woerner, how far does the Federal Republic run the risk of becoming one of the world's biggest arms exporters if arms exports should be liberalized and extended. The demand is great. How risky is it to get into a political bind?

[Answer] No sensible person, at least not in the CDU/CSU, considers making the Federal Republic of Germany an arms forge. It was our intention to have a very modest arms industry with regard to its size and production volume. We do not want to extend capacities. We certainly will not give up our arms policy restrictions. The government must be in control of arms exports and it must decide according to national interests whether or how much can be exported. One must, however, act more flexibly than before. The government is not credible at all with regard to its arms policy. It says one thing and does the other.

[Question] Industrial tank production capacities are not filled, for example, could a customer, such as Saudi Arabia, profit from this situation?

[Answer] We have not yet been informed by the government. I cannot argue for or against the deal as long as I do not know about details. Two things are certain, however. Prior to doing anything like that, we must talk to the Americans and the alliance and coordinate it with them. And then one must bear in mind the vital interests of Israel.

[Question] Aside from the necessity of maintaining a national arms industry in connection with the defense of the country, what benefit could one derive from more liberal arms exports with regard to jobs and the Bundeswehr? A higher production quota of arms would cut costs. That would be interesting in connection with the budget debate in these days as well as with the Bundeswehr problems in paying for its arms.

[Answer] I said it already that we were well advised to have a modest arms industry. I would personally advise against an unlimited expansion of capacities. I would not like to see the German foreign minister playing the role of an arms dealer. I would not like to become dependent on the arms industry either. We need an arms industry. Nobody should discredit that morally. Those in favor of defense also need military equipment. One must stick with that. The people working there have the right to be respected. But we ought to keep armament in such a way that it does not create problems for us; we must always give priority to national interests.

[Question] Tension area was a term slowing down arms exports. Is that still a useful term or must this term be reconsidered and newly defined?

[Answer] I believe that we cannot work at all with that term any more. That is clearly demonstrated by the practice of the government. Is it not? The government is completely losing its credibility. In one case, it says the country is a tension area and then it is suddenly no tension area any more, so that arms can be supplied. The term tension area is not good any more. I would give it up. We must tailor our arms export policy by our national interests, that is by our foreign political, security political and economic political interests in this world.

FINANCE MINISTER MATTHOEFER GIVES BUDGET SPEECH

[Text] Bonn, 23 Jan (DPA)--According to Federal Finance Minister Matthoefer, citizens of the Federal Republic will have to get used to the idea that "for the foreseeable future there can be no automatic guarantee" of a further growth of income or a return to lasting full employment.

In his budget speech to the lower house today, Matthoefer spoke of changes in the world economy and the Federal Republic's dependence on these changes. Without mentioning figures he confirmed that the Federal Republic in its annual economic report next week will proceed from downward-adjusted estimates of growth and employment, and from higher price increases.

At the same time, the finance minister emphasized the resolve of the coalition parties in their social policy to adhere to their determination "to safeguard social security and justice as cornerstones of stability, efficiency and social peace."

The federal budget estimates for 1981 provide for expenditures totalling DM224.6 billion and a rate of increase of 4.1 percent. Compared with 1980, balancing expenditures will require new borrowing of DM27.44 billion.

In his budget speech, Matthoefer also defended the bills raising taxes on oil and spirits and reducing subsidies.

A 4-day debate on estimates will begin next Tuesday. The CDU/CSU opposition intends to launch a general debate on all aspects of the SPD-FDP government's policy from the first reading.

FOREIGN MINISTRY WELCOMES DIPLOMATS' RELEASE

LD221351 Paris LE MONDE in French 22 Jan 81 p 7

[M.D. report: "Mr Carter Anxious for Giscard d'Estaing To Be 'One of the First To Be Thanked'"]

[Excerpt] The Quai d'Orsay published the following communique on Tuesday:

"France welcomes the release of the U.S. Embassy diplomats from Iran, which finally ends a situation which was as painful on the human level as it was contrary to the principles of international law and the rules which govern relations among states. It pays tribute to the role played by Algeria in negotiating this agreement.

"The settlement of this affair will favor the resumption of normal relations between Iran and the international community. France, for its part, is prepared, as it always has stated, to have relations with Iran in keeping with the two countries' interests.

"This ordeal also demonstrates the need for the international community to take the most rapid and energetic steps to ensure respect for the rules of law and to prevent the repetition of an unacceptable situation."

FRANCE-SOIR EDITORIAL DISCUSSES HOSTAGE CRISIS

LD221409 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 22 Jan 81 pp 1-2

[Benoit Rayski editorial: "Crime and Punishment"]

[Text] Ronald Reagan yesterday officially assumed responsibility for the U.S. destiny and chance, or Khomeyni, ordained that his inauguration should take place at the very moment when the 52 American hostages in Tehran, who were released after 444 days in captivity, were at last flying to freedom....

So the last thing his predecessor Jimmy Carter did apparently was to bring to an end a drama which had paralyzed the United States for more than 1 year, making it sway between impotence in the face of blackmail and a desire for revenge, between an inclination to erase the humiliation to which it had been subjected and the determination to save at all costs 52 human lives.

End of the affair? Everything would suggest this--Reagan's joy, Carter's relief and the conviction that the United States has lost nothing as a result of this affair since in exchange for the hostages it has merely handed back to Iran its assets which had been frozen in American banks as a reprisal.

Therefore, according to this line of reasoning, the view should be taken that it is advisable to let bygones by bygones in the name of political realism since everything seems to have ended with a U.S.-Iranian draw or even with a relatively fair and honest bargain. Nonsense...

How can it be forgotten that only a few days ago Ronald Reagan, and we agreed with him, called the Iranian leaders "barbarians, criminals and kidnappers?" How, in fact, can it be forgotten that for more than 14 months Iran, unprecedently in history, elevated terrorism to the level of state religion and transformed the seizure of hostages into a method of government? And, finally, how can it be overlooked that, unless it is punished, the Iranian blackmail could well serve as an example and find imitators at a time when victory over the American "grand satan" is noisily being celebrated in Tehran to ensure that the entire world hears of this event?

This is why it would be inconceivable, immoral and dangerous if the Iranian leaders were to emerge unscathed, unpunished and unchastised from this sad business. And this is why it seems to us that the new American president will be unable to close the hostages file without ensuring that those people in Tehran who have defied international laws and humiliated the United States learn in one way or another that crime does not pay.

Yesterday in his inauguration speech, Ronald Reagan forcefully affirmed that America will not yield to those who practice terrorism and that it will fight against "enemies of freedom" everywhere. This is a first signal and already a warning.

LE MONDE COMMENTS ON REAGAN INAUGURAL ADDRESS

[Editorial: "Patriotic Renewal"]

[Text] A new president's inaugural address is more than just a speech to mark an occasion. It is both a declaration of intention and a sermon which, following in the wake of the speech delivered by George Washington in New York on 30 April 1789, is destined to take its place in the collection of inaugural speeches piously published every 4 years by the U.S. equivalent of the state press.

The first subject discussed by Mr Reagan was the economic situation. He attacked the ease with which his predecessors built up "deficit upon deficit" without, however, pledging to restore the budgetary balance by a given date. He remained faithful to the eloquence shown throughout his election campaign and on this occasion adopted the anti-state tone which ran through his whole performance. The main aim is to reduce the "size and influence" of the government apparatus, to reverse the trend toward increasing federal power which, according to him, now exceeds the mandate given by the governed, while curbing the authority kep by the states of the union. "We are a nation which has a government and not the reverse," Mr Reagan said. In his view, U.S. greatness lies not in the federal government's achievements, which he did not even mention, but in the specifically American ability to release and to use individuals' energy to the maximum.

Hailing the "new beginning" which his entry into office constitutes, Mr Reagan called on his compatriots to join him in entering an "era of national renewal" and to indulge in "heroic dreams." However, in his view, the heroes are to be found everywhere that the citizens of a "blessed country" are active in the awareness of their duty. In this connection, the president was anxious to include in his speech a few lines about the hand which his administration will hold out to those who might experience the misfortunes of virtue [infortunes de la vertu] or the pain of illness, while specifying that the aim of that aid will be to put them in a position to meet their own needs. However, the essential aim is to awaken the "industrial giant," to put government back in the place it should occupy--it being understood that this place is not necessarily the leading one--and to reduce a tax burden regarded as "punitive."

Overseas, the United States is to once again become "an example of freedom and a beacon of hope" for all those who do not have freedom. Toward its allies, it will return "loyalty for loyalty;" toward its potential enemies, it will spare no effort to safe-guard peace save at the price of capitulation. The United States will experience no more "weakness," where action is needed it will act, supported by the courage and will of free men and women, the moral weapon which its adversaries lack.

Despite its many references to the "special destiny" of the United States, regarded as a unique case in mankind's moral history, Mr Reagan's speech succeeded in avoiding the trap of grandioloquence.

Similarly, you would look in vain for any sign of extremism. The new president certainly intends to take the middle road which does not prevent him from preaching a kind of patriotic confidence in his compatriots' ability, because they are Americans, to turn the tide and effect the recovery which he is calling on them to make. His audience, tens of millions of them, must have understood that the "change" which they mandated the Republican candidate to make by their votes on 4 November will be carried out without weakness but also without upheaval.

GISCARD, MITTERRAND MEET WITH ISRAEL'S PERES

LD221336 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 22 Jan 81

[Text] Shim'on Peres, leader of the opposition in Israel, is in Paris. Since Mr Begin's disappointments of the last few weeks, since it is known that the present government is living on borrowed time until the coming elections in June, Shim'on Peres is a potential Israeli prime minister. Therefore, he has undertaken a very diplomatic tour of Europe, stopping in Great Britain and France.

He met Francois Mitterrand this morning and President Giscard d'Estaing a little later. The future Israeli number one is indeed a fervent supporter of the dialogue with Europe even if there are still fairly marked differences between Paris, for example, and Jerusalem,

[Begin Peres recording] We all seek peace but there are, however, differences between the Israeli position and the French position. This is normal. I have never forgotten the friendly role which France played in Israel's history. I greatly hope that once more at the right moment we shall continue these friendly relations between our two countries. I am convinced that [passage indistinct]. I believe that the true solution is a Jordanian-Palestinian one, whereby the Palestinian problems are solved. [end recording]

This was Shim'on Peres speaking to Bertrand Vanier after leaving the Elysee Palace.

OPINION POLL SHOWS ELECTION VICTORY FOR GISCARD

NC222107 Paris AFP in English 2052 GMT 22 Jan 81

[Text] Paris, 22 Jan (AFP)--An opinion poll published today on voter preferences in next May's French presidential elections appear to indicate a victory for Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

According to the poll, commissioned by the newspaper LE QUOTIDIEN, Mr Giscard d'Estaing would receive a minimum 26 per cent of the vote in the first round of the election against a maximum of 25 per cent for his main challenger, the Socialists' Francois Mitterrand. In the ensuing runoff, Mr Giscard d'Estaing would carry the day with 52 per cent of votes against 48 for Mr Mitterrand. Three weeks ago, a similar poll published in the same newspaper, whose politics are middle-of-the-road, indicated a narrow victory for Mr Mitterrand.

The latest poll, which based its findings on the answers from only 1,051 persons but who were described as representative of the nation, indicated a first-round voter preference of between 8 and 10 per cent for comedian Coluche, who put up his "up yours" candidacy to mock the professional politicians.

GISCARD BEGINS OFFICIAL VISIT TO ROME 22 JAN

[Text] Rome, 22 Jan (ANSA)--French head-of-state Valery Giscard d'Estaing begins his official visit to Rome today. The trip was originally scheduled for the end of last year but was put off after a killer quake struck Italy on November 24.

Giscard will meet with Italian head-of-state Sandro Pertini, Premier Arnaldo Forlani and Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo. He will also be received by Pope John Paul II in Vatican City.

Giscard's political talks will pivot around international themes such as Reagan's inauguration, the release of American hostages, the resumption in Madrid of the European Security and Cooperation Conference, and EEC prospects now that Greece is a member of the Common Market. Also up for discussion will be the situation in Chad, which threatens to directly involve France as the Paris government is determined to counter Libyan Leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi's influence in the region.

Another topic will undoubtedly be the EEC's peace initiative for the Mideast and the mission EEC duty chairman Albert van der Klaauw will make to Mideast capitals. The main difference between Van de Klaauw's forthcoming mission and Luxembourg Foreign Minister Gaston Thorn's 1980 probe is that the present EEC council chairman will be looking for a meeting ground between the conflicting parties while Thorn sounded out prospects of promoting a European peace process.

Meetings, Official Dinner

[Text] Rome, 23 Jan (ANSA)--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing meets again here today with Italian Premier Arnaldo Forlani, this time for talks about the European Economic Community (EEC). The visiting French statesman had a forty minute meeting with the Italian Government leader shortly after his arrival in Rome last night. The meeting was held before an official dinner arranged in the guest's honor at Villa Madama, the premier's quarters for ceremonial affairs.

Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and former Premier Francesco Cossiga attended the dinner. French diplomatic chief Jean Francois-Poncet arrived in the Italian capital later in the night.

The Giscard-Forlani meeting last night was devoted to the economic, social and political problems of France and Italy and of the Mediterranean area in general. Other points which came up in their talks were European development, the January 1 entrance of Greece into the European Economic Community and the European-Arab dialogue.

Francois-Poncet and Colombo will be attending their second meeting in Rome today. Giscard will be received later in the day by Italian chief-of-state Sandro Pertini before paying a visit to the Vatican for an audience with Pope John Paul II.

Interview in Genoa

AU230856 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 23 Jan 81

[Text] Genoa, 23 Jan (ANSA)--Visiting President Valery Giscard d'Estaing has voiced the hope that Italian and French agriculture authorities see eye to eye on farm issues in the Common Market. Giscard gave a rundown of the issues up for discussion with Italian President Sandro Pertini in an interview recorded with "Radio Montecarlo-Italy" in Genoa Thursday.

One of these issues, he said, included European problems, "and of all countries in the European Community, Italy is the one with which we have the greatest natural affinity."

"We are closer, we understand each other easily," he commented.

His hopes for "excellent cooperation" between Italy's and France's agriculture ministers were expressed in connection with his assessment of Greece's entry into the European Economic Community (EEC).

"We are favorable to Greece's entrance into the Common Market," Giscard declared, explaining that Greece is part of Europe for "historical reasons" and her entry into the organization was a way of "consolidating that country's return to democracy.

The French president noted that the negotiations which preceded Greece's entrance were carried out with great care. "Therefore," he commented, "I don't think there will be any serious problems for our Mediterranean agricultures."

Another topic up for discussion in Rome, Giscard said, was the new administration in Washington.

The new American president has announced a new foreign policy "and we have to assess it, we have to figure out how Europe will react to this new approach," Giscard said.

Asked about terrorism, the French president said he had followed recent events in Italy with "apprehension" and was glad about the recent release of Giovanni D'Urso, the Rome magistrate freed by Red Brigades kidnapped after the thirty-four days of captivity.

Giscard continued: "You know that Italy and France cooperate very closely in their fight against terrorism, a cooperation which works directly between our countries as well as with other states.

"As far as extradition practices are concerned, French courts have handed down rulings, on the basis of documents supplied by Italian justice, which have never been criticized....

"In the past ten years, many important arrests of people implicated in Italian terrorism have been made in France and many of them have been subject to extradition".

Turning to the audience he will be having with Pope John Paul II, Giscard said he attached "great importance" to the meeting, in which French-Vatican relations as well as world peace and events in Poland will be discussed. The pope, Giscard went on, is very sensitive to the situation in Poland because of his origins and his "high spiritual responsibilities." He also knows, the French leader added, that Poland and France have historical bonds and that "we pay close attention to events in Poland."

"That is why I'll be glad to swap impressions with the pope about developments in Poland and about what can be done to help those developments continue to be peaceful", Giscard concluded.

PINTO BALSEMAO PRESENTS PROGRAM TO ASSEMBLY

LD230 51 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 17 Jan 81 pp 3, 6

[Excerpts] "The president of the republic certainly will not dissolve the Assembly of the Republic for reasons which do not originate in it, because such an action would negate essential principles of representative democracy and end up by handing over power in fact to parties or pressure groups," the prime minister stated yesterday, presenting in the Assembly of the Republic his government's 4-year program. Adding that such a dissolution "would lead logically to arbitrariness, and possibly to violence and the beginning of the end of freedom," Pinto Balsemao emphasized that "both government and opposition received their mandates directly and lawfully in a free election, and it rests with both of them to perform their duty and their role," and he announced immediately the submitting to parliament of a confidence motion which will mark the climax of the voting on the program.

In his very first words, the prime minister stressed that, nevertheless, "the government will not confine itself to cooperating with the majority. The respect which an assembly directly and freely elected by the people deserves on our part leads us to esteem highly the opposition's role. We do not expect agreement from it, of course, but serious and constructive criticism, without which democracy does not materialize. We hope especially--and indeed during the debate on this program--that the opposition, in appraising our proposals, will put forward the essential alternatives to make the debate serve a useful purpose. It would be failing in its most elementary democratic duties if it viewed parliament as merely or especially as a means of agitation and of indiscriminately attacking the government."

"There are very real problems that the government program tackles and to which it indicates solutions. The Portuguese people would certainly not understand, if instead of a serious analysis of the possibilities and means for improving their living conditions, the following debate were to give rise to sterile controversies, prompted by mere party expediency. This is not what is expected of us by the country, to which we are all responsible."

Continuing, and proceeding to speak specifically of the revision of the constitution, the prime minister stated: "The revision of the constitution is a task of the present legislative term. It is a task which is decisive for the country's future, in which the government will not interfere but which it will follow closely. It is necessary to expunge from the constitution everything in it that is an obstacle to the full democratization of the institutions. As the nation's basic law and not a banner of some people against others, the constitution should enshrine a national consensus on the essential values and on the basic functioning of the democratic machinery, instead of imposing, as is now the case, a blueprint of economic and social organization. Only in this way will it be possible to fully carry out the task which the government sets itself of liberating civil society from the state's improper tutelage."

"It is above all the state itself which will emerge strengthened through this liberation, because wholesale collectivization and intervention by a state which is unable to restrict itself ultimately mean weakness and foreshadow violence: citizens cease to recognize in the state a source of security and protection against arbitrariness. That is, the state ceases to perform its duties. Hence it is not amazing that in this country the excessive advance of collectivization has been accompanied by an undeniable flourishing of phenomena of wildcat capitalism. Unlawful transactions, fraud and tax evasion and failure to make social security payments have been, among many others, manifestations which accompanied uncontrolled nationalization.

"For this reason, the struggle against the bureaucratization of society is at the same time a struggle for the real strengthening of the state."

Central Administration

"In our opinion," Pinto Balsemao continued, "strengthening the democratic state's authority and promoting the conditions for the independence of civil society are two sides of the same coin. It is thus important that the regional and local authorities should shoulder increasing responsibilities, specifically in the field of investments."

"The fact that these authorities will begin to have increased financial resources at their disposal should be watched, as will be understood, by a gradual assumption of functions which have rested with the central administration. And with the necessary transference of functions, we must in due course consider the transference of officials, without prejudice to their respective rights and careers. A strong state is a decentralized state. The experience, already so rich, of the regional autonomies of the Madeira and Azores archipelagoes will thus be continued and deepened. The nation will gain in strength without losing anything in unity. In addition, the strengthening of local government will also constitute a dominant concern. Excessive centralization--which has, unfortunately, very old traditions in this country--stifles local capacities for intiative and makes citizens lose interest in the problems which concern them most directly. In other words, it is the country's development and democracy which continue to lose."

Entry Into EEC

In the prime minister's opinion, "Portugal's coming entry into the European Communities, wich will take place during the period of the present legislative term, represents a political event of prime importance, over and above all the most important economic and social consequences."

"Let it be noted that entry into the Common Market was an unfeasible hypothesis, both under the autocratic regime prior to 25 April [1974] and during the revolutionary period, when opposing forms of totalitarianism threatened us."

He continued: "However, entering the Common Market should not be viewed as if it were a matter of a mere prize for democratic good behavior. Portuguese democrats' satisfaction at the fact that the political conditions essential for belonging to the EEC have been fulfilled is natural and justified. But entering Europe is not a prize: it is a challenge. It is a challenge because entry into the EEC will only be a success for us if we are able to thoroughly reform outlooks, structures and working methods. Thus the prospect of our entry, over and above the complex diplomatic problem of the negotiations in Brussels, poses a whole series of requirements of urgent reform of Portuguese economic and social life. Let us say that our attainment of modernity now depends on Europe.

"And if we can expect encouragement and assistance from the European Communities--as is demonstrated, for instance, by the so-called joint actions program, which was recently approved--it is essentially from ourselves that the effort must come. Will it be worth while to make it? In light of the foreseeable difficulties--ranging from the modernization of agriculture to the administrative reform--there are perhaps those who find it more comfortable to continue to live as formerly. Except that those who think in this way do not realize that this is not possible. A small country like Portugal, if it does not wish--and it does not wish--to head toward a colletivization which will close it to the outside world, must live increasingly within the major international currents of goods, capital, technology and people. A democracy in Portugal necessarily implies a system open to the outside world."

National Defense

After citing priority tasks to be performed by the government in the field of foreign policy--the conclusion of our negotiations on our entry into the EEC, active loyalty to the Atlantic alliance and the resolution of the problem of east Timor"--Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao expressed satisfaction at the fact that "conditions have at last been created for intensifying relations with the Arab countries," and proceeded to concern himself with national defense policy. And he asserted in this connection that "it is not confined to the military dimension, in aiming at guaranteeing the country's independence, territorial integirty and the collective security of the geopolitical area to which Portugal belongs."

"With the revision of the constitution, the conditions will certainly be created for an integrated organization of national defense, the function of directing and running the armed forces then resting with the government, and this will entail major structural reforms. In the meantime, until the revision of the constitution, we will continue to prepare and study the measures which will prepare for the armed forces' smooth reintegration into the civil power democratically elected by the people.

"Citizens' security--an essential component of freedom--is not promoted, however, merely in the field of defense. In our opinion, this security goes further than even the protection (which we will strengthen) of people against crime and delinquency. Protection of individual privacy and independence, stability in employment, security in sickness and disability, accident prevention at work and on the roads and security in old age are also important.

"Instransigent defense of the state's democratic authority and of the primacy of law constitutes a prime condition for making citizens' security effective. Moreover, we will promote the legislative reforms which are necessary for a more adequate administration of justice. But the social justice to which we will commit ourselves constitutes another basic dimension for establishing an atmosphere of confidence in the future."

Economic Crisis

Turning to the economic crisis at the international and national levels, the prime minister stated: "Young people are today the principal victims of the economic crisis affecting the world. Following a quarter of a century of strong industrial expansion and virtually full employment, the industrialized countries entered in the seventies a period of slow or zero growth, with the simultaneous occurrence of high rates of inflation and unemployment. Although it cannot be regarded as the sole cause responsible for this situation, the dizzying increase in oil prices has greatly contributed to the exacerbation of the difficulties experienced.

"However, the economic crisis is not exclusive to the market economy countries. It is also making itself felt in the East bloc countries. albeit in other ways, although collectivization may temporarily conceal some basic imbalances. But these are beginning to come to the surface--sometimes clearly and violently.

"Successive years of crisis, without prospects of surmounting it in sight, have created a certain skepticism about the economic policies traditionally pursued. Contrary to what happened, for instance, in the case of the great depression of the thirties, the present economic difficulties in the Western countries have not led, however, to relying increasingly on state interventionism. On the contrary, while in the collectivized economies the crisis is one of the factors giving impetus to the movement of liberation from totalitarian forms of state control, the trend in the West has likewise pointed in the direction of the rediscovery of the potential of private enterprise and the market. There is an impression that state intervention sometimes went too far, creating paralyzing bureaucracy, discouraging individual and collective enterprise, breaking the relationship between individual effort and the reward of benefits, and ending up by affecting basic individual and citizens' freedoms.

"In Portugal we are particularly well placed to judge severely the excesses of collectivization, since many were perpetrated during the revolutionary period, and have only been partly corrected since then. For this reason, the government wishes, and will struggle for, the liberation of civil society; that is, for the liberation of the wealth-creating energies which the straitjacket of state interventionism and bureaucracy has prevented from manifesting themselves, with clear harm to the country's development. We reject both the state paternalism prior to 25 April, which benefited only a few people and helped keep private enterprise immature, and the subsequent collectivization. The time has come to encourage, without stifling tutelages and without ambiguities, the manifestation of the Portuguese people's capacity for enterprise and progress."

Containing Inflation

Asserting that "uncontrolled inflation represents the foremost energy of improving the population's purchasing power," the prime minister added: "Thus we will not adopt a stance of complacency toward inflationary strains. Quite the contrary, we will seek to reduce the rate of inflation (which last year remained a little over 17 percent) to the level of 16 percent in 1981, so that at the end of the 4-year period of this legislative term this rate will not exceed the average rate in the EEC countries."

"The essential modernization of our agriculture, the guiding of our industry toward activities capable of competing on the world market, the rationalization of trading channels and the efficiency of the public administration and of services--none of this will be possible without significant progress in the area of productivity, entailing an increasing acceptance of responsibility by everybody in the tasks to which they devote themselves, and not forgetting that the material reward for work must reflect diligence at work. It is through investments capable of ensuring a good rate of productivity that we will be able to increase the rate of expansion of economic activity and thus reduce unemployment. It is a fact that it does not benefit the country to combat unemployment by simultaneously creating underemployment: that is, unproductive jobs for which we will all ultimately end up by paying. That would be to deceive ourselves.

"So we will vigorously combat unemployment, which we deem to be at an intolerable level. But we will do so by seeking to ensure that the jobs to be created represent something solid, helping to increase national wealth."

The prime minister also maintained: "The democratization of the Portuguese people's life requires the existence of public facilities and infrastructures which it is for the state to develop in the fields of housing, health, education, transportation and sport. In view of the curbing of public expenditure, which constitutes and will continue to constitute for many years an imperative for any responsible government, we will seek to find formulas which will make possible, without loss of quality, the financing of new infrastructures and facilifies, while averting an immediate additional burden on the overall state budget.

"Likewise, in the area of labor relations, the government will not forsake its duty to guarantee the conditions for a real defense of the basic rights recognized for workers and employers, without ever losing sight of the community's overall well-being."

Motion of Confidence

Entering the final section of his speech, Pinto Balsemao asserted, repeatedly interrupted by applause from the government majority deputies: "Let no illusions be nurtured about the possibility of deterring or ousting us. There will be no further legislative elections until 1984."

"The president of the republic certainly will not dissolve the Assembly of the Republic for reasons which do not originate in it, because such an action would negate essential principles of representative democracy and end up by handing over power in fact to parties or pressure groups to which the Portuguese people have not entrusted their destiny through the ballot box. Under such circumstances, dissolution would lead logically to arbitrariness, and possibly to violence and the beginning of the end of freedom.

"Moreover, the Democratic Alliance is united and will remain united. Nobody--no member of the government, no deputy, no party leader or member--wishes to assume before the country the terrible historical responsibility of proposing or promoting its division or breakup. So let the opposition not count on our help; and if it really wishes to replace us, let it think instead about winning the votes which it needs in 1984.

"Both government and opposition received their mandates directly and lawfully in free elections, and their role and duty are to carry them out.

"And in order to confirm without room for doubt that this intention is clear and firm, as it should be, the government has decided to ask the Assembly of the Republic to approve a vote of confidence on the policy which it intends to pursue and which is comprised by the program which is now being presented."

PCP SECRETARY GENERAL VIEWS POLITICAL SITUATION

LD201329 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 31 Dec 80 pp 4-5

[Unattributed interview with PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal: "Alvaro Cunhal Answers 43 Questions Put by AVANTE!"--date and place of interview not specified]

[Text] [Question] Christmas and the new year are occurring at the very time of the formation of a new "Democratic Alliance" government. Some comrades assert that for this reason 1980 is ending and 1981 is beginning with another victory for the reactionary forces.

[Answer] The significance of the political situation which we are experiencing cannot be interpreted in this way. The "Democratic Alliance" is in fact forming a government. But what characterizes the end of the year in Portuguese political life is the resounding defeat, through the presidential election, of the "Democratic Alliance's" subversive plan for the elimination of the democratic system.

[Question] A subversive plan involves many actions. How could the presidential election in itself alone have represented the elimination of the "Democratic Alliance's" subversive plan?

[Answer] As the PCP has admitted, the subversive plan was prepared with extreme care, planned in its various stages and implemented by the government and the "Democratic Alliance" majority in the Assembly of the Republic.

The "Democratic Alliance's" brutal and subversive offensive, which was to have culminated in the election of a "Democratic Alliance" president of the republic, the unconstitutional revision of the constitution and the elimination of the democratic system, was developing throughout 1980. Headed by Sa Carneiro and Freitas do Amaral, reaction won position after position. It forced the workers and people's movement and the democratic forces to retreat. It took over the government, the majority in the Assembly of the Republic, the news media and much of the state apparatus. By grossly violating legality and the democratic rules of the electoral process, the "Democratic Alliance" succeeded in confirming its majority and its government in the 5 October election. The subversive plan was approaching its final stage.

It is true that the subversive plan was confronted with more difficulties than Sa Carneiro and Freitas do Amaral were expecting. It was confronted by the new Portuguese reality created by the revolution. It met with the firm resistance of the workers and the people's masses. It was confronted by the functioning of the institutions and the state bodies (the Presidency of the republic, the Council of the Revolution and the courts) which, albeit with hesitations and limitations, impeded the progress of the reactionary plan, but reaction was constantly advancing. The election for the Presidency of the republic took on a decisive nature. The "Democratic Alliance" gambled everything. Victory for Soares Carneiro would have meant the virtual takeover of the whole of power by the "Democratic Alliance," and in that event the unconstitutional revision of the constitution and democratic legality would have been considerably simplified.

[Question] Does this mean that the battle was waged at the extreme limit of democracy's ability to resist?

[Answer] The democratic forces had been yielding position after position, retreating increasingly. At the level of the institutions and the state bodies, the decisive battle was waged almost at the democratic system's last line of defense. In that battle, reaction was defeated. There are many means of struggling. Voting is also a means of struggling. Following a powerful mass movement, the Portuguese people saved democracy with their voting 7 December.

[Question] Is so much importance to be attached to the 7 December presidential election?

[Answer] Yes. We always asserted that the possible election of "Democratic Alliance" candidate General Soares Carneiro would be an imminent danger to Portuguese democracy. Especially after the 5 October election, the fundamental task confronting the democratic forces was to defeat reaction's candidate--General Soares Carneiro. The PCP subordinated the whole of its activity in the presidential election to this central and priority aim.

If the "Democratic Alliance" candidate had won the election, we would now be witnessing a brutal and unbridled wave of persecutions, measures restricting freedoms and repressive actions. Blood would have already flowed. Our people would have already wept many tears. We would be living in a civil war atmosphere, created by fascists and reactionaries of all hues, rendered insolent by the victory in the presidential election.

Soares Carneiro's defeat and Eanes' election spelled defeat for the "Democratic Alliance's" plan and meant the salvation of the democratic system. The day of 7 December constitutes an important milestone in the history of the Portuguese revolution.

[Question] Mario Soares and Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho did not view General Soares' Carneiro's election so pessimistically. Is not the picture which has just been painted too apocalyptic?

[Answer] Mario Soares and Otelo S. Carvalho defined General Eanes as the principal enemy and did everything within their power to ensure Eanes' defeat and to ensure that General Soares Carneiro's election would consequently take place.

How responsible Mario Soares' stance was is made clear by the fact that if the Socialist Party [PS], which Mario Soares sought to win over, had followed its secretary general's stance en masse, it is highly likely that reaction's candidate--General Soares Carneiro--would have been elected and we would already be struggling with difficulty at the beginning of another dictatorship.

Soares Carneiro's defeat and Eanes' election constituted a far-reaching political defeat for Mario Soares and Otelo, who were left completely outside the main current of democratic opinion in Portugal. Unfortunately, it does not seem that either of them is learning from what happened.

[Question] Does General Soares Carneiro's defeat represent a turning point in Portuguese political life?

[Answer] Not a turning point in the government's policy, but certainly a turning point in the specific conditions, in the possibilities of struggle and in the prospects for the immediate future. In fact it represents a turning point in the sense of the trend in the evolution in national political life. Soares Carneiro's election would have paved the way for establishing another dictatorship. Soares Carneiro's defeat and Eanes' election pave the way for consolidating democracy.

[Question] Is it to be expected that the new government will differ clearly from the Sa Caneiro/Freitas do Amaral government?

[Answer] There will undoubtedly be differences. Thus, for instance, the new government will seek for the present to avoid the so-called "guerrilla warfare" against the reelected president of the republic. But it should not be forgotten that the parties comprising the government are the representatives of big capital (associated with imperialism) and the big landowners. There will certainly be changes in the methods. The basic aims will remain the same. There will certainly--at least in the most immediate future--be different tactics. The strategic aims will remain constant.

[Question] Everybody asserts that Pinto Balsemao is very different from Sa Carneiro. Will this not provide guarantees of a democratic policy on the part of the new government?

[Answer] There are undoubtedly different currents and different people in the "Democratic Alliance." Balsemao is not the same as Sa Carneiro. However, it would be pure folly to conclude that Sa Carneiro was the only real reactionary and putschist in the Social Democratic Party [PSD], and that now that Sa Carneiro has gone, those who are left are good democrats. Sa Carneiro was in fact the inspirer of the subversive plan--the leader of the antidemocratic conspiracy. Replacing Sa Carneiro is not easy for reaction. But Balsemao has not fallen now from heaven, innocent and spotless and with a pure soul, uninvolved in the "Democratic Alliance's" subversive plan. Balsemao was Sa Carneiro's minister assistant. He was jointly responsible for the Sa Carneiro-Freitas do Amaral government's policy and activity. He was one of the "Democratic Alliance" leaders.

Moreover, there is no hint as yet of what the fundamental differences between the basic program aspects of the "Democratic Alliance's" policy and those of the future Balsemao government will be. The praise of Balsemao is aimed now at making people forget the "Democratic Alliance's" real aims and real policy. In the final analysis, the whitewashing of Balsemao means the whitewashing of the "Democratic Alliance," which they are seeking to carry out so that the "Democratic Alliance" and its subversive policy can continue after 7 December.

[Question] Isn't that view excessive? Are there not already many signs that the Balsemao government will be more open and dialogue-oriented?

[Answer] What will compel the new "Democratic Alliance" government to adopt a more dialogue-oriented appearance (and it will undoubtedly be compelled to do so) is not any democratic leaning but the burden of the resounding defeat in the presidential election. Under the liberalizing veneer, the "Democratic Alliance's" counterrevolutionary project will persist.

[Question] And in the government's compositions? Are there no changes which make it possible to foresee changes of program and style?

[Answer] Sa Carneiro's disappearance will inevitably bring a change of style. But what can be said about the members of the government? The ministerial portfolios are distributed among the Popular Democratic Party [PPD] [former name of PSD], the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] and the Popular Monarchist Party [PPM] like the proceeds of a robbery among the members of a gang. Reactionaryism, incompetence and favoritism are clearly apparent. And if it is necessary to cite an instance of continuity, then it will not be with Eurico de Melo as minister of the interior--if his appointment is confirmed--that a change in the brutal and repressive methods can be expected.

[Question] Basic changes in the news media were announced immediately after the election. Are those changes to be hoped for?

[Answer] The fascist-oriented director of the Portuguese radio-television system, Proenca de Carvalho, tendered his resignation immediately after Eanes' victory. But he appears to be remaining in office. And it is not sufficient merely for that professional provocateur of the news media to be ousted. It is necessary to end the monopolizing by the "Democratic Alliance" of the state-owned news media and the present poisoning and manipulation of public opinion which reaction is carrying out through them.

The newspapers have just reported that Balsemao will designate the new secretary of state as "chairman of the commission for winding up the state-owned news media." It is a cynical announcement of denationalization. Here is what a "Democratic Alliance" journalist who has become prime minister will be able to do.

[Question] Continuing with the new government's composition, how do you interpret the fact that Freitas do Amaral does not figure in it?

[Answer] The fact that Freitas do Amaral does not figure in the new government is the outcome of the tremendous defeat sustained by the "Democratic Alliance" in the presidential election. Freitas do Amaral was identified with Sa Carneiro in the putschist strategy--in the subversive plan to eliminate the democratic system. Like Sa Carneiro, Freitas do Amaral viewed General Soares Carneiro's election and Eanes' defeat as an essential element of that plan. He gambled everything in the presidential election. Confident of victory, his insolence knew no bounds. The 7 December defeat is the defeat of the Sa Carneiro-Freitas do Amaral strategy. Freitas do Amaral emerged from the election (as would have Sa Carneiro, if he had been alive), even more defeated than Soares Carneiro.

The "Democratic Alliance" had to set aside rapidly--at least, for the present and publicly--its subversive plan. It had to find means of coexisting with the elected president whom it fiercely attacked for over a year, especially during the election period. Freitas do Amaral was the least suitable person for the purpose. Freitas do Amaral had difficulty in understanding the full significance of the defeat sustained by the "Democratic Alliance" 7 December.

Prior to and during the election campaign, he asserted repeatedly that he would not be a member of the government if Eanes were elected. The day following the election, hopeful of succeeding Sa Carneiro, he was already stating that he might revise his decision. Afterward, on leaving Belem Palace, furious and unrestrained, he presented the comic spectacle of speaking in terms of an ultimatum against the president of the republic, as if he, Freitas do Amaral, had been the main victor and Eanes the loser in the presidential election. Freitas do Amaral will have to undergo a careful transformation to adjust himself to post-7 December political life.

[Question] Judging by all that has just been said, it seems that it can be concluded that the new government's policy will be identical in every way to that of the previous government. Will that be the case?

[Answer] No, that will not be the case, because Soares Carneiro's defeat in the presidential election was a major defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" government and its policy. In voting against Soares Carneiro, the Portuguese people voted against the "Democratic Alliance" and its government. Thus must necessarily be taken into account. Otherwise, we will be heading toward major political and social conflicts.

[Question] Presidential elections are different from legislative elections. Many other factors, including the candidate's personalities, play a part in them. In the 7 December election, General Soares Carneiro's personality--and in particular his responsibility for the Sao Nicolau [Penal] Camp--also carried weight.

[Answer] Undoubtedly. But why did the "Democratic Alliance" choose specifically General Soares Carneiro--a personality linked with fascism and colonialism who has always been hostile to 25 April [1974]? Did it choose him because it was counting on victory in elections manipulated by the government and on the coup which might be launched by a military right which has done nothing but conspire since 25 April? General Soares Carneiro was the arrogant display of the "Democratic Alliance's" subversive plan. And it was such a display and so arrogant that it ended up by jeopardizing the "democratic" disguise with which the "Democratic Alliance" was still seeking to cover before the 5 October legislative elections.

We said at the time that Soares Carneiro was a millstone round the "Democratic Alliance's" neck. The general confidently said that he was not (DIARIO DE NOTICIAS of 21 November 1980); that he was no millstone at all. He was not in the legislative elections. But he ended up by becoming so in the presidential election; a millstone so heavy that he literally dragged the "Democratic Alliance" down to the bottom.

Nevertheless, it was not Soares Carneiro as a person who caused the defeat. It was the fact that that person was the personficiation, the affirmation, the revelation and the expression of the reactionary alliance's real nature and real aims. The people understood and made the proper response through the ballot box.

[Question] Does this mean that it was not so much General Soares Carneiro as the "Democratic Alliance" which was defeated in the presidential election?

[Question] Precisely. The main loser in the presidential election was not Soares Carneiro but the "Democratic Alliance." Soares Carneiro was the "Democratic Alliance's" candidate. The "Democratic Alliance" propaganda proclaimed: "A majority, a government, a president." In the poster displays, a poster asserting the "Democratic Alliance's" voting intentions appeared in alternation with one bearing Soares Carneiro's picture. Sa Carneiro and Freitas do Amaral made it clear and persistently asserted that in the event of defeat for Soares Carneiro, they would resign. It was the "Democratic Alliance" itself which gave the voting in the presidential election the significance of a vote for the "Democratic Alliance" or against the "Democratic Alliance," against its majority and against its government.

[Question] Do you mean that Soares Carneiro's defeat was the defeat, not only of the "Democratic Alliance's" subversive plan but also of its government program? Does this mean that the Portuguese people voted 7 December for 25 April and its gains?

[Answer] Yes. The "Democratic Alliance" sought to turn the presidential election into something like a referendum on the country's major economic, social and political problems and on the solutions to them.

The "Democratic Alliance" proclaimed to the four winds through the news media (over which it secured a monopoly) that electing Soares Carneiro would mean destroying the Portugal of April, the gains of the revolution and the constitution of the republic. And electing Ramalho Eanes would mean strengthening the institutional defense of those gains, of the Portugal of April and of the democratic system. By voting against Soares Carneiro and for Eanes, the Portuguese people voted--in reaction's own terms--for defending the gains of the revolution against the "Democratic Alliance's" attempts to eliminate them, and voted for the Portugal of April and for the democratic system enshrined in the constitution which candidate Bamalho Eanes proposed to defend.

[Question] This is tantamount to asserting that the 7 December election has a political significance contrary to the 5 October election. Can it be asserted that the presidential election corrects the legislative elections?

[Answer] It corrected them to some extent. It was not we who indissolubly linked the presidential election with the legislative elections. It was the "Democratic Alliance" itself which did so. General Soares' Carneiro's candidacy was the candidacy, not only of a general but also of the "Democratic Alliance," its government and its majority in the Assembly of the Republic. In the presidential election campaign, the "Demoratic Alliance," drunk with the victory in the legislative elections, revealed its true face. Despite the manipulation of the news media, the Portuguese people understood what was at stake and made their response. The "Democratic Alliance" majority in the Assembly of the Republic and the "Democratic Alliance" government were directly called into question in the 7 December election.

[Question] Certain news media say that the PCP is aiming at destablizing the situation with such assertions. . . .

[Answer] We are aware of these comments and insinuations. But in 1976, following the legislative elections from which a majority of PS and PCP deputies emerged, they said that the majority in the assembly had been corrected by the new "presidential majority." And then, in 1980, before the elections for the Assembly of the Republic, assuming a defeat for the "Democratic Alliance," how did they view the presidential election? As we all remember, they viewed the presidential election as being able to correct the outcome of the legislative elections. "Democratic Alliance" candidate General Soares Carneiro himself stated quite literally that if a leftwing majority were elected to the Assembly of the Republic 5 October he, the "Democratic Alliance" candidate, if he were elected president of the republic 7 December, would then dissolve the Assembly of the Republic. That would have been the "correction" taken to its extreme limit.

Those who, in the event of defeat 5 October, were planning to correct the election outcome through the dissolution of the Assembly of the Republic by a president of the republic whom they succeeded in electing, cannot deny the assertions that the defeat of a candidate for the presidency identified with the "Democratic Alliance," and with the "Democratic Alliance" majority and government and the election of a president fiercely opposed by the "Democratic Alliance" are in their political aspect a correction of the 5 October election.

[Question] So does the PCP believe that the Assembly of the Republic should be dissolved and an interim election called?

[Answer] We do not advocate such a solution at present, because conditions for it have not been created. But two consequences of the correction of the outcome of the 5 October election by the outcome of the 7 December election should be heeded:

The first is that the unconstitutional, unlawful and subversive conduct which characterized the Sa Carneiro/Freitas do Amaral government neither can nor should be tolerated institutionally on the part of the new government. If the Balsemao government pursues such a policy, it should, in our opinion, be dismissed immediately;

The second is that the great lesson and the great significance of the 7 December election should be objectively taken into account, both in the Assembly of the Republic (particularly by its majority) and by the government. It is the least that can be expected.

[Question] Dr Mario Soares says that the PS will be in opposition for the next 4 years. How is this statement to be viewed? Will the "Democratic Alliance" govern until 1984?

[Answer] Some 4 years of "Democratic Alliance" government would be the destruction of the Portugal of April. The "Democratic Alliance" in the government would mean in the short term further attempts at destablization and further subversive plans. Dr Mario Soares' idea is an immoblist, conformist and defeatist idea. It does not serve our people, the democratic forces, the institutions or the system. We proceed from a more optimistic assessment and stance: a democratic turnabout before 4 years have elapsed is possible.

[Question] If the Assembly of the Republic is not dissolved, by what other means can the "Democratic Alliance" government be replaced, if the "Democratic Alliance" has a majority? As usual, there will be those who will say that the PCP is contemplating solutions not expressly envisaged in the constitution. . . .

[Answer] Certainly not. The PCP maintains that all Portugal's political problems can and should be resolved within the constitutional framework. We do not at present advocate the dissolution of the assembly and the holding of a new election, but this solution could impose itself over the next few years. Moreover, the "Democratic Alliance" government currently has a majority in the Assembly of the Republic, but could lose it. Experience has already demonstrated that the formation of governments without their necessarily having explicit majority support in the Assembly of the Republic is possible under certain circumstances. So there are various possibilities for the "Democratic Alliance" government's not lasting 4 years.

[Question] When it is said that the government could lose the majority in the present Assembly of the Republic, does this mean that deputies belonging to the majority could leave it? Or that the PPD and the CDS could split and enter into conflict?

[Answer] Both of these and some more.

[Question] What about the "central bloc"?

[Answer] What is described as the "central bloc" (a majority of the PS with the PSD, or of the PS with all or part of the "Democratic Alliance") would not be a democratic solution but a way out for the reactionary forces following the defeat of their subversive plan and at a time when conditions are being created for ousting them from power.

[Question] Would not a new PS/PSD majority be preferable to the present PPD/CDS majority?

[Answer] The PPD/CDS majority is a majority resulting from antidemocratic methods and the manipulation of the electoral process by the "Democratic Alliance" government. It is the representative of the interests of big capital (associated with imperialism) and of the big landowners. It is doomed to defeat.

A new PS/PPD alliance would be the PS once more holding out a lifeline to the right at the very moment when reaction is losing a battle.

The alternative to the "Democratic Alliance" is not an alliance with the "Democratic Alliance" or with part of the "Democratic Alliance," but an alliance of the democratic forces.

[Question] With the PCP?

[Answer] Of course, with the PCP. Moreover, the presidential election gave a further demonstration that the resolution of Portugal's major political problems can only be achieved with the PCP. It gave a further demonstration that the PCP is a necessary, essential and irreplaceable force in Portuguese democracy. Until this is realized, they will remain unresolved, successive sectarian and incompetent governments will continue to succeed each other political crises and government crises. The nation's problems will continue the work of destruction of what has been achieved since 25 April, and attempts at destablization and coups will frequently occur. [sentence as published] Experience demonstrates that a democratic turnabout and a democratic alternative will only be possible with the PCP.

[Question] Is it not true that the outcome of the presidential election has led to a certain detente in relations among the most diverse political forces? Does not this situation give rise to the possibility of a reconciliation among parties, as some people say?

[Answer] Democracy has prevailed; there is talk about "reconciliation." If reaction had prevailed, we would be experiencing an atmosphere of persecution of democrats and of civil war, created by the "Democratic Alliance" government.

In this spirit, there are those who advocate that the "Democratic Alliance" should be given a respite to resolve its problems. In our opinion, it is necessary to give reaction no respite and to exploit the victory in full, just as reaction would have done if it had emerged victorious from the presidential election. Giving reaction a respite means giving it an opportunity to recover from the defeat, to reflect, to revive, to maintain its positions, to reformulate its plans and to prepare for a new offensive. Reaction shows itself to be far more diligent and efficient when it achieves a victory. One of the great weaknesses of the democratic forces is their defensiveness. There are democratic sectors which through fear of the workers and people's movement and because of their anticommunism are more afraid of reaction's defeat than of its victory. Was the "Democratic Alliance" defeated in the presidential election? Does the possibility arise of ousting it from power? Certain democratic sectors are panicking and going to the aid of the defeated. Mario Soares distinguishes himself in this respect by his anticommunist obsessions and his propensity toward alliances and "reconciliations" with the reactionary forces.

The reconciliation necessary for defending and continuing democracy is not the reconciliation of democrats with reactionaries but reconciliation and agreement among all democrats, for whose unity the PCP has long been struggling.

[Question] In view of the PS' stance, is it not an illusion to deem democratic unity to be possible?

[Answer] The presidential election demonstrated, not only the possibilities of unity (through agreement or convergence) but also its inevitable strength when mobilized. The PS and PCP electorate played a decisive part in President Eanes' victory, not forgetting the role of many nonparty Democrats.

The party's Central Committee concluded that the presidential election demonstrated that there is an extremely vast and definitely majority social and political area of opposition to the reactionary forces and of potential support for a democratic policy. We point out that Ramalho Eanes was elected against the "Democratic Alliance," against the most diverse rightwing groups and sectors, against the PS secretary general and the part of the PS which followed him, and against the leftists, and moreover, the majority was overwhelming. We are not speaking of a "presidential majority." But within the present political framework, in the mass movement and in the stance of the electorate which reelected Ramalho Eanes, there lies the possibility not only of a social and political base but also of a vast unitary movement for defending and building Portuguese democratic society.

[Question] Could not this new alliance of the PS with the "Democratic Alliance" occur for the purpose of revising the constitution?

[Answer] This is indeed a danger. What is necessary for ensuring that the revision of the constitution takes place lawfully and does not affect the democratic system is not agreement between the PS and the "Democratic Alliance" but agreement among all Democrats--specifically, between the PS and the PCP.

[Question] So does the PCP declare itself opposed to an "agreement on the system" [accordo do regime"] for the purpose of revising the constitution?

[Answer] It is to be feared that in order to succeed in reentering the area of government, Mario Soares may make constitutional changes a bargaining counter in negotiations with the "Democratic Alliance." In that event, it would not be an "agreement on the system" but an agreement against the system.

[Question] However, the PS and the "Democratic Alliance" have a two-thirds majority, but the PS and the PCP do not. In that event, how effective would an agreement among the democrats--specifically of the PS and the PCP--be for the purpose of revising the constitution?

[Answer] Any amendment to the constitution requires the votes of two-thirds of the deputies. The "Democratic Alliance" does not have the two-thirds. It is very far from that. With its own votes alone, the "Democratic Alliance" will be unable to revise a single line of the country's basic law. If there were no two-thirds for approving amendments, there would be no amendments. That is: if there were no two-thirds for approving any amendment, the constitution would remain fully in force. This would not be a bad thing.

So it would be sufficient for the democratic parties--specifically the PS and the PCP--to reach agreement to prevent any antidemocratic amendment to the constitution occurring. On the basis of such an agreement, it would be very easy to "negotiate" the terms of a lawful and democratic revision of the constitution with all the parties represented in the Assembly of the Republic without exception.

[Question] Somebody might conclude from these words that the PCP is opposed to the revision of the constitution.

[Answer] No. The PCP is opposed to the unconstitutional revision of the constitution. It is in favor of the constitutional revision of the constitution and will make proposals to that end. In order to be lawful, the revision of the constitution must respect the formal and material limits which the constitution itself sets: The requirement of two-thirds of the deputies' votes and the matters and principles which cannot be revised. If these limits were not respected, the revision would not be lawful. It would constitute a gross violation of the institutions and of legality. It would be a real attack against the democratic system.

[Question] Does the PCP remain in favor of the continuation of the Council of the Revolution after the revision of the constitution?

[Answer] For our part, we would have no objection to its continuation, if the Council of the Revolution retained its present characteristics. We do not find any better solution is in sight for institutionalizing the armed forces' participation in political life and for guaranteeing that the armed forces do not become an instrument of a short term party policy. However, we are isolated in this stance. Parties and military personnel have asserted that the Council of the Revolution's disappearance is inevitable.

[Question] And in that event?

[Answer] In that event the Council of the Revolution's powers should pass to other state bodies, but with solutions which cannot make the armed forces, their leaders and their general staffs partisan.

In revising the constitution, it is imperative to prevent changes being made which could create the possibility of restoring a reactionary military hierarchy, tempted toward pressures and putschist interventions. The day of 25 April must remain fully alive in the armed forces and in Portuguese political life.

[Question] Does the PCP have any plans for a revision? With respect to issues currently being under discussion, how does the PCP view the authorities of the presidency of the republic, the government and the Assembly of the Republic?

[Answer] Yes. The party is preparing a plan. It will present it at the right time. Our party's ninth congress indicated basic general guidelines for a revision. As you know, some political forces have advocated both presidentialism and parliamentarianism, depending on whether they had more confidence in a particular president or majority in the Assembly of the Republic. We still advocate the independence and complementarity of the state bodies and a mixed system better matched to the characteristics of the Portuguese political situation. The transformation of the state bodies into the tools of a particular party or coalition of parties (as the "Democratic Alliance" is trying to do) poses a real threat to the democratic system.

[Question] There is much talk about limiting the powers of the president of the republic. What is the PCP's stance on this issue? How does the PCP view General Eanes' combination of the posts of president of the republic and chief of general staff?

[Answer] It is to be feared that under present conditions agreements between the "Democratic Alliance" and the PS to reduce the powers of the president of the republic will be a further reflection of opposition to the president and further destablization bids in the relatively near future. The "Democratic Alliance" and Mario Soares could come to an agreement on this. Such an occurrence is to be feared.

As for the post of armed forces chief of general staff, experience shows that in this specific instance there are no disadvantages and indeed some advantages in combining this post with that of president of the republic. Some people are suspiciously anxious for President Eanes to give up the post. The democratic system must not be hurried. The anxiety I mentioned is very suspicious, to say the least, especially in view of its source.

[Question] Might not this opinion strengthen the charge made by Mario Soares and others that the PCP is trying to latch on to the president of the republic?

[Answer] The PCP has not latched and is not latching on to anyone. As for Mario Soares, before the general elections he tried to latch on to Eanes, and after the republican and socialist front's defeat in the general elections and before the presidential elections he tried to jump onto the victorious bandwagon which he thought would be General Soares Carneiro's. The PCP did not latch on to Ramalho Eanes' candidacy. It analyzed the situation, defined the principal danger, defined its line of action and finally issued its appeal for people to vote for Ramalho Eanes. We are well aware that we made a decisive contribution to the "Democratic Alliance" candidate's defeat.

[Question] A decisive contribution? One for which the PC has demanded or will demand repayment?

[Answer] A decisive one, yes. But the favor which the PCP did was to the Portuguese people and the democratic system. We are not demanding any repayment.

[Question] Could it be said that Ramalho Eanes would not have been elected had it not been for the PCP's contribution?

[Answer] Undoubtedly he would not. Anyone who knows anything knows that. The ones who are trying to latch on to the president-elect, albeit with restraint, are the ones who, having attacked him fiercely and called him "the PCP's candidate," now display smiling faces, gentle voices and cooperative gestures. Freitas do Amaral already dares to assert that the "Democratic Alliance" never attacked the president of the republic. And Mario Soares is already insinuating that in fact his opposition to Eanes also made its own contribution to Eanes' being elected.

[Question] Is it possible to believe in cooperation on the part of the reaction with the reelected president?

[Answer] In the immediate term the reaction will try to make people forget the shameful campaign which it waged against Ramalho Eanes and will seek an understanding with the reelected president. It would be difficult to do anything else. But when the reaction considers itself recovered, it will return to its war on the president, its attempt to oppose, refute and sabotage his authorities and political action. In connection with the constitutional revision we will witness the resurgence of the anti-Eanes campaign. If anyone does not believe it, just let him wait and see.

[Question] Finally, what approach can er adopt to the prospective evolution in the situation? Are there any causes for concern or optimism?

[Answer] For both concern and optimism. Concern, because the reaction is still in government and still has a majority in the assembly and will persist with its anti-working people policy, its attack on the democratic gains (and particularly on the workers rights, the agrarian reform and the nationalizations) and with its plan to eliminate the democratic system. Optimism, because as a result of the presidential elections the imminent threat of coups has been removed, the reaction suffered serious defeats and is weakened, the peoples and democratic movement is strengthened and the democratic system has emerged strengthened, freedoms better guaranteed and the opportunities for struggle extended and improved. The struggle continues in 1981--but under more favorable conditions than in 1980.

[Question] The struggle continues. But in what direction?

[Answer] With regard to the institutions, within the state bodies (the Assembly of the Republic), in relations with other state bodies (the president of the republic and the Council of the Revolution) and in local government. With regard to alliances, in relations with other democratic parties, forces and sectors. With regard to the masses, in the development of the mass struggle, which is still the motive force behind social changes. With regard to economic and social activities, in work within the local authorities, in the agrarian reform, within the cooperatives and is the most varied sectors of national life.

[Question] What are the fundamental objectives?

[Answer] The reestablishment of democratic legality where the "Democratic Alliance" government has created antidemocratic situations; the defense of the revolutionary gains; the guaranteeing of the citizens' freedoms and rights' the reestablishment of pluralism in the news media; the improvement of the people's living conditions; a foreign policy of national independence, peace and friendship, without any kind of subservience to foreign interests.

[Question] The reactionary and opportunist forces are trying to isolate and silence the PCP, as is particularly evident since 7 December. Does this not create new difficulties for the party's action?

[Answer] The PCP has broader and broader ties with various social forces and democratic sectors. Anticommunism suffered a major setback at the 7 December elections. It was shown that very broad sectors of the population, hitherto strongly influenced by anticommunist campaigns, were not afraid of standing alongside the communists in an extremely important election battle. This is a new factor which also indicates the broad perspectives that are opening up for our party's political action.

L'UNITA REPORTS CARRILLO COMMENTS ON CATALAN ISSUE

[Augusto Pancaldi undated interview in Madrid with PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo: "Political Conflict Within PCE Partly Reflection of Spanish Society's Malaise"]

[Excerpt] Madrid--I discussed the political crisis, which could even lead to regressive solutions, with PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo, certainly not to conceal or to dismiss the gravity of the "Catalan issue"--of the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia's [PSUC] revolt against the PCE--but in an attempt to interpret the results of the Catalan communists' congress within a broader context--especially since these results have weakened not only the PSUC and the PCE but the country's entire democratic and people's area.

Carrillo acknowledged that there has been a general political malaise, an "ebb in the democratic movement," following the 1977 enthusiasm, which is affecting all parties and certainly not sparing the PCE. Certain oversimplifications are creating "disenchantment." The attitude of critical detachment of many intellectuals with respect to the parties is exacerbating this process of "disintegration of democracy" and of the party system--which is the constant concern of the right. The absence of clear prospects is prompting internal struggles within the parties themselves, thus weakening them even further.

All this, Carrillo believes, is because the "democratic transition" has failed to produce the hoped for results; because the Moncloa Pact, which according to PCE strategy should have reduced the power of the ruling oligarchies (the same as in the Francoist period) in favor of the leftwing forces, failed as a result of the resistance from the power structures, the lack of unity among the leftwing forces and the limited nature [relativita] of their strength; because the government slowed up the autonomy process by resuscitating and reinvigorating all the traditional centrifugal and nationalist thrusts of Spanish history; and because the crisis that has hit the entire world productive economic system has hit Spain harder, since it had behind it not 30-40 years of democracy but just 3 years of post dictatorship and was basically in midtransition.

"This is how the transition has been carried out in Spain," Carrillo said, "without a break from the past, unlike what happened in Portugal; this must never be forgotten if you want to make a serious analysis of the situation. What is irresponsible, however, because it is simplistic--even though, as we have seen in the past few days, it is oversimplifications that are making a breakthrough since disappointment, unemployment and hardships are eroding the workers' living conditions--what is irresponsible is the unloading of all the blame onto the 'center' without ever saying (because nobody has ever said it) for one thing, what other kind of a policy could have been pursued by a PCE that had just emerged from clandestinity and which had at all costs to gain recognition as a component of Spanish democratic life so as to insert itself into decisionmaking spheres."

And so we come to the PSUC-PCE issue, which we have discussed over the past few days and which we will have to discuss further, because the Spanish Communists' unity is something which concerns everyone, irrespective of and over and above possible improvidences, errors or negligences on one side or the other. The new PSUC executive, whose 15 members were elected Sunday evening in an ambiguous vote by only 46 Central Committee members and with over 30 abstentions, is homogeneous and uniformly "Leninist" and therefore entirely committed to radical stances critical of the PCE and traditionally and strongly nationalist. What led to this reversal of strategy in the PSUC, which is summed up in the elimination of the term "Eurocommunism" from its documents? In Catalonia too, without Carrillo, all the causes of disappointment troubling the majority of Spanish workers had an effect--but stronger here, within the framework of traditions peculiar to the Catalonian nation, and to its passionate desire for autonomy, thus leading to an immediate "loss of faith in the policy of alliances and consensus and to a radical-type reaction of return to the thirties and to the class conflict." All this was exacerbated by the international tension which wrongly led many people--misled by one of the PSUC currents and by the "ambiguity" of its leadership--to see Eurocommunism as "a rightist, procapitalist and anti-Soviet doctrine" and the crisis in East-West relations as the time to opt for one bloc against the other.

It is against this "background," Carrillo believes, that other elements have subsequently emerged--first and foremost among these an "acute phenomenon of Catalan nationalism" (Togliatti discussed this as a historical phenomenon in his essays on Spain) embracing all kinds of different things, as in the PSUC's congress theses: the criticism of PCE policy, the charge of inadequate democracy or of bureaucratic relations between center and periphery, and so forth. The results are well-known. "The PSUC," Carrillo said, "has opted for a policy that conflicts with the PCE's and therefore has demolished the foundations for our relations as laid down in our statutes."

BELGRADE NIN INTERVIEWS PCE MEMBER AZCARATE

AU211900 Belgrade NIN in Serbo-Croatian 18 Jan 81 No.1568 pp 48-49

[Unattributed report on NIN interview with Manuel Azcarate, member of the Executive Committee of the Spanish Communist Party Central Committee--date and place not given]

[Text] "The Eurocommunist road is not at all easy; I would even say that it is very difficult. It lacks slogans, especially those thunderous ones. It is a road along which it is impossible to progress quickly and along which great patience is required to achieve and see the results. Thus, it is not surprising that some individuals lose their patience along that road, that they even become disillusioned and that they seek a way out in reverting to the old, hard and obsolete positions."

In an interview with NIN, that is how Manuel Azcarate, member of the Executive Committee of the PCE Central Committee, commented on last week's decisions of the Catalan communists.

"We do not underestimate the graveness of the Catalan communists' decision," Azcarate says further in answering our question on what consequences that decision might have on the further trends in the Spanish communist movement. "Its consequences certainly can be bad regardless of the fact that so-called hard current prevailed with a minimum majority. The new leadership of the United Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] emphasizes that nothing momentous has happened and that there will be no change in the party's policy. I think that something momentous has happened, that a great turn has been made. What is obviously involved is an attempt to return the party to the old positions, positions that became obsolete long ago and to which the PCE can no longer return. That kind of policy would drive us into a blind alley, to put it mildly. Eurocommunism is, for Spanish conditions, virtually the only road on which it is possible to advance to socialism, defend our fragile democracy and be independent on that road. Accordingly, the elimination of the term Eurocommunism is neither a technical nor a terminological but a profoundly political question that indicates two different political concepts."

"The political situation in Spain is difficult and complex," he says. "The country is passing through a grave political and economic crisis. That has undoubtedly influenced individual communists to turn more toward those who advocate more radical positions, offer ardent slogans and promise revolutionary changes. Eurocommunism offers neither ardent slogans nor quick revolutionary transformations."

Azcarate points out yet another factor that might have influenced this turnabout among Catalan communists. "There have also been external pressures against Eurocommunism, especially Spanish Eurocommunism," he says. "Those pressures began with the campaign waged against us by the Soviet journal NOVOYE VREMYA a few years ago when it bitterly attacked Carrillo and Eurocommunism. Those pressures have obviously found followers among the 'Afghans' in Catalonia. It was possible to see that that is true at the congress [of the Catalan party] itself at which individual delegates, advocates of this 'hard,' that is 'pro-Soviet current,' defended their theses against Eurocommunism by using virtually the same arguments as the Soviet journal NOVOYE VREMYA used in its polemics against Eurocommunism."

Azcarate does not exclude the possibility that their traditional close relations with the French Communist Party [PCF] might also have influenced this ferment among Catalan communists.

"But," Azcarate stresses, "what has taken place in the PCF, which dealt a heavy blow to Eurocommunism by approving the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and with the subsequent Paris consultative conference, and which put quite a distance between itself and Eurocommunism, will not take place in the PCE. The PCE continues to firmly stand by the positions of Eurocommunism. In addition to its negative aspects, the decision of the Catalan communists also has its positive component. It will encourage us, and has already encouraged us to even more resolutely defend Eurocommunism and to become even more engaged in strengthening, explaining and theoretically elaborating it. This positive reaction is already being felt. In addition to the Basque and Asturian communists, who have confirmed their Eurocommunist orientation, there is now also taking place an increasingly massive reaction among the Catalan communists who demand convening an extraordinary PSUC congress that would revise the aforementioned decision. The PCE leadership also believes that convening an extraordinary congress is the only solution, and we also have said that to the new PSUC leadership. A considerable group of Catalan communist activists has already submitted such a request."

Ending his interview, Azcarate confirms that the PCE faces a certain crisis, but emphasizes that that is not "any deep internal crisis" which would threaten a split and a change of course, but primarily "a process of deep internal polemics and a critical reexamination of everyday policies."

"It is true that a certain shedding of members has taken place, that there are frequent criticisms of the leadership and that a certain discontent and impatience are apparent among members. I think that in the main, these are healthy processes which favor a further strengthening of internal democracy in the party, abandoning the old forms of work and precisely determining our concepts and our tactics and strategy."

KARJALAINEN COMMENTS ON REAGAN PRESIDENCY

LD212128 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1720 GMT 21 Jan 81

[From the Press Review]

[Text] The National Coalition Party paper KARJALAINEN published in Joensuu says that Reagan's policy has been described in advance as tougher than that pursued by Carter on the basis of his statements, his election campaign and choice of certain aides. [words indistinct] On the other hand, the paper considers it unnecessary to paint in advance the devil on the wall, for example [words indistinct] Reagan's influence on cooperation between the big two.

In the paper's opinion, it would be no wonder if Reagan, with all his straightforwardness, were to get on even better with the Soviets than Carter did, who has nothing much to show for in this sphere. The Soviets themselves have announced that they take an unprejudiced attitude toward President Reagan, so preconditions will be utilized to advantage, for example in such a way that an opportunity opens up for President Reagan and the Soviet leadership to have a direct mutual exchange of opinions at an as early stage as possible.

Reagan, who has assumed the reins of power, will quote soon have to adopt a stance on [words indistinct] international issues. The Middle East situation is still most inflamed. In Southern Africa problems are accumulating [words indistinct]. In Latin America there are several issues which are bound to bring furrows of concern to the foreheads of Washington rulers.

In the opinion of KARJALAINEN, despite all doubts (?expressed) both here in Finland and elsewhere, we Finns have every reason to hope that Reagan will succeed in the international forum. His (?failure), which has too often been conjured up, would easily bring the eyes of the storms precariously close to our country, says KARJALAINEN of Joensuu.

DEFENSE FORCE COMMANDER DEMANDS MORE SPENDING

LD191959 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1030 GMT 19 Jan 81

[Summary from poor reception] The commander of the defense forces, Gen Lauri Sutela, is demanding more funds for the defense budget. At the opening of the 79th National Defense Course in Helsinki, Sutela said a higher defense budget would make it possible for the defense forces to carry out their various tasks under all circumstances. As for the serious defects in our national defense, Sutela mentioned the equipment problems of the land forces, the training of the reserve troops and particularly the shortage of technical personnel.

Minister of Defense Lasse Aikas drew attention at the opening of the national defense course to economic national defense. He mentioned, inter alia, that this year's budget for the first time included an allocation for the emergency storage of grain.

UK STEPS UP PRESSURE OVER BRITONS HELD IN IRAN

LD221355 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 22 Jan 81 p 32

[David Adamson report: "Envoy Called to Talks Over Captive Britons"]

[Text] Britain yesterday stepped up its pressure over the four British prisoners held in Iran. Dr Seyfollah Ehdaie, the Iranian charge in London, was called to the Foreign Office for talks with Mr Hurd, the minister responsible for Middle Eastern affairs.

The meeting coincided with an announcement by the Department of Trade that civil trade sanctions on Iran were being lifted from midnight last night.

The move leaves unchanged the position on supplies of arms to Iran, which will continue to be the subject to licensing control. It is understood there is no intention of resuming deliveries in present circumstances.

In the Commons, Sir Ian Gilmour, deputy foreign secretary, was interrupted by angry shouts from Conservative and Labour MPs when he brushed aside a question on arms supplies as "not particularly relevant" to the release of the Britons.

MPs were concerned that Britian's European Community partners would deliver weapons to Iran, despite the prisoners and the continuing war in the Gulf.

Sir Ian replied that Britain would have "the greatest regard" to the export of military hardware until the Britons were released.

Mr Healey, opposition spokesman on foreign affairs, said Sir Ian should assure the House he would use his influence to ensure that no EEC country would supply arms until there was peace in the Gulf. Sir Ian said that he could speak only for Britain.

His low profile approach to the question of relations with Iran squared with that taken by Mr Hurd in his meeting with Dr Ehdaie. Dr Ehdaie, who has just returned from two weeks in Tehran, was told that, after the release of the American hostages, there was now an opportunity for a return to a "friendly and normal" relationship between Britain and Iran. But before that could happen it was necessary to resolve the case of the three missionaries, Dr and Mrs John Coleman and Miss Jean Waddell, and Mr Andrew Pyke, a businessman.

It was understood that Dr Ehdaie was not able to offer any fresh information on their cases. The last hopeful sign came at the beginning of this month when an emissary of the Archbishop of Canterbury reported that he had been told the four were to be released very soon.

LORD CARRINGTON INTERVIEWED ON MIDDLE EAST

LD201119 Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 16 Jan 81 pp 1, 3

[British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington interview with AL-AHRAM chief editor Ibrahim Nafi' in Cairo-date not specified]

[Excerpt] [Question] You played an important role in the European initiative expressed by the Venice EC statement. What is the British interpretation of the initiative, particularly with regard to determining the future of the Palestinian people, Israel's withdrawal from the occupied Arab territories, securing peace in the area, and the problem of Jerusalem, and what is the British view of the relation between this initiative, the Camp David agreement and the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty and of its relation with current U.S. efforts to achieve peace in the Middle East?

[Answer] We in Britain believe that Europe necessarily must contribute as much as possible to finding a solution to the Middle East problem, which we have done. Like you, we have no need of oil and we are not doing this for the sake of obtaining oil. We are not iterested in that. We basically are interested in searching for a just settlement.

We believe that Camp David was and still is a good beginning for solving the problem and nobody should detract from Camp David's achieved value. But I do not think that we in Europe felt that we could go far [as published]. We absolutely have no desire to block the Camp David talks. We made this clear on several occasions. But we believe that it probably is necessary to prepare a statement or a declaration of principles about Europe's views for two reasons: First, as I already have said, because of Europe's need not to stand on the sidelines and to do what it can to help. Second, there is somewhat greater interest in U.S. policy on our part because of the U.S. election. We threfore believe that any positive activity on Europe's part can be an auxiliary factor in maintaining the process of seeking peace. That is what we are trying to do--not to block what any other party is trying to do. In fact, we have been trying to study the problem and to discuss it with the parties concerned in the area, with a view to exploring ways and means by which we can help to achieve a solution.

[Question] How do you evaluate the nature and dimensions of the British role in solving the Middle East crisis, whether outside or inside the framework of the Common Market, as compared with the attitude of France on the one hand and the United States on the other?

[Answer] I do not think that we look at the matter this way. Nor do we look at it as a competition between one party and another. I do not claim that basically there is no other country outsdie the area that has more experience than Britain in the Middle East. We feel that we have something to offer and we also believe that with Europe we would have greater influence than alone.

I do not think that the French want to take a different stand from the Americans and the Europeans any more than we want to from the French or the Americans. I believe that it is no longer possible to form opinion by giving orders on how this conflict should be resolved. This, however, does not mean that there are no differences in interests between one country and another or between Europe and the United States, but we all are seeking to achieve the same objective and there is no need for competition or differences over this matter.

[Question] The Middle East area is subject to many dangers as a result of the Iraqi-Iranian war, the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and inter-Arab differences. What is your assessment of these changes and their effect on Western interests in the area. In your opinion, what is the relationship between these crises and the Arab-Israeli conflict?

[Answer] I will answer the last question first. I believe that the disagreements among the Arabs have rendered the solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict more difficult. Because it is perfectly clear that the Arabs are basically divided in their attempt to agree on what can be achieved. In my view, this is bad.

From the Arab standpoint, I believe, these two conflicts, or the two points you have mentioned--the invasion of Afghanistan and the Iraq-Iran war--constitute extreme dangers not only to the Middle East area but to the whole world, particularly the Western world. First, because, as has been said, the Western states except Britain get one-third of their oil needs, I believe, from this area, and therefore any threat to the oil supplies from the Middle East constitutes a very serious danger. Second, because the two areas of conflict in the Middle East could lead, and this must not be allowed, to confrontation for any reason with a third party, given the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

I do not believe that the cause here is material but, whatever the cause, the Soviet Union is now 400 miles from the Strait of Hormuz and in a strategically important position--a situation which the British for over 120 years insisted on preventing the Russians from achieving. We fought three Afghan wars to prevent this from happening. Not all of them were successful, but they prevented Russia from controlling Afghanistan. We now have a situation where the Soviet Union has penetrated Afghanistan and is in a position strategically to threaten the lifeline of the Arab world and to undermine the stability of the area's states.

I have been very encouraged by the way in which President as-Sadat categorically has denounced the invasion, perhaps more than any other person. I find this very encouraging.

As for the Iraqi-Iranian war, it involves two problems. First, it renders the solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict more difficult. And, second, the possibility of this war's expanding once again threatens the area's stability.

I believe that what we have been trying to achieve over the years in our country is to maintain the tendency to resolve problems without resort to war and through neogtiations, a tendency which has sometimes met with success.

[Question] Statements and insinuations are being reiterated now, especially since the election of the new American President Reagan, about "the Jordanian alternative" as one of the alternatives put forward for resolving the Middle East crisis. What is your view of the potential of that alternative?

[Answer] What the Europeans have done so far is that Gaston Thorn has come here and we have read four papers on withdrawal, security, self-determination and Jerusalem. These papers defined the problems in these issues and raised a number of questions. What we are trying to do now is to ask The Netherlands Prime Minister to talk with the parties concerned and to discuss the American role. But there is a specific question: The Jordanian alternative clearly deals with the problem of withdrawal as a whole and with the various issues. I do not believe that anyone has formed a special opinion in relation to this option but, to be on the safe side, I say that all my colleagues are now ready to support any option that is supported by the area's peoples, because it is neither Europe nor America which will solve the problem but the area's states. All that we can do is to play the role of middleman or present some ideas or offer our good offices. The solution, in the end, is up to the area and what it wants. If it wants the Jordanian option, we cannot prevent it. All that we can do is think of the means and methods by which we can help the states concerned to achieve a solution.

[Question] What role can Britain play in Gulf security and what are the possibilities of cooperation with France and the United States in halting the Soviet penetration of Africa?

[Answer] In the Gulf, of course, we have very close relations with all the Gulf countries. In past months, we have had contacts regarding the problems of the area. We have spoken to the French and the Americans as well as to others. And I believe that they are very interested in what we have to offer to solve problems in the area. We certainly intend to help our friends in the area.

Regarding Africa, I believe that if we are not directly invited then it is unlikely that we will take any military action. What we will seek to do is try to encourage stability. At present, we are holding talks about Africa as a whole and about south-west Africa, Namibia in particular. We will seek to encourage stability in the area with political and financial backing and I believe that the solution of the Zimbabwe problem is an example of what we have been trying to achieve in the past years. The solution of the Zimbabwe problem is an example of what can be done. It represents a success in halting a war through negotiation and the choosing of an elected government. If this solution can be applied in Namibia, then it can rid us of another problem. With regard to other African countries, we will try to do all we can to create stability through political advice and financial aid.

Regarding the problem of Chad, which is a source of concern, I strongly condemn foreign military intervention in Chad because it would lead to further instability. But this issue is a special African problem. It is of the type to which Africans can find a satisfactory solution. We, of course, are in touch with our friends in the area to explore what we can do to help.

[Question] You were once quoted as saying that "if the Jews have achieved a national home for themselves, why should we refuse the same to the Palestinians?" What form, in your opinion, should the "Palestinian national homeland" take, and how can it be established? Do you, for example, favor the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza? Do you think that Israel is prepared to accept this logic in the light of the ideology prevailing there, on which all the political forces agree? Since the Palestinian land and the Palestinian people are under Israeli occupation, do you believe that the step in the direction of such a change should come from Israel or from the PLO?

[Answer] This is the problem with which we are dealing in the EC at present, not only with regard to what form this state should take and what proposals we can put forward but also with regard to the practical solution that can achieve this. I do not think that it is possible to make specific proposals and I prefer to wait until the matter is discussed with peoples of the area.

As for the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, that is one of the possibilities. As to whether Israel is prepared to accept the same logic, I believe that if I were an Israeli my first concern would be my security above anything else.

With regard to the third question, these two matters are in fact the two basic issues in the European statement. They are interlinked. We have tried to gain acceptance for this link and to stress that, if the PLO recognizes Israel, then Israel must recognize Palestinian rights. I believe that this link gradually is coming to be accepted, although the way in which it is to be done is not yet clear.

[Question] There is no doubt that Foreign Office Under Secretary Sir John Graham's meeting with Yasir 'Arafat in Beirut was an important step on your part and at the same time reflects your view about the possibility of progress toward a comprehensive solution of the problem.

[Answer] When Sir John Graham met Mr 'Arafat, it was within the framework of a tour of the Middle East. He met 'Arafat as part of the whole tour and not as a special meeting. There have, in fact, been several contacts between British officials and the PLO. I believe that if there are persons concerned with a certain problem who have views which they wish to discuss, then it is useful to talk to them.

[Question] Do you believe that Israel will agree to recognize the Palestinian people's rights, particularly their right to self-determination and the establishment of an independent state of their own, if the PLO recognizes Israel's right to exist?

[Answer] I believe that this matter represents an obstacle on both sides. The refusal of Israel and the PLO to recognize one another is an obstacle to settlement. I believe that, if it were possible to reach some kind of mutual simultaneous recogntion, then it would be much easier to deal with the problem. This is the difficulty and if we can overcome it, then we shall to a certain extent have defined the principles.

[Text] Today, the governments of Cyprus and Hungary signed two agreements, one referring to international road transportation and the other to the protection of plant cultivation. The agreements were signed by Hungarian Deputy Foreign Minister Szarka, who is on an official visit to Cyprus, and by Foreign Ministry Director General Pelayias.

Speaking during the signing ceremony, the Hungarian deputy foreign minister said that both sides contributed to the further development of bilateral relations with the signing of the agreements. He expressed the belief that these agreements would lead to the promotion of Cypriot-Hungarian cooperation in other fields as well. Referring to the Cypriot problem, Szarka said that his government wanted to see a fair solution of the problem, which as he said, concerned not only the interested parties but simultaneously constituted an international problem occupying the international organization. Addressing the Hungarian official, Pelayias stressed that both agreements would contribute to promoting very friendly relations and cooperation between both countries. He also expressed the deep appreciation of the Cypriot Government and people for Hungary's continuous and consistent support for the Cypriot people's struggle.

RAUF DENKTAS TRAVELS TO SAUDI ISLAMIC MEETING

Government's Israeli Ties

TA221435 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 22 Jan 81

[Excerpt] TFSC President Rauf Denktas will arrive in Istanbul today en route to the Islamic summit meeting in Saudi Arabia. Denktas will leave Istanbul for Saudi Arabia tomorrow.

In a statement he made in Lefkosa [Nicosia] concerning the Islamic summit meeting, Denktas said that the TFSC will exert every effort to ensure unity among Islamic countries. Recalling that the Federated States does not have any relations with Israel, Denktas noted that the Greek Cypriot administration has close relations with Israel, and called on Islamic countries to be alert on this matter. Denktas noted that he does not consider it right to discuss the Cyprus problem at the Islamic summit meeting at this stage and that it would be appropriate to postpone it to the next summit meeting.

Islamic Unity Sought

TA221838 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 22 Jan 81

[Excerpt] TFSC President Rauf Denktas, who will attend the Islamic countries summit meeting, arrived in Istanbul this afternoon.

In a statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport, Denktas said that mutual hard feelings and wars constitute the most important problem of the Islamic world. Pointing out that Islamic unity would contribute to world peace, Denktas said that this would also secure the development of underdeveloped Islamic countries.

Replying to a journalist's question on an Islamic pact, Denktas said that the Islamic world should unite in every field. In reply to another question, the TFSC president noted that during the Islamic countries foreign ministers meeting in Morocco he called on Greek Cypriot leader Kiprianou to sever relations with Israel. However, Kiprianou did not consent.

TURKISH CYPRIOT LEADER DISCUSSES FOREIGN POLICY

[Text] Communal Liberation Party [CLP] leader Alpay Durduran has said that possibilities yielding initiatives should be sought in foreign policy. Durduran held a news conference at the CLP headquarters today and gave his party's views on various issues. Pointing out that his party does not attempt to exploit any foreign policy subject, Durduran said that this stand will be continued. Noting that the problem currently facing the Turkish Cypriot community should be solved through the use of all the community's means, Durduran said: This is what we clearly have to say on foreign policy matters: The bilateral talks are underway. This opportunity must be taken to seek (?effective) possibilities yielding initiatives. Efforts should be exerted to escape from the currents created by Greece and the Greek Cypriot administration, which currently holds the political initiative. In our opinion, the first step to be taken at this stage in order to seize the opportunity is to prepare sufficiently clear proposals that will attract foreign support while remaining true to given promises.

The second step is to make the resettlement of Maras [Varosha] dependent on new agreements and measures that will necessitate a final solution. Whie proposing these temporary measures, the opportunity must be seized to benefit from this in the future by seeking foreign support. The practical measures on this issue should not be proposed one by one, but submitted as a whole--as we noted on various occasions. These measures could seem trivial on their own. However, they take on a new meaning when presented as a whole. We believe that, if it is sought, foreign support can be secured on this subject.

In reply to a question on the proposals submitted to the Greek Cypriot side, Durduran said that President Denktas briefed the party leaders adequately on this matter. Durduran pointed out that after receiving this information, he was convinced that the Turkish Cypriot community should now wait, and said: Since the Turkish Cypriot proposals are now being negotiated, this subject should gain for the Turkish Cypriot community effectiveness in foreign policy by securing foreign support. Noting that if the Greek Cyrpiot side adopts an intransigent attitude despite these proposals, then the Turkish Cypriot proposals could be considered successful, Durduran stressed that the Maras issue should not be discussed separately.

Explaining his views on economic issues, the CLP leader said that the citizens have despaired in the face of the government's attitude and claimed that an increase in [word indistinct] cases was noted in the country due to economic difficulties.

NEWSPAPERS ASSESS U.S. PLANS, INFLUENCE IN AREA

Peace Committee Statement

NC221747 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 22 Jan 81 p 1

[Text] The Greek Committee for International Detente and Peace (EEDYE) issued a statement yesterday pointing out the deadly danger threatening our country because of the presence of U.S. nuclear arms, which has been recently confirmed officially by the U.S. Government. The statement stresses: "The Americans do not care about us. They make us a nuclear powder keg for the sake of their own interests, and if we vanish from the face of earth it would not matter; Carter's 'Directive 59' on limited nuclear wars would have been implemented. However, if a nuclear warfare breaks out, no one will be saved. The struggle to save our country is a general one." EEDYE appeals to the Greek people, political parties and public representatives to demand the ousting of nuclear arms, the abolition of foreign bases and the implementation of a policy of peace and friendship.

MESIMVRINI Column

[From the "Positions" column]

[Excerpts] The man who until the other day was U.S. President has left his successor, Mr Reagan, a most tedious legacy. One of the many thorny issues that Carter has bequeathed to Reagan is the restoration of justice in Cyprus in particular and in Greek-Turkish relations in general. Carter made many promises, but he did nothing substantive about them. Reagan, who has been very sparing with his promises, has to cope with the explosive nature of the problem, which is the result of its being perpetuated. But it will be strange, although not rare, if things prove the skepticism about the new Republican U.S. President to be wrong--just as the hopes that prevailed about the Democratic President at his start were proved to be wrong.

RIZOSPASTIS 22 Jan

[Exclusive report]

[Text] The unacceptable claims of the Turkish Cypriot leadership as formulated in its recent proposals on Famagusta are the product of U.S. advice. Washington's objective remains to divert the intercommunal talks from the UN framework or drive them into a new deadlock that would facilitate the promotion of "mediatory initiatives" of a partitionist nature.

This assessment, which has been emphasized repeatedly by the Cypriot progressive forces, is confined by additional data on the role and activities of U.S. secret in Cyprus, especially recently. A confidential CIA report on Cyprus' geostrategic importance and its "objective" prospects maintains that: Cyprus belongs to "Turkey's sphere of influence" with which it is linked by "common interests" and its geopolitical position! The report attempts to analyze "the objective data" that make up the course of the Cypriot issue--always in light of U.S.-NATO aims. On this basis, the CIA-propounded theory of the "Turkish sphere of influence" aims at "theoreticlly" consolidating not only the "faits accomplis" of the invasion and occupation of 40 percent of Cypriot territory, but also subsequent and possiblty future Washington moves in the entire problem. In essence, it is an attempt to prove that the UN resolutions to safeguard a nonaligned, independent and sovereign Cypriot state are allegedly "unfeasible" and "unrealistic."

The protocol signed in Sofia at the end of the talks envisages several measures for the more effective implementation of the visa agreement.

OUR RADIO: U.S. FUNDS INTELLIGENCE ORGANIZATION

TA171138 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0700 GMT 17 Jan 81

[Station commentary: "Investing in the Turkish Intelligence Organization"]

[Excerpts] For more than a year now, appropriations in budgets have been curtailed. The ruling circles keep reminding the people that they must tighten their belts. However, dear listeners, one good news report was issued in the press on this subject. In fact, the Turkish Intelligence Organization [MIT]--at a time when there are not enough funds for the Social Security Ministry--has been accorded a budget of 2 billion liras. Did the government believe that by making such a move it could contribute to the solution of the problem of inflation and improve the lot of the people?

How will this money be spent? Apparently to acquire more equipment to be used in torture, eavesdropping and monitoring. Since economic difficulties, all this money could not be provided from domestic resources and it was decided to provide half a billion from foreign sources, that is to say from the United States and the FRG. Let us think for a moment, dear listeners.

MIT which is supposed to defend our national interests against foreign powers by collecting the necessary intelligence, will receive a quarter of its budget from foreign countries. How can this organization fulfill its mission?

How can this organization, which will owe millions of liras to the United States, prevent the destructive activities of the CIA in our country? For a long time now, MIT has been closely cooperating with the intelligence services of the imperialist countries.

Instead of engaging in activities to foil imperialist threats, it has concentrated all its strength on oppressing the progressive forces and plotting to obscure plans.

Let us recall the May Day incidents of 1977 in which 34 patriots were killed. This bloody plot was the work of MIT. It was planned by it as a bloody massacre. It is the experts of MIT who are now conducting all the tortures on detained progressives, socialists, and communists. MIT is linked to NATO and is directly run by it. The junta government has refrained from taking any action against MIT. Thus policemen as well as U.S. and FRG agents that have infiltrated into the organization are freely conducting their activities. Certain sections of MIT were involved in various terror incidents in the past. These perpetrators are still keeping their posts.

Unless the antipeople elements of MIT are dealt with, the violent incidents and political murders can never be completely clarified, and no effective measures can be taken against political terrorism.

VOTCP WARNS OF REAGAN'S CONFRONTATION POLICY

TA220955 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 22 Jan 81

[Station commentary: "The New U.S. President and Turkey"]

[Text] The new U.S. President, Reagan, has assumed office. All the sensible circles in Europe and the world followed with concern Reagan's attitude toward detente and disarmament during his election campaign. This concern grows even more now that the representatives of the arms monopolies, NATO's ex-Commander Haig and the former CIA chief are included in the new U.S. administration.

Reagan's inauguration speech and the remarks by the former NATO commander who has been made secretary of state show that the United States will further escalate its policy of confrontation in the international field. It is being said in Western Europe that with the Reagan administration, the pressures on the other NATO countries to increase armament will be intensified. While certain NATO countries such as the Netherlands, Belgium and Denmark consider an increase of 3 percent too high in their military spending, Haig claims this increase is too small. The United States is resorting to anti-Sovietism and the lies of a Soviet threat even more in order and to make the other NATO countries agree to its pressures about arms spending. For this purpose, it is undermining the disarmament talks. It is refraining from approving the SALT II agreement. Haig is openly talking about using arms. Reagan is saying: If our interests are threatened we might use nuclear arms.

The United States' policy of confrontation and strategy of nuclear war is a great threat to our region, because the United States has declared the Middle East and the Persian Gulf a vital interest region. For quite a while now the Pentagon has been preparing plans of military intervention in this region. On the other hand, Turkey is included in the plans to have U.S. mobile forces transferred to the region. It is also included in the plans to extend NATO's influence beyond its member countries. As a result of these plans, the United States has increased its pressures On Turkey. It is trying to turn Turkey into imperialism's gendarme force in the region.

While talking about aid to Turkey before the U.S. Senate committee, Haig said: You are either with us or you are not. We will give you great support but we will ask for a great bill; you will have new duties in the Gulf region. The meaning of these remarks is very clear. As pointed out by several liberal and sensible journalists, U.S. imperialism considers our country a tool it can use in its military adventures.

The aim of U.S. imperialism and of the imperialist monopolies is not to extract Turkey from the present deep crisis. By saying "We will not let the FRG grab Turkey," Haig made it clear that the United States and the FRG see Turkey as a new colony, which is a matter of bargaining between them.

The situation in the Middle East, in our region, is so critical that general Evern had to stress it at a public address in Konya. However, Evren and the junta do not say where this threat comes from. Furthermore, they increase their persecution of our country's progressive, patriotic and peaceful forces, which point out the source of this threat.

Meanwhile, with their provocations and anti-Sovietism, the reactionary forces in the country are preparing conditions in which Turkey can be dragged into military adventures. The likes of Aral, the Bursa regional martial law commander, the owners of the daily TERCUMAN and similar circles are trying to conceal the fact that the threat in the region is a result of U.S. imperialism's plans by making continuous anti-Soviet and anticommunist propaganda.

The Soviet Union's foreign policy is based on peace and on the development of relations among countries in the region and the world based on mutual interests and equality. It is based on the taking of new steps toward disarmament. Comrade, Brezhnev's five-point proposal for the Persian Gulf is new and clear proof of that.

The development of the relations between our country and the Soviet Union is to the benefit of our national interests as well as of peace in the region and the world. The question facing our country now is: either to become a tool of Reagan's and U.S. imperialism's policy of confrontation and to be dragged into military adventures, or to pursue an independent and peaceful foreign policy. Our people, the progressive and patriotic forces of our country are opting for the second alternative.

VOTCP DENOUNCES SLANDERING IRAN ON HOSTAGE ISSUE

TA230910 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 23 Jan 81

[Station commentary: "The Noise About the U.S. Hostages Cannot Cover the Crime of the Shah and the White House"]

[Excerpts] Dear listeners, undoubtedly the release of the U.S. hostages in Iran is the main topic being discussed by the world media. An agreement reached between Iran and the United States evisages the freeing of Iranian assets of $8 billion out of an amount of $24 billion that is due to the Iranian people.

There is no point in going into the details of what has happened or in defending the detention of the employees of a diplomatic mission as hostages. However, we would like to discuss the typical attitude of the Western media and the bourgeois press organs in our country toward this issue. In an effort to slander the Iranian people and their revolution, a bourgeois propaganda campaign has been initiated in a bid to give the world public a biased impression and picture the Iranians as barbarians. The Khomeyni administration has been accused of violating international laws, and concessions made by the Carter administration have been blown up.

While doing this, the Western media has preferred to keep silent about the years of U.S. support for the bloodstained reign of the shah and the murders he committed through Savak-- under CIA guidance--that cost about 100,000 lives; about the fact that for years the country's natural resources were exploited by U.S. firms; or about the fact that in spite of the agreement reached for the release of the hostages, none of the more than 30 U.S. warships equipped with modern conventional and nuclear weapons have been recalled from the Gulf area near Iran, which U.S. imperialism has declared an area of vital interest, intensifying its military presence despite the threat to world peace. However, all these efforts are in vain. The demogogy about the U.S. hostages issue will not cover the crimes of the shah, the White House or imperialism.

WALLOON RALLY, FRENCH-SPEAKING FRONT FORM ALLIANCE

LD231623 Brussels LE SOIR in French 21 Jan 81 pp 1, 2

[Text] Monday night at the Auderghem Cultural Center, the French-Speaking Front [FDF] General Council adopted by 171 votes to 10 with 13 abstentions the institutional "platform" drawn up by the FDF-Walloon Rally [RW] standing delegation. This institutional plan had already been ratified by the RW Federal Bureau on Saturday. The text was adopted unaltered.

"The text's supporters," FDF President Mrs Antoinette Spaak commented, "declared themselves extremely anxious to conduct the battle which is ensuing in favor of autonomy for Brussels and Wallonia within a renewed framework of the Belgian state, and to conduct it with the RW in such a way as to represent, within the French community, a political force capable of pressuring the other parties." For Mrs Spaak, it is essentially a question of changing strategy. She insisted on agreement between the text adopted and the resolutions of last June's FDF congress.

An adjournment motion, lodged at the beginning of the session, was rejected. "Deputy Pierre Havelange's amendments were rejected by majorities similar to the final vote," Secretary General Georges Desir explained.

"Our two groups are very keen to get on with the real work now which is that of explaining to the electorate what we explained to our members," Mrs Spaak added.

For the FDF president, this joint institutional text is the alternative which is to be presented to the French-speaking community.

It is up to the three regions to decide which form seems to them most compatible with their interests and their dignity: "There is no reason why the largest community should impose the shape of the state on the smallest community. One day there will have to be negotiations but in a different way," Mrs Spaak reemphasized.

In reply to a precise question on eventual election results. the FDF president replied that it was not out of the question that the FDF would refuse a government seat.

"That will be a subject for negotiation at the level of the two parties when the problem arises. We are reserving for ourselves the choice, unlike the RW."

"We are probably going to have to face elections in the coming months, and it is important to give public opinion the feeling that there is an alternative, not only that of the traditional parties. Perhaps we will manage to persuade the RW that it is more useful to be inside a system in order to try to transform it than to be a minority on the outside, unless they persuade us to the contrary. This is a problem whichwill be solved."

"We will try to draw up joint economic texts but this will certainly take far longer even if one can think of a certain number of points in common."

"There is no question," Mrs Spaak said finally, "of forming a Brussels-Wallonia alliance to impose its views on Flanders."

GOVERNMENT REJECTS PRC APPROACH ON TAIWAN SUBMARINES

LD231527 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 19 Jan 81 p 1

[Sytze van der Zee dispatch: "Belgium Considers Beijing's Move Unfounded"]

[Text] Brussels, 15 January--Belgium has rejected the Chinese Government's approach in connection with the supply of two Dutch submarines to Taiwan, a Belgian Foreign Ministry spokesman announced.

According to him, the Chinese approach to the nine EEC countries--excluding The Netherlands--is irrelevant both in form and content.

Last week, the ambassadors representing these countries were summoned to the Foreign Ministry in Beijing, where a vice minister asked them to urge The Netherlands, through their governments, to reverse the decision on the submarine deliveries. When they arrived at the ministry the ambassadors observed that their Dutch colleagues had not been invited. Since they had been summoned together as EC representatives the approach would have only counted if all 10 had been invited, according to the Belgian spokesman.

Otherwise the Chinese should have made an individual approach. However, according to the spokesman, the Chinese move was also unfounded as regards content, since arms sales do not concern the EC but are strictly a national matter. For these reasons Belgium will not comply with the Chinese request and will inform the Beijing government of the fact immediately. The spokesman also stressed that in any event Belgium wishes to avoid a conflict with the PRC.

In this connection, he denied that Belgium also wishes to supply weapons to Taiwan--obsolete Starfighters, among other things. He said that Belgium is not supplying any weapons or military equipment to countries to which it has not given diplomatic recognition, such as Taiwan and North Korea. The same applies to unrecognized regimes such as Babrak Karmal's Afghan regime, although Afghanistan is recognized as a country.

PRC PRESS ATTACHE DEPLORES SUBMARINE SALE TO TAIWAN

[Own correspondent report: "China Is Also Turning Companies Away"]

[Text] The Hague--In addition to diplomatic steps, China is also taking economic measures against The Netherlands as long as the government stands by its decision on the supply of two submarines to Taiwan, Shen Zhihuan, the press attache at the Chinese Embassy in The Hague, announced at a press conference on Monday [19 January]. The decision has serious repercussions on cooperation in the cultural, economic and scientific spheres, according to the Chinese spokesman.

Shen Zhihuan said that a number of existing contracts with Dutch companies have already been canceled. With regard to a Chinese contract with Shell, however, he could give no details. According to him, the Chinese oil corporation has informed Shell that under present circumstances there is no point in pursuing contacts over participation by Shell in prospecting for oil in China.

The Chinese spokesman said that whether things remained at this stage or whether further measures are taken depends on the Dutch Government. Shen Zhihuan did not rule out the possibility of diplomatic relations being broken off completely subsequent to their reduction to charge d'affaires level. However he refused to speculate on that and said that he placed all his hopes on the Dutch parliament's ability to change the government's mind. As is known, the chamber is to discuss the controversial decision with the government this week.

Shen Zhihuan described the government decision not to withdraw the go-ahead for the supply of the submarines as "shocking." "After the recent visit by Prime Minister van Agt and Foreign Minister van der Klaauw there was no reason to expect that ties between our countries would be strengthened, in the trade sphere among others. However to our great regret the government decided to supply the submarines to Taiwan directly after the visit. That will have a negative effect on our relations, and not just our diplomatic relations," according to Shen Zhihuan.

He recalled that in 1972 The Netherlands had recognized the Chinese view that Taiwan is a Chinese province. Relations were then raised to ambassadorial level. Now that The Netherlands reneged on that bargain, we have been forced to reduce our relations to their pre-1972 level, according to the Chinese spokesman.

He strongly attacked Prime Minister van Agt who, in a press conference last Friday following the cabinet meeting, announced that the supply of the submarines had been discussed during his visit to China with Van der Klaauw. His own earlier statements, the statements made by Van der Klaauw and by Dutch Ambassador to Beijing Kneppelhout show that what Van Agt said on Friday is not true, Shen Zhihuan said.

Minister van der Klaauw had already explained last weekend that Van Agt was clearly confused because trade relations with Taiwan were discussed with the Chinese in Beijing. Shen Zhihuan stated that on that occasion the Chinese had clearly pointed to what they regarded as the limit when third countries traded with "their province." The limit rests with arms. On Monday evening Prime Minister van Agt's spokesman expressed the view on this subject that the prime minister's statements are clearly strongly resented by the Chinese. A reply is being studied.

At the press conference on Monday the Chinese spokesman also criticized the role played by the United States in the Dutch Government's decision. It can be concluded from the fact that The Netherlands asked the United States for advice and received it, that the United States thought The Netherlands could go ahead. Should the Americans themselves supply weapons to Taiwan in the future, we will not take the attitude we are now taking with the Netherlands, according to Shen Zhihuan.

On Thursday, the chamber's standing Foreign Affairs Committee will discuss the submarine question with Van der Klaauw and Economic Affairs Minister van Aardenne. After that there might be another chamber debate in which everything depends on whether more party members will side with the seven Christian Democratic Appeal [CDA] deputies who are already opposing the deal. CDA circles doubt that they will.

PRESS COMMENTS ON U.S.-IRAN AGREEMENT, FRG ROLE

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU Commentary

DW231225 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 23 Jan 81 p 3

[Commentary by Washington correspondent signed -Ter: A Little Back Door"]

[Text] In his bargaining for the release of the hostages, former U.S. President Jimmy Carter accepted a number of commitments which still have to be fulfilled. Part of the agreement is the transfer of another $4 billion to Iran or to a trust account, the annullment of about 300 damage claims by private firms which are pending in U.S. courts, as well as the general renunciation by the hostages and their families of restitutional claims. The temptation is great for Carter's successor Reagan not to adhere to these agreements. What can happen? The hostages are free.

It is all too plain that a certain side is exerting pressure on the new administration. The WALL STREET JOURNAL, an organ usually representing the interests of American bankers, wrote very frankly that the government ought to declare the agreement with the kidnapers null and void. The new secretary of state, Alexander Haig, has not yet given his opinion. On the second day of the Reagan administration, it was said in the White House and in the State Department that the agreement will be thoroughly examined. There was no mention of the option of a pullback, nor of the fact that an international agreement automatically continues to exist in the event of a change in government. A backdoor remained open.

It would be, to be sure, a tragedy if the first official action of significance undertaken by the new U.S. Government were to be a violation of an agreement. This would be regrettable not only with respect to vague albeit desirable ethics for interstate relations (ethics to which the United States kept referring in its condemnation of the Tehran kidnapping), but also in context with future developments in Iran and in the entire region of the Persian Gulf. The forces which ultimately attained the release of the hostages would then be left as dupes. In that case, Reagan would have introduced himself into world politics in a strange way: with a cheap trick out of the bag of wild West stunts.

Further Press Comment

DW231130 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 23 Jan 81

[From the press review]

[Text] Discussing the now known detention conditions of the hostages in Tehran, the editorial of STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN says in part: In all the outrage, helplessness and despair over the cruel poker game played by Iran with the United States for [illegible] days, there was at least one consolation: The pictures which Tehran published from time to time allowed the hope that, all psychological torture notwithstanding, the prisoners were at least unharmed and in good health. Thus, serious suspicions about tortures were dispelled time and again. All this now turns out to have been but a cynical farce. The certainty about their compatriots' ordeal is grist for the mill of all those people in the United States who advocate the view that after the release, President Reagan is not committed to the agreements concluded by his predecessor with Iran. Outrage at the Iranian cynics is comprehensible, but lust for vengeance is out of place. A violation of an agreement by Washington would entail serious consequences.

Hannoversche ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG advocates this view: Actually, the reports on the torturing of the U.S. hostages during their detention in Iran are not suprising. Such excesses against helpless people had to be taken for granted in a country which is in such a revolutionary mood and in which there is no such thing as an orderly state power.

After all, people for a time feared that some of the hostages might even be murdered. Nevertheless, the agitation which has gripped the United States is understandable now that the worst assumptions have been confirmed by the released hostages. Torture in whatever form is one of the most despicable methods of humiliating people and making them submissive.

The Essen RUHR-ZEITUNG assesses the remarks of former President Carter concerning a German contribution toward the negotiations on the release of the hostages: Many people have known about it, all of them kept silent, but now Carter has come out with it. The Federal Republic played an essential role in the release of the Americans from the dungeons of the Iranians. It gave tacit help, aided in moving and set the proper switches in the proper direction. Jimmy Carter, who was not treated with any particular gentleness by official Bonn during his 4-year term of office, paid an extraordinary compliment to German politics. He expressed America's respect for an alert German diplomacy. Jointly with Bonn's ambassador to Tehran, Hans-Dietrich Genscher loosened up hardened fronts, constantly probed opportunities and was never discouraged by setbacks. It is a political event indeed that the Bonn of Helmut Schmidt selflessly helped the Americans in difficult times. The German help will count when the time comes to delineate the U.S.-Europe relationship under the new president.

BREMER NACHRICHTEN stresses: The German share in the emergence of the negotiations between Iranian, Algerian and American diplomats and banking experts really should remain as secret as Carter demanded, for many a party involved in the matter will surely not want publicity for political or other reasons. It is good and proper that Bonn offered its good offices. We can be heppy that they were successful. We should leave it at that.

GENSCHER HOLDS 1-HOUR TALK WITH CYRUS VANCE

LD231315 Hamburg DPA in German 1222 GMT 23 Jan 81

[Text] Bonn, 23 Jan (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Genscher today received Cyrus Vance, former U.S. secretary of state, for a 1-hour talk. According to the Foreign Ministry, their talk marked the continuation of the friendly and personal exchanges of views which Genscher always has had with Vance. They discussed a number of political questions of mutual interest. It is believed that the happy outcome of the hostage drama in Tehran was one of the main subjects.

DEPUTY VIEWS PLANE FINANCING APEL, POSITION

[Correspondent Kroenig interview with Peter-Kurt Wuerzbach, CDU Bundestag deputy and and member of the Bundestag Defense Committee in Bonn--live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] What we plan to deal with is the Tornado combat plane and the role [Defense Minister] Apel played in the financing dilemma. The political question that arises in this context is whether the politically responsible parties, and that ultimately is the defense minister, earlier should have spotted this gap in financing and brought it to the attention of the public and the Bundestag deputies in the appropriate way. What do you say now that Apel once again has defined his position?

[Answer] In your introduction, you referred to the dilemma and this is exactly what this amounts to; nor is it possible to clear it up today in any form, let alone improve matters. The question is what caused the minister in 1980 either not to give a hoot about the gigantic gap of nearly DM100 million that was piling up or, in spite of being aware of it, not tackling the problem. This explains why he failed to inform us. The Defense Committee, comprehensively and fully last December and now admits, only in the face of reminders of certain conferences and protocols, admits in a fragmentary way to having received information about it much earlier, namely, in the spring of last year.

[Question] You mean to say that Apel now admits that he should have known about it earlier?

[Answer] With respect to these questions and to the data I outlined, Apel today is entangled in many discrepancies. He admits, unlike his admission of last December, that he saw a lengthy paper in February 1980 which revealed that DM350 million would be lacking for the Tornado project even in 1980. But he said he did not read the paper all the way through because it was too long. After all, he said, you cannot expect a minister to study such a long paper. On the same subject a bit later, he said, and I am rendering this verbatim: Naturally, I read it, but the phrasing was in the subjunctive and, therefore, not yet an alarm signal for me. This plainly shows how unsure of himself the minister is in proceeding on this track and how he is seeking support.

[Question] Apel either simply did not tell the truth in December or proved to be a man of poor memory or he simply has no alternative but to indicate now that he cannot read properly. All this disqualifies him as defense minister, does it not?

[Answer] As far as we are concerned, the suspicion, and that is all it is to date, has grown that he either knowingly delayed and neglected to mention this dilemma because an election year was underway and because he did not want to confront his party and the public with it, or he administered his office as the minister in an incomprehensibly careless fashion. Both of these aspects lumped together disqualify not just ministers. Moreover, in December, he failed totally to mention these developments and their significance and contents when he faced the committees of parliament.

[Question] In view of these findings, therefore, is the CDU/CSU opposition now clearly demanding the minister's resignation?

[Answer] We have not used the word resignation before and do notuse it now. We simply ask him once again today to put the whole truth and nothing but the truth on the table after all these contradictions, and we stress that even though we feel we were very poorly and inadequately informed, we ask him once more to solve these big problems jointly, problems which, after all, are not just financing problems but also considerable problems involving the defense sector of a type we will be facing in all fields.

[Question] You clearly have said that he has disqualified himself. Why the generous indulgence on your part?

[Answer] No indulgence at all, on the contrary, we have asked him a lot of questions and did not spare him at all. He dodged most of them. We will ask Dr Marx, the chairman of the committee to hear the air force inspector in the next session involving these problems. We will ask to question a representative of the Namma Society, to question the Armament Department chief in order to obtain clear, direct and unevasive answers from those directly involved.

[Question] Permit me to formulate my impression once more, namely, that you are treating Apel in an unbelievably mild way, more so than you would or have another minister in another case. I fail to see why you do not simply say on the basis of your information that he must resign. Do you fear that a successor might not be as attractive as Apel?

[Answer] In assessing the overall achievements of Defense Minister Apel, his good sides and the other sides, the result is somewhat negative for us with regard to defense, so that this is not a problem of treating him mildly because another might be worse. That is not the point. We want either clearly to prove or eliminate the suspicion of things he denies. This is why we are acting as I have just outlined.

[Question] But these are no longer presumptions. You said that he admitted having read the paper without fully realizing its meaning. Actually, it is clear that he had prior knowledge, but in December he said he did not know about it.

[Answer] Enormous contradictions have arisen today. We will obtain the protocol next week. Then we will compare the statements and demand some more written reactions from him. Thereafter, new considerations may be made.

[Question] But, as before, you reserve the right for yourself to demand his resignation?

[Answer] There is no talk of resignation. We talk of facts which must be brought out into the open. We say once again, without wanting to spare him, on the contrary, that this is no way to treat parliament. We are offering to solve the defense problems together.

[Question] One word about your colleagues on the Defense Committee who come from the coalition factions, are they as shocked by Apel as you are?

[Answer] I can only give you a very personal impression, namely that many, and some of them very obviously, are shaking their heads over the minister's behavior.

FOREIGN MINISTER INVITED TO VISIT POLAND

LD221522 Hamburg DPA in German 1414 GMT 22 Jan 81

[Text] Bonn, 22 Jan (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has been invited to Warsaw by his Polish counterpart. Minister of State Hildegard Hamm-Brucher announced today during question time in the lower house that the date of the visit is still being settled. In reply to a question from CDU Deputy Herbert Czaja, she stressed that during his visit to Poland the foreign minister will of course also "concern himself with the situation of the Germans living there."

Frau Hamm-Brucher said she objected to the impression that there is a serious decline in the number of persons of German descent leaving Poland. Following temporary drop in the number of resettlers last year, the December figure of 1,116 was almost back to the level reached in July 1980. The Federal Government assumes that the renewed rise in the number of resettlers will continue over the next few months.

"There is no reason to dramatize the matter," stated Frau Hamm-Brucher, pointing out that the maximum of 125,000 resettlers, stipulated in the German-Polish exit protocol of 1975, has in the meantime been exceeded. However, the exit protocol's "clause providing for an increase in the maximum" is still valid.

LE MONDE OUTLINES FRENCH-ANGOLAN INTERESTS

[Jean-Claude Pomonti dispatch: "General Cooperation Agreement With France Could Be Signed in the Medium Term"]

[Text] Luanda--Jean Francois-Poncet returned to Paris on Thursday, 15 January after a 3-day official visit to Angola, which took place in a very cordial atmosphere. He was received by President dos Santos and had several meetings with his Angolan counterpart Paulo Jorge. The French foreign minister, who had previously made a 3-day visit to the Ivory Coast, expressed satisfaction at the "warmth" of the Angolan authorities' welcome. Indeed, at a time when economic cooperation between the two countries is getting off the ground, this visit seems finally to have removed the serious disputes which existed between Paris and Luanda when Angola became independent in 1975 and during the two Shaba wars in 1977 and 1978.

This desire for cooperation and mutual understanding was expressed in a "final statement" which "reaffirms respect for states' independence and political options" and "stresses that economic development is henceforth the priority issue for the whole African Continent."

While both sides understood that this visit would mark "the success of the normalization" of bilateral relations, the chief of French diplomacy possibly did not expect such a sympathetic welcome from interlocutors whose main allies on the international scene are still Cuba and the Soviet Union and who have in the past not always been sympathetic to French policy on the black continent. After all, during the war of independence, Paris' favors went to the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola-National Front for the Liberation of Angola coalition against the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, now in power in Luanda. Less than 3 years ago, following the foreign intervention in Kolwezi, the former president said that "France is an enemy which could attack us at any time."

The Angolans listened carefully to, although not approving, the reasons for French hostility to the Libyan military intervention in Chad and the reasons which led Paris to strengthen its military presence in Africa. Like Tanzania, Mozambique and Zimbabwe, its main "frontline" partners, Angola has noted the halt in French military supplies to the south African republic and welcomes France's approach to central Africa's Portuguese-peaking and English-speaking countries. The "final statement." moreover, stressed the areas of agreement, namely the "shared concern" over the Namibian conflict and the desire to strengthen economic relations between the two countries.

With regard to the latter area, there are promising signs. In 1980, Paris reached contracts worth FR1 billion with Angola. Although there are at present only 200 French nationals in Angola, there will probably be almost 1,000 by the end of the year. The Dumez Company will bring in 300-400 of our compatriots to build two factories capable of supplying around 4,000 prefabricated dwellings every 3 years, a contract worth FR845 million in all. Luanda imported 72,000 tons of wheat and 55,200 tons of flour from France last year.

During his visit, Mr Francois-Poncet was able to visit a Benguela textile factory built by the French between 1977 and 1979. It employs 600 workers and has a production capacity of 16 million meters of cloth per year. Last but not least, ELF-Aquitaine and Total-CFD have gained a foothold in the major oil prospecting market, virtually a U.S.-type monopoly, by obtaining offshore concessions off Luanda and in northern Angola.

This French penetration of the Angolan market, which promises to be important, is really no surprise, however. Before his death in 1979 Agostinho Neto, the "father of independence," started to "open up" to the West. Today, the Angolan leaders explain this phenomenon by their "readiness to work within the framework of economic diversification." They see this as both "evidence of and the condition for" their independence. In addition, they do not want their country, whose independence was so difficult and so costly to achieve, to be too isolated at the continental level and on the international stage.

To some extent, the French are taking advantage of the gap left by the departure of 300,000 Portuguese, during the war, and the absence of diplomatic relations with the United States, which, however, buys most of Angola's oil. While maintaining their preferential relations with Moscow and Havana, especially with the Cubans, who still have several thousand soldiers and voluntary workers in Angola, the Angolan leaders, many of whom are French-speaking, therefore are inclined to establish dialogue with a French Government itself seeking new opening on the African continent. This convergence of interests probably explains the medium-term possibility of a general cooperation agreement between the two capitals.

MITTERRAND CONFIRMED AS PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE

NC241200 Paris AFP in English 1145 GMT 24 Jan 81

[Text] Paris, 24 Jan (AFP)--French Socialist Party leader Francois Mitterrand was today confirmed as the party's candidate in next April's presidential elections.

He won the nomination by a margin of more than 83 per cent in a vote today at an extraordinary conference of the Socialist Party here.

Mr Mitterrand, 64, has twice before stood as presidential candidate for the combined parties of the left and lost both times. This time he will be representing only his own party. The Communists have put up their own candidate.

In 1965 he was defeated by President Charles de Gaulle, standing for a second term, and at the last presidential election in 1974 he lost by a narrow margin to the present incumbent, Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

PCF IS WILLING TO PARTICIPATE IN GOVERNMENT

[Editorial by Rene Andrieu, member of the PCF Central Committee: "To Defeat Those in Power"]

[Text] Among the themes explored by the media, there is one which, like the sea serpent, reemerges from time to time: The Communist Party is unwilling to take part in government. Let us pass over the fact that the same people who make that reproach one day do not hesitate to accuse us of the opposite if the occasion arises.

But since we are being challenged on this point from various directions, it may be useful to recall our position, which some people seem to have forgotten.

Our party's Central Committee has just restated it. We are prepared to participate in government to implement a new policy. The idea that our only ambition is to entrench ourselves in opposition is a complete delusion.

Over more than 30 years of our being isolated from government, successive ministers have implemented a policy which history cannot fail to judge severely.

There was the bowing to American domination, the mess over the colonial wars, the repression of the workers' movement and an economic policy which profited only the most privileged. With what result? That of the current president's 7-year term, marked by the doubling of prices and a 250 percent increase in unemployment.

We want to defeat Giscard d'Estaing and we are doing everything to achieve that. But at the same time, it is necessary to thwart maneuvers aimed at continuing his policy at the cost of shedding some ballast.

The best way to achieve this goal is to ensure the greatest possible number of votes for Georges Marchais. It is the Communist candidate's score in the first round which will be decisive as regards the eventual outcome.

From this viewpoint, the Eure byelection was very instructive. The first round, notable for our candidate's appreciable progress (a further 1.62 percent added to a gain of 6 percent in 1978), was confirmed by the second round when our candidate improved his percentage (47.5 percent as against 44.8 percent in 1978).

That is the essential thing. But another aspect cannot be ignored. That is, the fact that the insufficient transfer of Socialist votes led to the reelection of the RPR. As LE FIGARO notes with satisfaction: "This time, many Socialist voters gave their votes to the majority's candidate, while others chose either to abstain or to return blank voting papers."

J. Poperen, PS national secretary, rather ill at ease, admits this lapse, but regards it as legitimate in view of our criticisms of the Socialist leaders. Here he displays imprudence at best, since L'UNITE and Francois Mitterrand seemed to be engaged in a contest of anticommunism this week, the PS first secretary having again confided to a rightwing newspaper that Georges Marchais is "as thick as thieves" with Giscard, just another way of taking part in the campaign for the second round in Eure.

As is known, the Socialist leaders sometimes accuse us of lacking the virtues of republican discipline. But apparently they are not content with having rejected it so often in the past themselves. Today their attitude shows yet again that they understand it chiefly when it operates in one direction. It is as if they think they have the right to claim our votes and deny us theirs, to consider criticism legitimate when it is aimed at us and intolerable when it comes from us. This view is more indicative of feudal ways than of democracy in our day.

It is possible to defeat those in power. But it is also necessary to thwart diverse attempts to create Giscardism without Giscard. It is not Michel Debre who dreams of a "government of public salvation" broadened by Socialists. In this respect, he comes close to expressing the wishes voiced by Giscard himself in 1974. The best way to capsize the operation is to vote Communist in the presidential elections.

PCF JOURNALISTS REPUDIATE 'SLANDER' BY MEDIA

[Statement by staff of L'HUMANITE and L'HUMANITE DIMANCHE: "L'HUMANITE, organ of the party"]

[Excerpt] On the eve of the presidential election, the major information media have launched a violent campaign aimed at discrediting the communist press and journalists.

From extreme rightwing newspapers to those falsely claiming to be on the left, it is a question of who will sink lowest into insults, insinuation and slander.

Quite recently, LE MATIN insisted on playing a particular role in this attack on the only national daily party organ in France, which is financially independent.

We realize very well that a trial of ideas is being conducted against us. We are conducting it ourselves with regard to our political adversaries and we do not ask other journalists to share our opinions.

The intolerable and dishonorable thing is to substitute slander, gossip and anonymous and uncontrolled information in this necessary debate. The job of informing must not be confused with that of indicating. This mixing of categories seems to us strongly contrary to what certain people call journalistic ethics.

L'HUMANITE and L'HUMANITE DIMANCHE are the PCF's central organs. Their vocation, their raison d'etre is to express and defend the policy defined by the PCF, for example, at present to struggle so that Georges Marchais, its presidential election candidate, wins the greatest number of votes. Their journalists are not just professionals. If they have chosen freely to work for L'HUMANITE, it is because they are Communists.

Thus, they consider that they are entitled to respect. They are also entitled to denounce publicly the campaign of slander conducted against them by false reporting.

YUGOSLAV COMMUNISTS CONFER WITH MARCHAIS, GREMETZ

LD231601 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 20 Jan 81 p 9

[Text] Alexandar Grlickov, member of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia [LCY] Presidium, was in France from 18 through 20 January. During his visit, A. Grlickov, accompanied by Dusko Popovski, Yugoslav ambassador to France, had talks with Georges Marchais and Maxime Gremetz at PCF headquarters.

The meeting made possible a profound, reciprocal briefing on the situation in the two countries as well as a broad exchange of views on the main international problems, notably the nonalignment policy, the question of detente in the world and in Europe and the new international order.

The talks, whith took place in an atmosphere of friendship and mutual understanding, provides an opportunity to reassert the common will to develop relations of friendship between the LCY and the PCF, as well as to strengthen cooperation between the two parties in the struggle for peace, disarmament, national independence, democracy and socialism.

REAGAN TELEPHONES PREMIER FORLANI TO DISCUSS TIES

[Text] Rome, 22 Jan (ANSA)--Just hours after his formal inauguration as President of the United States, Ronald Reagan telephoned Italian Premier Arnaldo Forlani to stress his (?intent) to strengthen ties of friendship and cooperation between the two countries. The telephone conversation lasted around half an hour and was held directly in English.

Reagan warmly greeted the Italian leader over the phone and stressed his administration's wish to further consolidate ties with its Western allies, which include Italy. The new White House chief said that his telephone call was not a mere symbolic gesture but a demonstration of his determination to strengthen the close ties of cooperation between the United States and Italy. Reagan also took this opportunity to thank Italy for its help in bringing the hostage ordeal to a happy conclusion.

GISCARD D'ESTAING MEETS WITH PERTINI, FORLANI

AU231552 Rome ANSA in English 1530 GMT 23 Jan 81

[Text] Rome, 23 Jan (ANSA)--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, who arrived here on an official visit last night, met this morning with Italian head of state Sandro Pertini.

With Pertini, Giscard d'Estaing discussed bilateral and community problems. The Italian president also thanked the French people for the aid they gave victims of an earthquake which struck southern Italy on November 23.

Giscard also met with Premier Arnaldo Forlani last night and again this morning. The two men discussed the social, economic and political situations in the two countries and the situation in the Mediterranean area. With regard to the Community, they discussed the EEC budget and structural policies. At the end of their meeting, Forlani said that agreement was noted on a wide range of problems having to do with security, international cooperation, the role of Europe and its future prospects.

Italy and France are a decisive part of liberty and their right to peaceful coexistence from all internal and external threats, Forlani said. For his part, Giacard said that cordiality, friendship and solidarity should be the rules governing relations between the two countries.

He took pains to assure his listeners that France had no intention of promoting another Guadalupe-type summit that excluded Italy. There will be no more summits except the one already planned for Ottawa in July among the seven most industrialized nations (Italy included).

The French President also gave assurances of French aid in the fight against terrorism, stating that cooperation between the two countries in this sector will be bolstered.

Summary of Talks

LD231940 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 23 Jan 81

[Text] The second day in Rome of President Valery Giscard d'Estaing of France has ended with an intensive series of talks. At the seat of government this morning, Forlani, the president of the Council of Ministers, and his French interlocutor reviewed all the main topics of the current international scene.

The talks contributed to dispelling Italian doubts and perplexities regarding the possible repetition of a summit of the most industrialized countries excluding Italy. The French president said, on the contrary, that Paris is not considering fresh summits of the seven before the Ottawa one, to which Italy has also been invited. In a subsequent press statement, the French president insisted on there being solidarity between France and Italy: solidarity against terrorism is essential, solidarity inside the European Economic Community is vital. There was also discussion of the problems arising from the diplomatic and military initiatives of Colonel al-Qadhdhafi of Libya. (?These problems) are not foreseen (?in Italy) for the moment. After the talks at the seat of government, Giscard d'Estaing was the guest of [President] Sandro Pertini at the presidential palace. Useful talks were held. In an interview with FIGARO, the Italian president said he spoke frankly with Giscard because the French treat the Italians with a certain air of superiority. It is necessary to work to forge more intense relations between the two countries, Pertini said.

President Valery Giscard d'Estaing was subsequently received for an audience with Pope John Paul II. His departure for Paris is scheduled for tomorrow morning.

Giscard-Pertini Communique

LD232250 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 23 Jan 81

[Excerpt] One thing that can be said straight away about Giscard d'Estaing's visit to Italy is that at its conclusion the relations between our countries--Italy and France--are closer and more cordial than before.

Let us go over the order of events. Giscard d'Estaing went to the Quirinale today. He had private talks lasting more than 30 minutes with President Pertini, before being his guest for luncheon.

During their cordial talks, says a communique, the two presidents spoke about many topical problems of mutual interest both from the bilateral and community angle, and also made wider reference outside these--to consultation among the industrialized countries.

The president of the republic, adds the communique, used tl opportunity to thank Valery Giscard d'Estaing and the French people for the generous contribution made to the relief and reconstruction work in the areas affected by the recent earthquake.

President Pertini then accepted an invitation from Giscard d'Estaing to pay an official visit to France, to take place in the second half of the year, according to the spokesman of the Presidency of the French Republic.

PERTINI SAYS RED BRIGADES 'BRAIN CENTER' ABROAD

AU241400 Rome ANSA in English 0845 GMT 24 Jan 81

[Text] Rome, 24 Jan (ANSA)--An interview Italian chief of state Sandro Pertini granted to French television Wednesday has suddenly become the focal issue of political debate, with the major parties each drawing conclusions in harmony with their various political stances.

Pertini had said that the brain-center of the Red Brigades urban guerrilla organization is abroad. "There are those who have an interest in destabilizing Italy, as they have an interest in destabilizing Turkey", a country, he observed, which has a thousand kilometer-long border in common with the Soviet Union.

On Thursday, the Communist Party tabled a question in Parliament calling on the government to report on what information it has thus gar fathered on international terrorist links and subversion in Italy. A similar motion was tabled by the secretary of the right-of-center Liberal Party, Valerio Zanone.

Meanwhile, the Social Democrat Party daily UMANITA today carries an editorial harshly polemical towards the Communists asking, "how the Communist Party will react to the presicent's statements".

The Socialist Party mouthpiece L'AVANTI asserted, for its part, that "the president's clear words" will serve both to track down the "roots of terrorism" and create difficulties for the communists. The paper went on to say that the Communist Party will have to explain why it attacked, for example, Socialist Senator Silvano Signori, who, the paper claimed, has often denounced "subversion's international links and Leninist ideology".

The government was called on to take an "unequivocal position" on this issue by representatives of opposite sides of the Italian political spectrum, the neofascist MSI Party and the radical leftist Proletarian Unity Party.

Observers here now see the problem of international terrorist links dominating the political debate in the days ahead. On Tuesday, in fact, the Senate will hold a debate on the recent Red Brigades kidnapping and subsequent release of Judge Giovanni D'Urso and it is likely that the discussion will move from the domestic front to the broader international terrorist scene.

Berlinguer Disputes Pertini

[Text] Rome, 26 Jan (ANSA)--Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer has once again proposed his party's candidacy as a promoting force giving maximum guarantees for a new government armed with the best energies of Italian democracy. He made the proposal here Sunday in a speech marking the party's sixtieth birthday.

Berlinguer said that the situation in Italy was rapidly deteriorating due to a chain of recent scandals, the inefficient handling of the November 23 earthquake catastrophe that hit the nation's south and the yielding of government leaders to terrorist blackmail during the D'Urso affair. Judge Giovanni D'Urso was kidnapped and released earlier this month by Red Brigade terrorists.

Turning to remarks made by head of state Sandro Pertini to the effect that Italian terrorism had links outside the country if it was not actually masterminded from abroad, Berlinguer said that in a matter of such importance it impinged on everyone to be as clear and precise as possible. If facts came to light which indicated that foreign states were involved in Italian terrorist acts, the necessary consequences on a political and diplomatic level must be drawn, he said. If there are no such facts to back up suspicions of foreign complicity, then it was inopportune to make statements that could harm Italy's international relations, Berlinguer stated.

He labelled as unworthy and unjustifiable the fact that groundless suspicions were being instrumentalized for internal ends and accused the Socialist and Social Democrats of promoting, along with the rightists, an anti-Communist campaign.

He wondered if this campaign was only a diversionary tactic to make the public forget about the government's bowing to terrorist demands during the D'Urso affair, or whether it aimed at creating the anti-Communist climate of the fifties, as part of an attempt to shift the country to the right.

Berlinguer said he could not believe that the Socialists were willing to play second fiddle to the DC indefinitely [illegible] in the front ranks of an anti-Communist campaign.

"What is certain is that there is no campaign or maneuver capable of making Italians forget the exigencies" that are at the basis of the (?new) Communist line, he concluded.

PCI'S PAJETTA MEETS WITH KORDESTAN PARTY LEADER

PCI'S NATTA DEMANDS POLITICAL LEADERSHIP CHANGE

LD231043 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 19 Jan 81 pp 1-2

[Renzo Callsigoli report on PCI Secretariat member Alessandro Natta 18 January speech in Livorno: "Force Ready for Leading the Country"]

[Excerpts] Livorno--From the San Marco theater to the Goldoni theater, a great procession crossed the center of Livorno, while several hundred more communists marched from the Piazza Dell'Accademia, tracing in reverse the path which the founders of the PCI walked 60 years ago on 21 January 1921. The day--cold but very sunny--began at 0930, when a crowd of communists carrying red flags and banners thronged the city center to gather at the Goldoni theater, where Alessando Natta delivered a speech.

Natta recalled the importance and scale of our history, from the Lione congress--which, with Gramsci, marked an exceptional step in the quest for a specific and original path to socialism--to the 1944 turning point in Salerno, when Togliatti set in motion the building of the new party. To those who express doubts about the well-foundedness and authenticity of our party's strategy and actions, which led at the latest congress to Eurocommunism, the third path and the new internationalism; to those who wonder whether this is simply a matter of tactics on the one hand and disavowals of our past on the other, we reply that to understand the unquestionable innovations and to realize that they do not constitute meaneuvers or improvizations, it is necessary to understand the innovations of 1956 and of the eighth congress. Hence the growth in our strength in the sixties during the center-left experiment, which was supposed to pull the rug from under our feet.

I do not mean, Natta continued, that the plan was fully drawn up on the morrow of the liberation. What I mean is that there has always been an underlying inspiration and that it was from this that he drew courage and strength for innovations and breakaways.

Following our proposal of a democratic alternative to the power system and political leadership of the DC, and following our latest Central Committee meeting, some people have asserted that the difficult problem facing us was how to make the principle of our identify consistent with that of our legitimization.

Basically, Natta said, the implication is that, on the one hand, we are and want to be the Communist Party, that is, we want to safeguard our image, our characteristics, the qualities and features which have made us different from other parties. We have unmistakable traits; moral cleanliness, honesty, a responsible approach to politics and unity--traits which, he said amid applause, we will defend with all our energy. On the other hand, people say to us, how can you reconcile these characteristics with a government role in a capitalist country that belongs to Western Europe and the Atlantic alliance, which implies an alliance with parties so different from yours?

As far as we are concerned, Natta said, I see no problem; there is no contradiction on our part. Our party was an essential driving force behind this republic and behind the constitution which we have helped to form and to defend. We are the political force that most resolutely defends individual and collective freedoms, the laws of the republic, the party system and the institutions. We have shown this once again during the past terrible month when, in the face of the terrorists' attack and the attempts to impose compromises and concessions, others wavered and abdicated their duty to defend the republic, whereas we did not. Even when, many years ago, we opposed our country's entry into a military bloc--as we were quite right to do--we never regarded our international position, our internationalist spirit, as a limitation on our autonomy or freedom of political choice or on the independence or sovereignty of our country in which, Natta emphasized, we feel at home and which we want to maintain safe and secure.

We have expressed our stances more and more clearly and lucidly. For this very reason we have every right to govern, and it is not right that we have lectures delivered to us by those who have based their own power on anticommunist discrimination, as the DC has done, or who are trying to exploit anticommunism to gain political scope or for personal ambitions or calculations. The root of the distortions and constrictions of the political system, which have led to the moral issue, is none other than anticommunist prejudice, on which the DC's centrality and hegemony is based, backed up by its allies' subordinate stance.

And still we are witnessing attempts to resolve the communist issue by ostracizing the PCI so as to initiate an alternative between a DC and a Socialist pole based on a PSI-Italian Social Democratic Party Alliance--a game which has been played for some time but which is now obsolete. At one time it was thought that within the DC an awareness was emerging of the need to regenerate the party and to begin a new political phase of reform and refounding of society. We do not regret, Natta said, having attempted after 1976 a policy of cooperation for objectives of salvation and regeneration. If the demand for a radical change of political leadership in the country now seems justified and persuasive, it is partly because we did not hesitate to accept that test, without responding to partisan calculations, but indeed paying certain prices. The serious mistake and the blame for failing to rise to a great opportunity must be attributed to others, to the DC, worried about losing a single crumb of power, and also the PSI, obsessed with the fear of being squeezed between ourselves and the DC.

Having pointed to the severe criticisms which Berlinguer himself made in the lower house, Natta confirmed the critical verdict on the ambiguous, weak and cowardly conduct of the government and the majority. There was an out-and-out abdication by the government of its duty to indicate a line and to pursue it rigorously in this battle. It has allowed a mockery to be made of the law, thus prompting a sense of disorientation among the public and splits among the democratic forces, among the media and within the magistracy; and terrorism has been allowed to draw new breath, so that it is now announcing further bloodthirsty actions.

Approaching his conclusion, Natta confirmed that there is no possible alternative to the one which we are indicating, though the path will be difficult because of the splits that exist on the left, because of the disagreement with the PSI over what policy to pursue in defense of the system of democracy and freedom. It is a matter of holding an open debate, without preconceptions, with a desire to eludicate matters. The situation is serious, but we can make progress if we set in motion a major political movement in connection with the country's major problems, so as to provide answers to people's real needs; if we impart new vigor to relations with the masses; and if we develop a policy of alliances with everyone who is demanding good government, efficient democracy and the regeneration of society.

PSOE SECRETARY GENERAL DISCUSSES POLITICAL SCENE

LD231513 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 18 Jan 81 p 7

[Jose Luis Martinez report: "PSOE Is in Least Bad Shape for Governing Country"]

[Excerpt] Madrid, 17 Jan--Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez reported this morning at a 2-hour press conference on the decisions made by the PSOE's Executive Committee at its last meeting, on 15-16 January. The Socialist leadership has laid down a program of political activities and priorities for 1981: "A strategy planned," according to the socialist leader, "without dissociating it from the 1983 election and without forgetting that this could be brought forward--something to which we are opposed."

The PSOE secretary general made a pessimistic analysis of the country's social and economic situation, and described the present centrist government's neoliberal practice as strictly conservative. "Suarez and his cabinet are making beneficial response to the population on the deterioration of the economic system and the rise in the overall unemployment figures," he commented. He stated that the strategy was studied "on the basis of an analysis of the social and economic situation ranging from the rise in charges [for public services], the liberalization of interest rates and the framework agreement to the reorganization of the sectors in a state of crisis. There has been no reaction by the new government to the crisis situation or any impact on the part of employment policy. We believe that there could be 2.5 million unemployed in 1982, and this would be a dangerous scenario in a situation of 'normality' in implementing the constitution and democracy, even with respect to the election."

Three Aims: Institutional, Social Action and Internal Organization

The PSOE's strategy for this year concerns three fields of activity: the institutional field (parliaments and municipal councils); social action; and the PSOE's internal organization. Felipe Gonzalez maintained that, once parliament establishes priorities for action, these will impart a new dynamic to the chambers, with the aim of their exercising not only their legislative functions but also supervision of the government. We will raise specific matters--even obscure matters such as the affair of the Sarria Hotel in Barcelona--concerning which we expect an explanation from the government," he stated.

It is hoped that the municipal councils will plan investments to create jobs and co-operate in drafting the new local government law. The government will be urged to give priority to municipal councils on the outskirts of large cities, to some municipal councils of tourist resorts which are experiencing major financial difficulties, and to those which are not being aided because they have leftwing majorities.

Economy: Policy of Consultation

In the economic and social fields, the PSOE will press for a policy of consultation to be practiced in our country. He explained in this connection that the workers cannot be allowed to lose purchasing power in the negotiations on agreements. He declared himself so emphatically in favor of economic and social consultation (framework agreement) that he stated that the PSOE would support it even in the hypothetical event of the socialist trade union's not wanting it.

Crisis of the Parties

As was to be expected, the Socialist leader referred to the present crisis of identity which the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] and the PCE are undergoing. However, he did not wish to refer to them in wounding terms. He states that his organization had already experienced that situation and that he deemed it very natural that it should be occurring in those parties: "We have studied these situations from the viewpoint of the repercussions which they could have on the overall situation."

He described this crisis as having three aspects: the ideological aspect, which in the case of the PCE is the question of the soundness of the basis for Eurocommunisim, and, in the case of the UCD, the bringing of a party which was a makeshift party [partido de aluvion] for electoral reasons in line with the principle of democracy; the generation aspect, which mainly affects the historical parties, such as the PCE and the PSOE (the leadership changes to bring in new generations had already occurred in the Socialist Party at the beginning of the seventies, he said); and the organizational aspect, since the new state of the autonomies requires a process of federalizing the parties themselves. "The crisis in the UCD worries us because of the country's governability, because we observe that it could be a crisis which will once more call the government into question and place it in a situation similar to that which it experienced last spring as a result of the motion of censure," he said. He added that with these crises in the parties there is the danger that the impression will be given that the parties are incapable of emerging from these situations of conflict, "and this would be grave with respect to institutionalizing democracy."

"No" to Early Election

At several points during the press conference he declared himself opposed to an early election because the strategy formulated by the PSOE was designed on the assumption that the normal electoral period will be observed. But in the event that the UCD decide to bring the election forward, Felipe Gonzalez stated that it is his party which is "in least bad shape for assuming government responsibilities. The PSOE has an adequate technical apparatus, and, as far as ability to govern is concerned, it is history which must judge."

With respect to the next election, he expressed the opinion that the political forces which will compete electorally in 1983 will finally take shape next spring, and, without being specific, he made a veiled allusion to the possibility of some new political party, midway between the UCD and the PSOE, emerging. "This would serve to prevent a confrontation between right and left, as some prominent politicians wish," he added.

"This Government is Rightwing"

He described the government's policy as neoliberal and rightwing. "We must ask ourselves why interest rates are being liberalized and why electricity charges are rising." ("Apparently--and we are still investigating this--by 70 percent in a year," he commented.) "I do not believe that there is any explanation other than the concealment of other intentions. This neoliberal temptation on the part of the government is incompatible with the creation of employment by means of a policy of consultation," he asserted. He expressed the opinion that the present government will be unable to resolve unemployment and that the rise in interests rates will ruin many enterprises.

In connection with these opinions, he stated at another point that there is an attempt to make the UCD more rightwing to enable those who are to the right of that organization to hold power. Felipe Gonzalez maintained that the Socialist Party's electoral spectrum could be broadened as a result of this policy.

"No" to NATO, "Yes" to U.S. Bases

Once more he declared himself opposed to Spain's entry into NATO. He referred at the very beginning of the press conference to the recent assertions by the future U.S. secretary of state, General Haig, of his great interest in Spain's entry into the EEC and NATO. "I believe that these are two issues which are so substantially different--and one of them is so far outside his scope--that this gives me the impression that they are confusing elements and are in fact demonstrating an intention at the global strategic level which seems to us crucial [delicada] for our our country's evolution," he stated in this connection.

He stated that he fears that there will be a major manipulation of the issue of Spain's entry into NATO. He explained that the PSOE opposes membership for reasons concerning the security and welfare of the Spanish people, although it does wish to retain the present status quo (that is, with the presence of the U.S. bases in Spain). He highlighted his reasons in explaining the desirability of Spain's playing a role aimed at detente in Europe and not entering into the strategy of tension.

"Punset's Conduct Positive"

With respect to the U.S. bases in Spain, he stated that his party's stance is not positive, "but we are in favor of these installations, although this does not mean that this will be a stance forever." He sought to make it very clear that the bilateral treaty with the United States is basically of a military nature, stating that the civilian compensation is meager--only $35 million.

Concerning foreign policy issues, he declared himself in favor of negotiating Spain's entry into the Common Market comprehensively and of visting not only Brussles but also the European power centers, as is being done by Punset, about whom he said that his conduct is more positive than that of the previous minister for relations with the EEC. In order to resolve the armed conflict in El Salvador, he asserted the need for negotiations between the progressive forces and a section of the armed forces anxious to reach agreements.

PRESS COMMENTS ON REAGAN INAUGURAL ADDRESS

LD231655 [Editorial Report] Madrid newspapers published 21 January carry editorials commenting on U.S. President Reagan's inaugural address, generally noting that the time has now come for deeds rather than promises.

Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish after noting the "intense atmosphere of nationalism and glory" at the ceremony and outlining some of the points made in the address, asserts: "There can be little doubt--judging by the ease with which Reagan secured nomination and his overwhelming majority on 4 November--that the great majority of the United States is included in this ceremony, which, more than an inauguration, as it is officially and traditionally termed, seemed one of resurrection, renewal and an attempt at rejuvenation, a Faustian myth." It continues:

"We know that the past never returns, and--with Calderon--that dreams are dreams. We may deduce from this ceremony that it is a matter of inspiring the future on the basis of the old documents which offered the Americans the 'pursuit of happiness,' which was recalled during it. What we can and should hope--and not only for the good of a nation which continues to lead the West's destiny--is that the President, his advisers and those who experienced the elation of the ceremony should soon grasp a sense of reality and of restraint and prefer the actual and still possible greatness of the whole of mankind, to which the United States has already rendered great services, to recovering an ideology of 200 years ago, which was appropriate for a nation which was being born and liberating itself at the same time from other people's rule but which is perhaps petty and outmoded with respect to the present-day idea of supranationality, with the limitations and obligations which are evident."

Madrid YA in Spanish comments on page 5 that "from the first minute of the presidential inauguration," it is President Reagan's duty "to go over to action, clearly aware that he will be able to share responsibilities but never to attribute to others his own mistakes."

It asserts: "Reagan wishes to move from the previous mediocrity to sufficient regeneration to enable the United States to recover the prestige which has gradually been lost since the 'glorious' days of the first of the Kennedys. It does not seem that Reagan will lack determination. But there is a danger that he may lack perspective and understanding of some developments which seem to run counter to the viewpoints on which he based his irresistable rise to the White House. Reagan reaches the White House with a clear image as a 'hardliner.' Of course, the world today needs to have clearer and more definite ideas. But the solution to problems seems to lie not so much in gestures as in an objective analysis of the facts; more in firmness that in the toughness of actions which at a given moment might be counterproductive. Henceforth, Reagan will begin to be judged by his actions and not by his promises. The 'Reagan Era' has begun."

Madrid ABC in Spanish, after outlining the address, maintains on page 2: "Although a honeymoon period between the President and his people is traditional, the time of promises ended for Ronald Reagan yesterday. This is the time for realities. The 'Reagan Era' begins full of expectations not only for the Americans but for the entire world. The neoconservative option, which was timidly introduced in Europe some time ago and has now been solemnly enthroned in Washington, is at stake. Ronald Reagan is confronted by the most difficult performance of his life: millions of human beings will expectantly follow how a bureaucracy can be streamlined ('it is not my intention to do away with government; it is rather to make it work'), how an economic crisis can be rectified and how, in foreign policy, Iran can be made to pay for its aggression without 'pragmatically' forgetting its action, but also without a spirit of revenge."

LORD CARRINGTON ADDRESSES ARAB CLUB IN LONDON

LD231557 London ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 21 Jan 81 pp 1, 2

[Wafa'i Diyad report: "Lord Carrington: 1981 Will Bring Peace Opportunities; European Countries Agreed on Carrying on With Their Initiative"]

[Excerpts] London--British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington said that Europe and the United States are unable to impose a peaceful settlement to solve the Middle East crisis because such a settlement would collapse if it were not approved by all the parties to the conflict.

In a speech last night at a dinner given by the Arab Club at the Hilton Hotel, Carrington called on all the parties to sit down at one table in order to negotiate directly. He said: Nobody can deny what the West has done in this field, but very often the failure to succeed adds to the difficulty of the crisis. Carrington added: "The Camp David accords have not achieved the expected success because they did not look at the Palestinian problem in the way we would have liked. But it can be said that they laid the basis for withdrawal from the territories occupied by forces and, at the same time, indicated that peace between the Arabs and Israel can be achieved."

The British foreign secretary said that the problem of reaching a solution for the crisis still exists, but what has been achieved so far is that the world now knows that there is a Palestinian people who have rights, that military occupation threatens peace, that the problem of Jerusalem cannot be solved by a unilateral declaration, and that an organization called the PLO has a role to play in ending the problem.

He said: "These facts are not enough. We must in return recognize the right of Israel to exist and to have security and peace and acknolwedge that any solution to the Middle East problem must mean that the Arabs and Israelis find a suitable way to live side by side in peace and security."

Carrington added: "Just peace without Israel is impossible, since each party must recognize the rights of the other. This is where the role that the EC can play comes in." Carrington affirmed that the European initiative will continue and that the European countries are agreed on going ahead with their initiative. He said: "1981 will bring many opportunities to achieve what we want."

He then referred to two major problems in the Middle East crisis, which are the right of self-determination and security. He said giving the Palestinian people the right to self-determination must be in return for giving security to Israel and to all the other countries in the area. Without this, no peace can be achieved.

Speaking about Afghanistan, he renewed his call for Soviet withdrawal from Afghan territories and praised the role that the Islamic countries have played in this regard. He called on everybody to stand as one in demanding that the Afghan people be given the right to choose the government they want.

Speaking about the Iraqi-Iranian war, he said: "We view this war with great concern and hope for a rapid solution to it. We hope that the two conflicting parties will sit down at the negotiating table in order to settle their disputes peacefully in the manner we all desire."

He concluded by stressing the importance of just and lasting peace in the Arab area, saying: "We share the interests of all of you in the stability and security of the area and, like you, we will be affected if it is exposed to any danger."

At the beginning of the ceremony, 'Umar al-Hasan, chairman of the Arab Club and director of the Arab League office in London, made a welcome speech in which he referred to the importance of British-Arab relations based on respect and friendship.

Al-Hasan said that, despite certain differences in views over previous attitudes, particularly since the Balfour Declaration, cultural and economic relations between Britain and the Arab world have continued to grow.

Addressing Lord Carrington, he said: "We have followed with interest your recent statements about the Middle East crisis and the role desired for the PLO in this area. We are looking forward with great hope for your chairmanship of the European Common Market Council during the second half of this year, so that you can give the European intiative the required momentum."

Speaking on behalf of Arab ambassadors in London, Jordanian Ambassador Ibrahim 'Izz ad-Din praised the role Lord Carrington has played in building international relations on a firm basis of justice and understanding.

He said that Britain is qualified to play a vital role in the Middle East crisis not only in the international arena but also within the EC and the council of Arab-European dialog. The world expects Britain to find solutions to the problems from which the area is suffering, particularly the Palestine problem.

Some 600 guests of the Arab community members in London, senior British officials and Arab ambassadors attended the dinner, which is the first to be held by the newly-formed club.

FOREIGN OFFICE ANNOUNCES CREDIT LOAN TO POLAND

LD211402 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1312 GMT 21 Jan 81

[By Tom McMullan]

[Text] Britain is to make more than 30 million pounds sterling available to Poland in credits as a short term measure to help Poland in its economic difficulties, the Foreign Office said today.

This follows detailed discussions between Britain and other Western countries. It was emphasized that this was a short-term measure and talks were taking place on longer term assistance to the Polish Government. Some 15 million pounds sterling of this sum will be used for food purchases from the Common Market. The offer was made to the Polish Government earlier this week and accepted, a spokesman said.

A Foreign Office statement said: "The Polish Government has asked a number of Western countries for help in dealing with current economic problems, including that of foreign debt finances.

"The circumstances are clearly exceptional. We have therefore offered the Poles interim help in the short term to permit normal commercial transactions to continue and to assist Poland to meet its guaranteed debt obligations to the United Kingdom during the first quarter of 1981.

"The new credit includes 15 million pounds sterling for Common Market food purchase and the total is more than double that figure. Both the scale and the term of the assistance offered are broadly in line with what is being done by other creditors, notably our Common Market partners.

"The next step will be to try to work out how longer term assistance can be arranged. We are now actively considering what can be done in this respect."

Britain is the first Common Market country to make a public announcement of how it intends to help Poland. A series of meetings have taken place in private in the past two weeks to work out how Western countries should respond.

O AGON: TURKISH CYPRIOT PROPOSALS UNCHANGED

[Text] In yesterday's meeting with his Greek Cypriot colleague Ioannidhis, Turkish Cypriot interlocutor Onan submitted "detailed" constitutional proposals that, in essence, do not differ from those of 1978. According to well-informed sources, the proposals speak about "a federation with two component parts". In reality, however, this is equal to confederation.

According to the same sources, once the two sides submit their proposals on all aspects of the Cypriot issue, the intercommunal talks will enter, probably for the first time, a substantive stage next Wednesday and the two interlocutors will begin "hard bargaining," in which the United Nations is expected to play an important role.

Ioannidhis and his advisers are already studying the proposals submitted by Onan the day before yesterday and they are drawing up an "action plan" in view of the detailed comparative study of all proposals submitted by the two sides that begins next Wednesday. It is considered certain that this study will last for a long time, and, possibly, the interlocutors will hold two or three meetings every week in order to speed up their task.

Spokesman Denies Allegation

NC231353 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 23 Jan 81

[Text] Referring to recent reports on the current developments in the Cypriot issue, and particularly on the government's and Foreign Minister Rolandhis' position on the latest initiative of UN Secretary General Waldheim, the government spokesman made the following clarification:

The government, responding positively to Waldheim's efforts to secure substantive negotiations in the framework of the intercommunal talks, informed the UN secretary general that it would be willing to examine the idea of the reopening of Nicosia airport under UN control provided that the Varosha resettlement was secured under conditions that would satisfy our known positions in this case.

The government spokesman added: There never was nor is there any possibility for the government to accept, directly or indirectly, the legalization of faits accomplis. Allegations to the contrary are not only incorrect and completely unfounded, but they tend to mislead public opinion and cause irreparable damage to the efforts being exerted to find a just solution to the national problem.

The government spokesman denied a press report that the constitutional proposals submitted by the Turkish side are the same as those the Cypriot Government rejected in 1978. The spokesman said that in the last meeting, in the framework of the intercommunal talks, the Turkish side submitted new detailed proposals on the constitutional issue; and they are not the same as those of 1978. The spokesman added: As it is also stated in the UN statement, the discussion on these proposals will begin and there will be a comparative study on the proposals submitted from both sides. The spokesman added: Receiving the Turkish proposals and their planned discussion does not mean their acceptance or any concession. A dialogue is being held; and a dailogue means discussions. During the discussions whatever is unacceptable will be rejected.

LEFTISTS FAVOR TALKS IN CONTEXT OF UN RESOLUTIONS

NC260638 Nicosia DHIMOKRATIA in Greek 26 Jan 81 p 1

[Excerpt] Mr Andreas Ziartidhis, the secretary general of PEO and deputy in the House of Representatives, yesterday proclaimed that the procedure of the talks within the framework and under the auspices of the United Nations, which constitutes the most international forum for all national liberation movements, constitutes the most ideal form of internationalizing the Cyprus problem. Mr Ziartidhis emphasized at the same time that between talks within the UN framework and yet one more recourse to the international organization to win a resolution similar to those that we already have in hand, the left prefers the intercommunal dialogue.

Mr Ziartidhis, who was speaking at the ceremony of the opening of the new premises of the people's organizations in Kiti, stressed that the Cyprus issue would be deinternationalized only if the decisions of the United Nations, the views of our friends and the relevant resolutions were ignored, and closed his speech with an appeal for the election of a truly democratic House of Representatives. This, he emphasized, could not be such if AKEL is not the largest party in the House.

NEW DEMOCRATIC FRONT ELECTS MIKHAILIDHIS CHAIRMAN

NC251338 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 25 Jan 81

[Text] The New Democratic Front founding congress was held in Nicosia today. The congress elected House President Alekos Mikhailidhis as party chairman.

In an address after his election, Mikhailidhis said that the New Democratic Front is drawing up its forces in the common struggle for the salvation and the national and natural survival of Cypriot Hellenism. He said: The responsibility for contributing to the struggle is general. That is why it is necessary to create conditions for general unity. If this unity is to have meaning, he added, it must be a unity of goals.

Referring to the national issue, he said the United Nations has the responsibility not to permit the negotiations to deviate by allowing the Turkish side to escape from the need for substantive negotiations on the territorial and constitutional issues by demanding specific proposals on the territorial issue. He also said that the New Democratic Front rigidly insists on the implementation of and respect for the summit agreements which he added, constitute the agreed basis for the dialogue. He further said that the new House, with its renewed popular mandate, should undertake a substantive role in contributing to and approving the basic handling of the national issue.

RIZOSPASTIS REPORTS ON DIA ACTIVITIES IN AREA

[Text] Competent Greek authorities recently located a Greek "Watergate" with the U.S. DIA as the culprit, but they failed to proceed with the appropriate measures. DIA had installed a device to eavesdrop on discussions at the offices of a democratic opposition party; it followed the "classic model" of similar attempts in the United States and in countries in the "zone of U.S. influence." It is not known how competent Greek authorities became aware of it, but they preferred to keep silent--apparently to avoid a new wave of anti-American activity. However, government elements were informed about it, but they also resorted to the "solution" of keeping quiet about the provocative U.S. action....

This gangsterite action by DIA, which is an insult to every concept of national sovereignty and dignity, places great responsibilities before the New Democracy government. With its condonement, if not with its silent consent, the government allows the secret U.S. agencies to do whatever they like in our country without being accountable, and to freely plot against democratic normality and national interests. In particular, since Greece's return to NATO's military wing, Western secret agencies have been developing more intensive activity, which in many cases has been covered by the cloak of "official cooperation" with Greece within the framework of the Atlantic alliance.

In the recent past, Greek authorities have also detected, but without any reaction, the following:

Contacts and collaboration of DIA leading members with Egyptian agents in Athens. It has also been learned that agents of U.S. secret services acting in Greece are covered by diplomatic roles that have no relation whatsoever to their true mission.

Attempts to create a "movement of solidarity" with the Polish "dissidents!"

Systematic interventions in political life, the primary aim being to foil the cooperation and joint action of the progressive forces. The aforementioned attempt to eavesdrop on discussions obviously falls in this category.

Even more indicative of this is that, until today, the government has refrained from denying reports by RIZOSPASTIS that the government is in possession of evidence confirming CIA's involvement in the malicious burning of the two central stores in Athens.

ULUSU ON JERUSALEM, IRAN-IRAQ WAR, AFGHANISTAN

TA231532 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 23 Jan 81

[Statement by Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu at Istanbul Yesilkoy Airport prior to his departure on 23 January 1981 for the At-Ta'if Islamic summit--recorded]

[Text] I am going to Saudi Arabia to attend the third Islamic summit in At-Fa'if. Since the day it assumed its duties, our government has expressed the great importance it attaches to the ties of close friendship and cooperation with the brotherly Islamic countries at every opportunity and it has acted for the further development of this friendship and cooperation. As you know, Turkey is attending the Islamic summit for the first time at the level of prime minister.

This summit is very important in that it is being held at a time when there is tension and when peace and stability are faced with serious dangers in our region and in the world. Consequently, I believe that this is an exceptional opportunity to eliminate the differences of view among the Islamic countries and to strengthen solidarity among them.

The Middle East and Jerusalem issues, the Iranian-Iraqi war, the Afghanistan question and other political issues and economic cooperation issues among the Islamic countries will be discussed at the conference. Turkey's position regarding these issues is clear. Turkey believes that all the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to establish a state, must be recognized, and that the PLO, the only legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, must participate in the Middle East peace efforts.

We are following the confrontation between Iran and Iraq with grief and concern. We hope that the conflict between these two Islamic countries, which are our friends and neighbors, will be resolved in peaceful ways satisfying both sides. We support all efforts toward such a goal.

Turkey believes that a political solution must be found in Afghanistan. Such a solution must be based on the principles of the withdrawal of foreign forces from Afghanistan, the termination of foreign interventions in that country and the Afghan people's right of self-determination.

We believe that the plan adopted at the Islamic economic cooperation held in Ankara from 4 to 6 November 1980 constitutes a strong basis for strengthening economic cooperation and solidarity among the Islamic countries. Turkey supports the commercial cooperation and priorities program which envisages the multilateral development of trade among the Islamic countries. Acting from the existing wide resource and technology potential in the Islamic countries, Turkey wants the trade among the member countries to develop and to make the Islamic countries complement each other.

I believe that the Islamic summit will greatly contribute to the elimination of the differences of view among certain Islamic countries, to the establishment of a closer solidarity among them and to the establishment and strengthening of peace and stability in the world and in our region. I am going to attend the conference with this understanding. Turkey has exerted every effort for this purpose until now and it will continue to do so in the future.

During my stay in brotherly Saudi Arabia I will hold contacts with the leaders of that country on our multilateral relations with them which we are pleased to see developing.

OUR RADIO: NO SOVIET HAND IN ATTACKS ON DIPLOMATS

TA231150 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0700 GMT 23 Jan 81

[Station commentary: "Terrorism, Turkish Diplomats, the Bourgeois Press and the Sources of Terrorism"]

[Text] Some time ago, the Turkish consul general in Sydney, Sarik Ariyak, and his bodyguard, Engin Sever, were murdered in Australia. This was followed by another attack on a Turkish embassy official in Paris in which his car was blown up. First, as is the custom, the 'officials' of NATO countries denounced what they called the despicable attacks on Turkish diplomats. The bourgeois press in our country--which are printed in fancy colors--also assessed the reasons for these attacks. These so-called assessments ended with conclusions that involved expressions of anti-Sovietism and anti-communism.

What is implied is the lie that the Soviet Union was behind these attacks against Turkish diplomats. Of course, the Istanbul daily TERCUMAN was, again, the first to make such accusations without basing them on any facts. The other bourgeois press organs immediately followed in TERCUMAN's footsteps. In its issues of 17 and 19 December, HURRIYET also claimed that behind the Armenian terrorist organizations carrying out attacks on Turkish diplomats abroad was the Soviet secret services.

How much truth is there in these accusations? First, a very honest attitude is needed to understand the truth. In fact, in his article in the Istanbul daily CUMHURIYET of 29 December entitled, Who Is the Real Enemy, Ilhan Selcuk wonders if it is only a coincidence that the Turkish diplomats are always attacked in capitals of Western countries, and then asks what is the stand of the United States and the CIA on this subject. The writer is right in asking such questions, since it is a known fact that the CIA has been involved with various terrorist organizations in different parts of the world. In fact, certain CIA officials have openly announced that they support terrorist organizations. That the CIA guides the Red Brigades in Italy and the Baadermeinhoff gang in the FRG is already well known.

Let us consider the sources from which our bourgeois press organs have initiated their allegations. In fact, the sources on which the so-called nationalist press organs have based their accusations are from the imperialist Western press. The ruling forces in Turkey, along with their Western friends, are trying to hide the identity of the murderers and those supporting them. In a bid to cast a shadow to the truth, they are intensifying anti-Sovietism and anticommunism. The Turkish diplomats that have been killed are the victims of this game. The fact that not even one of the murderers of the Turkish diplomats has ever been caught cannot be a coincidence. What is the national intelligence organization, which cooperates closely with the CIA and the intelligence services of other imperialist countries, doing? The ruling forces in Turkey are reluctant to uncover the doings of their Western friends. Instead they are coming up with lies--as they have no other means--and are thus trying to deceive the patriotic people.

GENSCHER VIEWS WORLD SITUATION, U.S. RELATIONS

DW261419 Bremen Radio Bremen Network in German 1730 GMT 24 Jan 81

[Correspondent H. Ruebsaat interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn; date not given--live or recorded]

[Text] [Genscher] One should not go to any pains in looking for differences where there are none in the points at issue. Freedom and peace, these are common goals of the Western alliance, and this is what the new U.S. secretary of state intended to say. What now matters I think is that we as Europeans make it very clear that the European partners jointly with the United States and Canada intend to guarantee common security by making the efforts that are necessary for this security. We should not view America as a sort of watchman company for Europe nor should one play hitchhicker with the United States in security policy. Rather, it is important for all alliance partners to contribute to common security, for America's security is defended here in Europe as well. What security means is making the necessary defense efforts to prevent Eastern prepon derance from emerging where it does not exist and to mitigate it where it does exist.

[Question] It is not a matter of differences with regard to the aim, it is much rather a matter of problems that might appear on the way to the aim. There are quite a number of commentators in our country, commentators supporting the policy of the Federal Government, who see problems in this respect. They feel considerably irritated by the special emphasis the new U.S. Government gives to military strength. Former Prime Minister Pierre Messmer, for example, speaks of the danger that we Europeans could become involved in a new arms race through American action, intervention or intensified armament.

[Answer] First of all, one must realize that the positions of Europe and of the Federal Republic of Germany are not between the big powers; together with the United States, we form the Western alliance. Occasional considerations could create the wrong impression that the Europeans stand somewhere between the big powers at an equal distance to both of them. People viewing it like that promote the danger of drifting away, of drifting apart between Europe and the United States. That would be a dangerous development.

No, our place is at the side of the Americans and the place of the Americans is at our side. These are states of the Western alliance. The fact that the new American administration has declared the necessity of closest consultations with its European allies as a most important aim of its policy demonstrates that it is aware of the fact that the alliance can prove its ability to act only on the basis of a common way of forming an opinion.

[Question] Probably this also means including the general interests of the Europeans?

[Answer] Of course, after all, such an alliance also stands for looking after the common security interests. I must say this again. People often pretend that mutual security interests exist. They are common security interests. It is necessary to repeat over and over again that America's freedom is defended in Europe as well.

[Question] But is it not food for thought that the security adviser of the new president, Richard Allen, declared verbatim over French television, for instance: He desires more regard for the attitude of the NATO allies on the part of Bonn policy; and that he stated over the ZDF television network the very same day: Solidarity with the United States ranks priority over detente?

[Answer] It is by their cooperation in the first place that the United States and the European allies create the basis for cooperation with the East. I believe that it is very important to be aware that political cooperation with the Soviet Union and the other communist states of Europe is possible only on the basis of the Western alliance and on the basis of our solid inclusion in the European Community. These are prerequisites and this is what he meant to say. What matters to me is to make people realize time and again that the Federal Republic of Germany can look after the national interests of the Germans only with, and with the support of, its allies. Nothing would be more dangerous than to assume that our affiliation with the alliance and with the European Community would be a burden making it difficult to look after the interests of the Germans in the divided country. The opposite is true. All on our own and in isolation, we would be entirely unable to look after our interests, but together with our partners, with the United States, with Great Britain, with France and all the other allies, we have been in a position to pursue the policy initiated at the beginning of the past decade, namely, our treaty policy. What I mean to say is that the incorporation of the Federal Republic of Germany in the Western alliance and in the European Community constitutes the inalienable precondition for the necessary policy of cooperation with the Eastern states.

[Question] Are you not afraid that as a result of the intensified U.S. leadership and this incorporation in this, solidarity will curtail the leeway of our own detente policy, Ostpolitik, and our policy on Germany?

[Answer] No, on the contrary, this incorporation is a strong point of our policy, a policy of lone action would end up in a blind alley. A policy pursued jointly with the allies has a broad basis and is our real and national future. I cannot but say time and again in this context that it is important for a country like the Federal Republic, for us to realize that the states of Europe must live up to their share in common security. This also holds true for our contributions to defense. Anyone believing the he can cut the envisaged expenditures will soon find out that he undermines his own security, eliminates the bases of arms control negotiations because the Soviet Union would lose interest in these negotiations and subject the Western defense alliance to a hard test. Nobody can be interested in doing that. Hence, it is so important for the Federal Government and the Federal Republic of Germany to accord such a decisive position to our defense contribution, a position of priority as the basis of our foreign and security policies.

[Question] U.S. journalist Henry Trewhitt in a roundtable discussion on U.S. television early this month pointed out that he has had ample talks with members of the new administration, making him sure that the United States will expect even more from the allies at large and the Federal Republic in particular with regard to defense spending. Well, U.S. Secretary of State Haig in his Senate hearing expressly praised the arms efforts of the Europeans in general and the Federal Republic in particular. He also defended them against attacks in his own country. What you are saying, however, sounds as though another 3-percent discussion would be upcoming or threatening in the near future or even a discussion involving 4 or 5 percent.

[Answer] No, this was not at all meant to imply anything of the sort but was intended to make people more aware of the fact that nobody can think of attaining a reduction in our defense efforts as long as we see considerable military expenditures on the Eastern side. The consequence of that, after all, is our strong endeavor to prevent an arms race through arms control and arms limitation. I think you were right in mentioning what Secretary of State Haig said before the Senate. And nobody will be surprised that he, of all people, said this, because owing to his activities in NATO, he is perfectly aware that the Federal Republic of Germany in particular contributes considerably toward Western security. This means that we are justified in speaking of our realistic security policy because we have never neglected what is necessary for defense, because we never forgot that security policy not only spells defense efforts but also persistent efforts for arms control and arms limitation and, hopefully, disarmament.

[Question] Do you mean to say that the counterarming discussion that has erupted against in the SPD, for example, or the plan of some SPD deputies to seek a cut in the defense budget will hamper the German-American relationship?

[Answer] I think trying to call in question the counterarming decision, meaning one part of the two in the dual decision of December 1979, is extremely dangerous. It is dangerous to our security, dangerous to the cohesion of the alliance, dangerous to the basis of arms control and arms limitation negotiations because the Soviet Union thereby is deprived of its motive, so that such discussions which call this decision in question are not suited for facilitating arms control negotiations as they rather aggravate them and, besides, harbor the danger of reconcilliation to Soviet superiority. I do not know whether any efforts actually are made to cut the defense budget as against the draft submitted by the Federal Government. All I can say is that I would be most determined in opposing such a plan because it must not happen under any circumstances that our contribution to joint defense cannot be fully met anymore. We thereby would violate our commitments in the alliance. We would jeopardize our own security and eliminate any incentive to the Eastern side for coming to terms with us on arms control and disarmament. Any and all of these reasons, taken individually, ought to make it clear to any reasonable person that such a venture is impossible. All three taken together, I believe, are irrefutable arguments. I can only hope that what this involves is but rumors and not any serious intentions.

[Question] Suppose this counterarming discussion of the SPD gained broader ground and suppose such efforts involving the defense budget existed somewhere else as well, this would mean, by what you said, that such efforts would extremely hamper your work as the foreign minister of the Federal Republic and that ultimately it would be bound to disturb or even jeopardize the cooperation of the coalition in foreign policy.

[Answer] There is no call for talking about a difference of opinion in the coalition because the chancellor and the federal defense minister and because all leading Social Democrats with whom I have had a chance to discuss the issue agree with me. I think that it is permissible to view the purely security-policy aspect of it all: This does not yield anything with respect to coalition policy.

[Question] We can take it for granted that a discussion on division of labor in the alliance will be forthcoming and, perhaps, this could mean for us to carry a greater load in central Europe. By the same token, it may mean, if we go by the utterance of the new U.S. secretary of state who said that NATO urgently must concern itself with conflicts outside of Europe, that the old discussion on the expansion of the NATO area will be revived.

[Answer] It was as long as 6 years ago that I drew attention to the problem of the external framework conditions of our security at the NATO foreign ministers conference, saying that the balance of forces in the alliance area alone is not the precondition for our security but that, beyond this, a threat to our security may also emerge if and when the power conditions in the Third World are shifted by the activities of the Soviet Union to its advantages and our disadvantages. This is not a discussion on the expansion of the NATO area, which has been contractually stipulated, but a question concerning the means with which it would be possible to contribute toward the preservation of the independence of the states of the Third World. After all, we do not seek any zones of influence in the Third World. We do not wish to pull states of the Third World over to our side. We do not wish to transpose the East-West conflict to the Third World, but to see the states of the Third World as capable of preserving their independence, in keeping with the objectives of real nonalignment. Anyone trying something else would only commit the same mistake, in mirror reflection, which the Soviet Union has been committing in certain regions of the Third World, a policy which increasingly plunges the Soviet Union into a conflict with the policy of the nonaligned states.

I believe that what we are dealing with here is an extremely dangerous development because the Soviet Union's efforts to gain zones of influence in the Third World puts it more and more at odds with the strongest force of our epoch, namely, the will of the peoples for self-determination and independence. Quite unequivocally, we are on the side of progress in that respect, meaning a policy which proceeds from the premise that the states of the north, the industrial states, must seek equal cooperation in partnership as the precondition for a world peace order and must not be allowed to dominate states of the Third World politically, economically or militarily.

[Question] But are you following the United States in this respect? After all, the United States reportedly is also prepared to cooperate with authoritarian governments and dictatorships. The current military assistance to the junta in El Salvador stirred up considerable excitement in our country.

[Answer] What we must keep in mind, to begin with, is that the states of the Third World are embarking on a course of their own, without exception, and that it cannot be up to us to prescribe to the peoples of the Third World their state and social systems. This goes without saying and it is a view which we always have advocated. This simply is the principle of nonintrusion in internal affairs, it always remaining important that cooperation with the Third World not be misunderstood as the preservation of encrusted and obsolete structures. This is an entirely different question and it is not the U.S. intention either. I believe that people at the moment are speculating too much about the different spheres of policy of the new U.S. administration. I think the new U.S. President will expound the policy of the new administration in a message to the U.S. people. Then will be the time to comment on the political objectives. We know, meanwhile, from many talks and contacts, that U.S.-European cooperation will be in the very center of it all. The people whom the new President has gathered around himself are realists and they are above all politicians that we know also will regard U.S.-European relations as the basis for world political stability and America's own security.

[Question] One last question, and quite briefly, Mr Minister, which deals with the Third World, namely, German arms exports. Could some support to countries which are pro-Western or whose stability is of interest to the West also constitute a German contribution within the framework of such a new distribution of tasks?

[Answer] At the moment, we are discussing arms policy. I hope that this discussion can be conducted with all due objectivity. I have made several personal contributions to this end. In this connection, I warn of rash decisions with respect to both rejection and approval. It is necessary indeed rationally to weigh argument against argument. One of the components that need to be taken into account in the process is the problem you raised with your question.

SECURITY COUNCIL TO DISCUSS SAUDI TANK DEAL

[Bonn dispatch by G. Capell and M. Schell: "Do the Saudis Want To Buy As Many as 3,000 Tanks?"]

[Text] The currently disputed tank deal with Saudi Arabia will comprise not 300 but presumably as many as 3,000 tanks because apart from supplies of the Leopard combat tank (at the price of roughly DM4 million per unit), a large number of the Marder armored personnel carriers (at roughly DM1.6 million each) and of the Gepard antiaircraft tank (at the price of roughly DM7 million per unit) also are to be exported. This was learned from government quarters yesterday.

The Federal Government, however, has not yet decided on principle as to whether it is ready for an arms export deal with Saudi Arabia. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker said in Bonn yesterday that the matter will be discussed by the Federal Security Council under the chairmanship of the federal chancellor, adding that a short-term decision must, however, not be anticipated.

Irrespective of this, influential Federal Government quarters are inclined to approve of the project. In this, these aspects are important: Saudi Arabia is Europe's biggest credit grantor. The Federal Republic plans to increase that country's oil exports from the currently 25 percent to 30 percent by 1982.

For the Federal Republic, Saudi Arabia is a purchaser of major industrial installations and consumer goods and in addition an important partner at international monetary conferences. After all, it has the world's biggest economic surplus.

Because of the Israeli-Egyptian Camp David agreement, the Saudis want to keep a certain distance from the United States. This is why they sooner or later want to acquire their equipment for the army from the Federal Republic and that for the navy from France whereas they want to purchase their air force equipment from the United States.

Furthermore, the Federal Government first wants to lay down the principles of its 1981 security policy prior to making a decision. Besides, Israel's interest will be kept in mind, to be sure. But as far as Israel is concerned, the possibility of compensation exists and apart from this Israel certainly could not be concerned with Saudi Arabia's getting in trouble through foreign political pressure, as for instance through developments in Iran or Afghanistan.

Saudi 'Disinterest' Reported

[Berno Conrad At-Ta'if dispatch: "Saudis No Longer Interested in Leopard Tanks"]

[Text] Saudi Arabia apparently has lost interest in German tank deliveries because of the Bonn controversies. "We do not want to risk after all that a formal request for purchase be turned down," it was said yesterday in Saudi Government quarters near the Muslim summit in At-Ta'if.

According to representation here, which meets with the Federal Government's official statements, there have been only exploratory talks until now on possible German arms deliveries and no concrete requests were made by Saudi Arabia. Last summer, King Khalid raised the subject in a talk with Federal Chancellor Schmidt and Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal during a Bonn visit in November last referred to the matter. The matter then was put on ice.

Then early this year, a SPIEGEL report elicited a quarrel in Bonn, whose course met with the growing uneasiness from the Saudis. The widepsread concern voiced within the SPD and also within the FDP finally prompted Riyadh's abandoning the matter. This means formally, because the Federal Government, as it has stated repeatedly, is waiting for a formal and detailed delivery request from Riyadh. As matters stand, however, this request will not be made. The Saudis certainly will order tanks and weapons elsewhere.

This must not necessarily entail immediate consequences for German-Saudi relations. Granted, all this is an unpleasant experience for Riyadh, all the more so since the Saudis for instance are always very generous vis-a-vis Bonn with regard to financial matters. But as long as there does not exist any formal purchase request, the Saudis do not lose face. It can be assumed that hardly anything will change in their relationship to the Federal Republic. Nevertheless, the proposal for large-scale economic cooperation, which Riyadh linked with the arms project, will fail to materialize.

LIBYAN CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL FROM CHAD DENOUNCED

[Text] The Quai d'Orsay has just denounced the Chadian-Libyan call for a withdrawal of French forces from Africa. This demand was announced 48 hours ago by the Al-Qadhdhafi services. In it, the Libyan leader accuses France of conducting military maneuvers near the Chadian border. To the Quai d'Orsay, the point at issue is merely a military diversion designed to divert attention from the major issue which is still the presence of considerable Libyan forces in Chad against the general feelings of the African countries.

FRANCOIS-PONCET REPORTS ON CHAD DEVELOPMENTS

[Text] The National Assembly Foreign Affairs Commission on Thursday, 22 January heard a report from Mr Francois-Poncet, who explained French policy in Africa and, more particularly, in Chad. Recalling that "France will always back Africa when its independence and security are threatened," the foreign minister said that his recent trips to Abidjan and Luanda gave him the impression that Paris' policy is "understood perfectly."

With regard to Chad, he expressed the view that the remarks made in Libya on the "merger" are inconsistent and ambiguous and that the Chadian people will never subscribe to an agreement concluded "in violation of the Lagos agreements" by a transitional government without the powers to conclude such an agreement. He welcomed the "cohesion" among African states "in these difficult circumstances."

The planned "merger" was strongly condemned Thursday by Chadian Ambassador to Cairo Ouangmotching. According to a cable from our correspondent, the diplomat accused Colonel al-Qadhdhafi of intending to "purely and simply annex a country which he has always coveted," and, still regarding himself as the representative of Chad "and not of a regime or a faction," said he "belongs to no faction" and called on his compatriot "officials of all ranks, officers and soldiers, tradesmen and businessmen to pull themselves together."

L'HUMANITE VIEWS CARTER, REAGAN ADMINISTRATIONS

[Yves Moreau article: "From Carter to Reagan"]

[Text] The detention of the U.S. Embassy staff in Iran ended at the same time as Mr Carter's presidency. The attention focused on the event overshadowed Mr Reagan's inauguration despite the pomp which the new White House incumbent tried to give it.

Although they were examined by Algerian doctors who considered their state of health to be satisfactory, the 52 Americans have not yet been returned to their families. They have been isolated from the rest of the world for a few days in a hospital in Wiesbaden where, we have learned, the CIA is playing a leading role in the examinations to which they are being subjected.

These precautions bear little relation to the image which Mr Reagan would like to give his country in portraying it as the "beacon of freedom."

Moreover, the solution implemented in Tehran leaves many questions unanswered. In particular, there is now reason to wonder about the aim of the formidable deployment of naval air forces near Iran ordered by Washington. Isn't this all the more threatening to Iran since the hostilities launched against it by Iraq are still raging? Is the aim of this operation not to cast doubt on the Iranian revolution which, despite its weaknesses, its inconsistencies and even some negative aspects, is a historic step forward in the struggle against imperialism?

On a more general level, it is right to examine the new administration's main options now that power has been handed over in the United States. It would be nice to pick out only the following statements from Mr Reagan's inauguration speech: "Peace is the highest aspiration of the American people. We will negotiate for it."

In fact, the question is whether the Washington administration finally will learn from a recent and not very glorious past which led it from Vietnam to support for the dictatorial junta in El Salvador and from the Camp David agreements to the revival of the arms race. The things for which Mr Carter can justifiably be criticized are not so much what have been described as the inconsistencies in his policy but its adventurist character, hostility toward detente and his continual interference in other states' internal affairs.

On fallacious pretexts, such as the situation in Afghanistan, Mr Carter aroused tension which the United States itself, despite the power it still has, is capable of controlling as it could when it had a nuclear monopoly. The world has very fortunately changed since then and these changes are continuing before our eyes. The balance of forces is less and less favorable to imperialism.

That is why, however unpleasant they may have sounded, some of the purple prose used in the recent election campaign should be taken calmly. What Mr Reagan or his advisers said matters much less than the way they behave now that they are at grips with the real situation. Without cherishing any illusions about their championing peoples' rights and peaceful coexistence, we would hope that, unlike many of his predecessors, Mr Reagan might act in a reasonable way.

In his valedictory message, Mr Carter recalled that, in the event of nuclear conflagration, a destructive power greater than that used throughout World War II would be unleashed every second. We can only regret that Mr Carter did not remember this when, instead of having them ratified, he froze the SALT II agreements which he had, nonetheless, signed. It is in such spheres in particular that one would hope to see his successor show a more reasonable attitude. There is no doubt that that would be welcomed in Moscow.

However, Mr Reagan is under pressures from various opposing directions, not all of which are American. Thus, in his congratulatory message to the new U.S. President, Social Democratic Chancellor Helmut Schmidt called for the strengthening of the Atlantic alliance in terms which Francois Mitterrand would no doubt approve since strengthening NATO in this way has been one of his main concerns since he abandoned the joint program. Would Giscard d'Estaing disavow his best friend Helmut Schmidt?

At a time when the United States is being forced to analyze Mr Carter's sorry record, a French diplomacy worthy of the name should be making an active contribution to changing international relations toward disarmament and peace. There is no lack of opportunities to take effective initiatives in this connection. For instance, the European meeting in Madrid is to reopen next Tuesday.

As in all circumstances, France should speak with its own voice at this meeting and make independent and bold proposals for disarmament, detente and the organization of collective security. Instead of aligning with Bonn and Washington, it ought to strive to gradually overcome and simultaneously dissolve the military blocs, while respecting our alliances.

A sovereign France, present and active in the world, should encourage other peoples' aspirations to full sovereignty and should support the establishment of a new international order, ruling out interference in other states' internal affairs and ensuring that justice and solidarity among peoples finally prevail. That is the path which the PCF and its candidate Georges Marchais advocate in the struggle plan for the presidential elections. This is also the language which must now be used to Washington.

PRESS REACTIONS TO PRESIDENT REAGAN'S INAUGURATION

NC262100 [Editorial Report] Nicosia's Greek-language press coverage of the 20 January inauguration of President Reagan was highlighted by the following editorials and commentaries stressing the effects of the Reagan administration on Cypriot affairs:

In an editorial on page 3 on 21 January, ELEVTHERI KIPROS addresses itself to the U.S. President, saying: "As of today, in your capacity as President of a great country, you play a role that affects the fate of the world." The paper then notes that "the geographic area of our small homeland has always been attracting your attention because of its geopolitical importance," adding that "however, the Cypriot problem may be considered to be one of secondary importance when compared to other world problems you are called upon to face.

"From this faraway corner of our homeland, which is extensively under occupation, allow us to submit the following along with our congratulations: In our humble opinion, the Cypriot problem is an international one of major significance. Primary problems are not solely those for which war is waged or blood is shed but also questions of occupation of one country by another, as is the case with Cyprus."

The paper concludes: "Could it be that your declarations will have a better fate? Could it be that whatever you say is not dictated solely by stern politics but also by truth, which is inside the soul of every true artist, as is the case with you?"

In a page 3 editorial on 22 January, KHARAVYI says that Reagan assumes the Presidency during a period of tension in the international political arena "characterized by his country's increasing aggressiveness and by an effort to strike at detente and restore cold war polarization."

Referring to President Reagan's inauguration speech, by which he urged the Americans to begin a period of "national renewal," the paper says: "If Reagan's 'renewal' is based on the appraisals expressed in his preelection speeches--that is, on the shortsighted insistence on the untenable dream of great America, which would dominate the world by imposing its will on everybody--then the new U.S. Government will fail miserably both at home and abroad."

In a page 2 editorial on 22 January, O AGON says that although Reagan has also made promises during his election campaign, "we are not naive enough to expect a change because foreign policy is determined not by individuals but by interests." The paper adds that it only took Reagan 20 minutes to deliver his inauguration address and announce a harder line on foreign relations, stressing that if Reagan is to oppose Soviet activities, he will need greater support from his country's allies--which means that Turkey will not fail to take advantage of this opportunity. The paper concludes: "Therefore, the reasonable conclusion is that Turkey will have no reason to change its present intransigent attitude. It may even appear more cynical and demanding."

PAPER RELATES HOSTAGES TO MISSING PERSONS ISSUE

[Editorial: "Viewpoint"]

[Text] The whole world cannot but share the joy of the next of kin of the 52 American hostages finally released by Iran.

But the Cypriot public at the same time cannot but share in the bitterness expressed by the relatives of the 2,000 Greek Cypriot missing since the Turkish invasion in the summer of 1974, over the lack of international interest in their plight.

Rightly or wrongly, the relatives believe that many of their loved ones are held hostage as undeclared prisoners of war in Turkish prisons. Yet all attempts to determine the fate of all the missing through the appointment of an international commission have been frustrated by Turkey's refusal to cooperate.

The international community agreed to impose sanctions against Iran until the 52 American hostages were released.

Such issues have their intensely humanitarian aspect. It is only proper that political pressure on an international scale should be exerted on those responsible for prolonging the drama and anguish of both the missing hostages and their loved ones.

It would appear that just as Turkey evaded censure, even though the Council of Europe found her guilty of the gross violation of human rights in Cyprus, she is also being let off scott-free on the issue of missing persons.

MEDIA REPORTS ON U.S. CONTACTS WITH NORTH

I DHIMOKRATIKI Report

NC260701 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 26 Jan 81 pp 1, 10

[Text] The scandalous action of the Americans in sending their diplomats into the occupied Cypriot territories through the illegal Tymbou airport has, besides other things, caused serious concern to the government. At the same time this raises numerous questions about the intentions of the Americans with regard to the operation of the U.S. spy radio stations now controlled by the Turks.

And while the government is studying the reports in order to make the appropriate demarches to Washington about the violation of the sovereignty of the Cyprus Republic, an abundance of indications disclose that:

1. The reopening of certain sections of the spy radio stations in the occupied areas is being pushed forward.

2. The provision of facilities to the Americans in the north also lies within the framework of the U.S.-Turkish defense agreement.

3. The spy radio stations are linked to the powerful radio monitoring stations of the U.S. bases in Turkey.

For fuller understanding of exactly what is happening behind our backs we recall certain very significant facts:

First, the disclosure only a few days ago of the CIA report according to which Cyprus is placed within Turkey's sphere of influence.

Second, the disclosures of Claudia Wright in the NEW STATESMAN that in the appendices to the U.S.-Turkish agreement on the bases, the Cypriot north is recognized as the "Turkish part."

The same appendices reveal that the United States guarantees the military security of the "Turkish part" of Cyprus, something that means the undertaking of specific commitments towards Ankara in order to protect the faits accomplis and to consolidate them.

The fact that the Americans who came about the radio stations arrived through Tymbou betrays a forthright readiness to recognize the "state" and, at the same time, also a readiness for other, maybe more serious, moves.

Official Demarche

NC261153 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 26 Jan 81

[Text] Replying to a question on the subject, the government spokesman has said that Foreign Minister Rolandhis today summoned U.S. Ambassador Stone to his office and made a demarche regarding the arrival of U.S. officials in the occupied areas. The demarche was made after the government had established that U.S. officials had in fact arrived in Cyprus via the illegal Tymbou airport in connection with matters that concern the nonfunctioning U.S. radio stations lying in the occupied territories.

TA NEA Report

NC271725 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 27 Jan 81 p 1

[Excerpts] Yesterday, Foreign Minister Rolandhis summoned to his office U.S. Ambassador Stone and made a demarche on behalf of the government in connection with the arrival of two American diplomats in the occupied areas through Tymbou.

The visit of the two American diplomats to the occupied areas and their inspection of the Yerolakkos radio station, which has been dead since 1974, is connected with the following reports:

The Americans intend to reopen their two radio stations which are in the occupied areas.

The same reports add that the United States has secured permission from the Turkish junta to operate the radio stations on the basis of the status of American bases and other installations in Turkey.

According to reports, during his meeting with Mr Stone, Foreign Minister Rolandhis drew the American ambassador's attention to the fact that such actions constitute a flagrant violation of the sovereignty of the Republic of Cyprus and are interpreted as recognition of Denktas' "state."

KHARAVYI Comment

NC270737 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 27 Jan 81 p 3

[From the "Views and Comments" column: "Stab in the Back"]

[Text] The official confirmation of the report that American officials have arrived in the occupied part of Cyprus through the illegal Tymbou airport and have inspected the American radio station at Yerolakkos with the permission of the "Federated State," gives the scandal new dimensions. This is a flagrant and calculated violation of the sovereignty of the Cyprus state by the United States, and it must incur our government's serious consideration and increase the people's vigilance. The American action openly indicates recognition of the Turkish Cypriot pseudostate and constitutes a stab in the back, a poisonous blow against the lawful and internationally recognized state and Government of Cyprus. We have no doubt that these are the real intentions of Washington within the framework of its permanent partitionist plans, and that the sudden visit of its envoys to the occupied areas is the first step toward the implementation of these plans. Nor can it be considered a coincidence that the Americans, in order to strike at our entity as a state, have chosen a delicate phase of the intercommunal talks--a phase during which the principles of independence and sovereignty of Cyprus are being tested.

International recognition and respect for our sovereign rights are the most powerful weapon in our struggle, and we must safeguard these in every way. We must do so determinedly and irrevocably. We must safeguard them against any threat, and we must make it clear to those who violate them that we have the will to react decisively. This must be officially stressed to the American Government. If Washington wishes to maintain even a minimum of relations with Cyprus, it must respect its independence and sovereignty and must obseyve international regulations. This is a matter of principle and no concession should be allowed if we want to avert other treacherous blows or partitionist actions by the imperialists.

O AGON Column

[From "Our Positions" column: "Hostile Action"]

[Text] Following the notorious CIA report that places Cyprus within Turkey's "sphere of influence," another American action comes to confirm the clearly hostile U.S. attitude toward the Cyprus state. This concerns the arrival of Americans in the occupied territories in order to inspect the radio stations there. The Americans came through the Tymbou airport.

This action is tantamount to de facto recognition of the occupation and division of Cyprus. The government must ask for explanations for these activities. The Americans will definitely find some "excuse" but they must bear in mind that they have interests in the free territories that might be affected by their scandalous display of favor for Turkey.

O AGON DECRIES U.S. INACTION ON SETTLEMENT

[From the observer's 'My Opinion" column: "They Can But They Do Not Want To--Americans and Cyprus"]

[Text] There is no reasonable man in this country who would not agree that the United States and the West in general are the only ones who can pressure and compel Turkey to be reasonable and to agree to a fair Cyprus solution.

But at the same time no reasonable man would agree that the Americans and the West in general want to contribute to the reaching of an honorable Cyprus settlement.

As to why, this is most obvious.

The Americans and the West in general do not lay down their Cyprus policy on the basis of which side is right or which leader or government is in power in Cyprus or Greece.

The American policy on the Cyprus problem is determined and charted on the basis of American interests in the region.

And the American interests clearly dictate that Turkey should be strengthened and supported by all means because, for the United States, Turkey is much more important than both Greece and Cyprus put together.

Therefore, the American policy toward Cyprus will not change in favor of Cyprus or Greece, so long as Turkey is the guardian of American interests in the region.

We cannot have illusions: the Americans can pressure Turkey; they can contribute to a fair solution of our problem.

They can, but they do not want to. And they do not want to because their interests dictate the strengthening of Turkey which is encouraged in its expansionist goals against Greece and Cyprus. Turkey is also encouraged by this very support from the Americans and the West.

It is not by chance that the CIA places Cyprus in Turkey's sphere of influence. Nor is the pro-Turkish policy that the United States has been following in the case of Cyprus' rights to be considered accidental. A very small example of this provocatively American policy has been the recent case of American officials who, with full disregard for the sovereign rights of the lawful Government of Cyprus, arrived piratically in the occupied territories in order to inspect the spy radio stations which they have there.

The Cypriot people must not have any illusions about the Americans' attitude toward Cyprus. Nor should they expect any change in this attitude in favor of the Greek side if many factors are not overthrown, and if no seismic geopolitical changes occur in our region.

EDEK ISSUES RESOLUTION ON SETTLEMENT ISSUE

NC261942 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 26 Jan 81

[Text] An EDEK Political Bureau resolution says that the Cypriot problem is facing very serious dangers, adding that the irrevocable future of the Cypriot people will depend on today's handling and decisions. The EDEK Political Bureau maintains that a continuation of the present handling will lead to a national catastrophe.

In a communique, EDEK says it supports substantive talks with specific proposals for a solution in accordance with the principles of the UN resolutions. Talks without content, it adds, are against the Cypriot cause. Only with the correct defensive shielding and correct foreign policy, EDEK says, will Turkish goals fail and will Turkey allow negotiations for a viable solution. The communique also says that EDEK will participate independently in the next parliamentary elections.

PRESS REACTIONS TO PRESIDENT REAGAN'S INAUGURATION

NC262026 [Editorial Report] Athens Greek-language press coverage of the 20 January inauguration of President Reagan was highlighted by the following editorials and commentaries stressing the possible effects of the Reagan administration on U.S.-Greek relations:

In a page 6 editorial on 21 January, I AVYI points out that "the change in presidents in the United States is not an insignificant event" for Greece, which the paper says "has been trapped in the grasp of the U.S.-NATOite aggressive strategy thanks to the New Democracy policy."

The paper says it is too early to make any forecasts as to the Reagan administration's line on international problems, particularly on those that most directly concern Greece. It stresses: "What is certain is that with the election of the new president, the most aggressive circles of U.S. monopolistic capital have advanced their positions, which augurs nothing good for the cause of world peace and detente or for the issues directly connected with safeguarding our national interests and rights."

In conclusion, the paper stresses that because of Reagan's coming to power, democratic forces in Greece must strengthen their unity and be more decisively dependent on the people's forces to repulse U.S. pressure in connection with the vital question of the U.S. bases.

In its page 2 "Evening Column" on 22 January, I VRADHINI says that what Karamanlis has said in his message to Reagan reflects the Greek people's feelings, adding that the Greeks have always cherished friendly feelings toward the United States where a strong Greek community is living. It stresses: "Of course, these relations have been temporarily overshadowed at times by actions of the U.S. Government that did not respond to the Greek people's expectations and strong sentimentalism. However, they were passing clouds that vanished."

In a frontpage editorial on 22 January, MESIMVRINI says that Reagan has inherited many thorny issues from Carter, including that of "restoring justice in Cyprus in particular and in Greek-Turkish relations in general." The paper stresses: "Reagan, who has been very sparing with his promises, has to cope with the explosive nature of the [Cypriot]--problem, which is the result of its being perpetuated. But it will be strange, although not rare, if things prove the skepticism about the new Republican President to be wrong--just as the hopes that prevailed about the Democratic President's start were proved to be wrong."

In a frontpage editorial on 21 January, ESTIA refers to Greek-U.S. relations, saying that they are at their lowest and adding that both sides are to be blamed for damaging "traditional Greek-American friendship." The paper stresses: "At this moment there are a number of pending, dangerous issues between Greece and the United States such as the Cyrpriot problem and the question of the limits of responsibility in the Aegean within NATO--issues that might be within the framework of the more general policy of the U.S. superpower. Thus, every concept of justice and morality is disregarded for the sake of U.S. interests in this region. But let the new U.S. President not forget that the time when the great powers decided on behalf of the small states is over."

The paper points out that Greece has always been a faithful friend and ally and therefore should not be treated unfairly. It adds: "Let Reagan and his associates be certain that in the long run they will turn to small but consistent Greece if critical circumstances ever unmask the true face of some of the present opportunists who pose as friends." Stressing that the West will suffer a major setback if Greece is lost to the Western bloc, the paper says: "Thus, let Reagan take the bold step and carry out his declarations for a really new policy so that the United States will be dreaded by its foes and loved by its friends. This would be a major service on his part, and as a result his name would be worthily recorded by history."

MITSOTAKIS BRIEFS REPORTERS ON U.S. BASES TALKS

NC241638 Athens NEWS in English 24 Jan 81 p 4

[Text] Negotiations on a new Greek-U.S. defense treaty regulating the future status of U.S. military bases in Greece will start in Athens next Tuesday, Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis told political reporters yesterday.

He said the Greek side will submit, as soon as the talks start, separate proposals for each one of the bases operating in Greece. Later on, Greece will also submit drafts for letters to be exchanged between the Greek foreign minister and the U.S. secretary of state upon the signing of the agreement.

"But most important is the main part of the agreement," Mitsotakis said, "and the Greek Government has already submitted its proposals on this part." He said the main part would regulate issues concerning Greek commanding officers of the bases, and define in detail their status and scope of authority.

The foreign minister said the American side was expected to express its views on the Greek plan at the beginning of the talks. "The American reaction to Greek proposals will determine the speed with which negotiations will progress," he said, adding that the Greek Government shares the U.S. Government's desire for a speedy conclusion of the negotiations.

Although there is no definite timetable, talks are expected to conclude some time in March, Mitsotakis told reporters.

He also said Greece will ask to be informed of the texts detailing technical arrangements which accompany the recently signed U.S.-Turkey agreement on U.S. bases in Turkey, and will demand to see at least those parts of the texts which concern Greece. These texts have been classified as secret and have not been part of the Congressional Record.

KREISKY COMMENTS ON MEETING WITH ISRAEL'S PERES

AU261055 [Editorial Report] Several Vienna German-language newspapers on 26 January carry reports on the Vienna meeting between Chancellor Bruno Kreisky and Israeli Labor Party Chairman Shim'on Peres on 24 January. Under the headline "Middle East Junction: Kreisky" KURIER on page 2 reports that on Saturday Shim'on Peres "quite unexpectedly" called on Chancellor Kreisky at his Vienna villa for a talk, and left Vienna the same evening. The newspaper notes that the Peres visit is right between two Middle East trips by Kreisky: He visited Jordan last fall, and is going to visit Egypt in February.

ARBEITER-ZEITUNG on page 1 highlights a Kreisky statement after the meeting that "after his talks with Israeli Labor Party leader Peres he believed that the Labor Party correctly assessed the essential problems."

DIE PRESSE carries on page 1 a Georg Possanner report on an "exclusive interview" with Kreisky. According to the paper, Kreisky declared in the interview that his talks with Peres "focused on the Middle East conflict, the Iraqi-Iranian war, the policy to be expected of Ronald Reagan and personal views about how things should go at this stage." The paper notes Kreisky's emphatic denial of rumors that a Palestinian representative was present at the talk and quotes him as adding: "No non-Israeli was present."

According to DIE PRESSE, Kreisky declared that it was Peres who had taken the initiative for their meeting. Asked whether he is disappointed about the Israeli Labor Party program adopted at its latest party congress, considering that the program rejects negotiations with the PLO, calls for an "active defense" against the PLO and sticks to the concept of an undivided Jerusalem as the Israeli capital, Kreisky replied: "The platform is not good and, personally, I do not like it at all. It is not productive." Kreisky added that he briefly discussed this with Peres and his adviser. On this occasion, he was told that "there are some 'misunderstandings' and, moreover, the 'platform is not yet final' because it will first be necessary to achieve an 'accord with the MAPAM' faction."

Credits granted to Polish buyers within the framework of the new credit ceiling will have a maximum running period of 4 years and will be fully guaranteed by the Austrian Control Bank.

TRADE MINISTER DISCUSSES SOVIET GAS DELIVERIES

AU211618 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 21 Jan 81 p 10

[Uwe Englebrecht report: "Soviets Promise Gas Deliveries: Large Order for Shipyards"]

[Summary] After his return from Moscow, Trade Minister Staribacher declared that Soviet natural gas deliveries to Austria this year are fully ensured, and that the USSR has placed an order with the Austrian shipyards corporation for 10 18,000-ton motor ships, worth 570 million schillings.

Staribacher said that the Soviet side again assured him that the USSR will strictly comply with its 1981 gas delivery commitment of 2.6 billion cubic meters--at present there are delivery arrears of between 5 and 10 percent. He also was optimistic about additional Soviet gas deliveries this summer over and above the contractual quota, as well as about higher Soviet stopgap gas deliveries until 1985, when larger quantities of Soviet natural gas will be supplied to central Europe via the planned west Siberian pipeline.

The Moscow talks also dealt extensively with the long term project of a power link between the CEMA power grid terminal at Albertirsa, Hungary, and the Austrian power grid. The implementation of this technically rather complicated project would permit a power exchange in view of the different peak load times in the various countries, and might save Austria the construction of two powerplants. Soviet Premier Tikhonov on 16 January expressed a positive view of the project in general, and promised a speedy examination of its technical aspects by the USSR ministries concerned and the USSR Academy of Sciences. Austrian Federal Power Company Director General Fremuth is staying on for several days in Moscow to discuss further details of this project.

The new Soviet order for 10 motor ships placed with the Korneuburg and Linz shipyards will enable these shipyards to continue production at full capacity. Since 1945, they have supplied a total of 111 vessels to the USSR, and more Soviet orders are pending, including among others, three passenger ships, a 350-ton floating crane and a dredger.

Power Link Project

AU231039 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 23 Jan 81 p 16

[Uwe Engelbrecht report: "Agreement With Moscow on Power Link as Early as Mid-1981?"]

[Summary] Moscow--Walter Fremuth, head of an Austrian power industry delegation which negotiated several days in Moscow on the project of a power link between the power grids of CEMA and Austria, declared after the conclusion of the talks that details of the project will soon be discussed by a new working group to be set up within the framework of the joint Austrian-Soviet economic commission. According to Fremuth, the technical problems are essentially regarded as solved. The new working group that will be headed by Fremuth himself for the Austrian side will not only deal with power exchange but also with imports and exports of powerplants and other power installations.

The envisaged power link, now being discussed on the basis of a proposal submitted by Fremuth in 1979, is to boost both sides' energy reserves through power exchanges, taking advantage not only of the 2-hour peak-load difference between Austria and the western part of the USSR, but also providing for the exchange of Austrian "summer" power produced by hydropowerplants for CEMA and "winter" power produced by thermal powerplants.

According to Fremuth, the USSR Council of Ministers has endorsed the project. While originally a larger exchange capacity was envisaged, it is now planned to limit the capacity initially to 500-1,000 megawatts, since this involves only relatively low basic investment costs. This capacity may be expanded later. Fremuth believes that an agreement on the power link project can be concluded by the middle of this year.

LE SOIR: REAGAN UNLIKELY TO START 'NEW ERA'

LD261333 Brussels LE SOIR in French 22 Jan 81 p 3

[Unattributed article: "The Reagan Era"]

[Text] There has been a Kennedy era, a Nixon era and even a Carter era.... Every time a Democratic president succeeds a Republican president, or the other way round, necessary noises are made in the victor's camp, which are repeated by the media ad infinitum, suggesting that America and the world are facing some tremendous changes. Both, however, go on turning, rather badly.

There is no reason to imagine that things will work out differently for Ronald Reagan. It can be expected that Washington's European allies will soon be taking him to task for interfering rather too much in their affairs. A mere swing of the pendulum--when Carter was president, they accused him of having no sense of leadership. Be that as it may, in view of their relative lack of resources and, especially, their almost ostentatious lack of ambition, with the possible exception of Germany, they will have grudgingly to play second fiddle.

The Soviets are aware of this just as well as the Americans. As far as the former are concerned, their main concern is to know under what conditions the inevitable dialogue with the other superpower will begin. It appears that Ronald Reagan's firmness and Alexander Haig's and Richard Allen's lucidity can be relied on, at least provided that they are willing not to neutralize one another, which is by no means certain. And the rapid anti-Sovietism shown by the new President during his election campaign is no more virulent than that of that other candidate hailing from California, whose name was Richard Nixon.

There is no reason to criticize Ronald Reagan for this, especially since he has shown that he know how to choose his aides, is open to advice, is prepared to confine himself to the main problems, and furthermore, has apparently learned in recent months to talk only about things of which he has some knowledge.

Having said this, it is difficult to understand how he can build a strong America--as he asserted he would--while reducing taxes 30 percent over a 3-year period, as he was also asserted that he would. A program which his vice president, George Bush, likened, at the same time when they were competing against each other in "primaries," to an introduction of voodoo rites into politics.

What could cause particular concern is the way in which he appeared to take no notice during his campaign of the two warnings which President Carter continually addressed to him with undoubted courage, urging him to give up neither the idea of imposing a minimum of respect for human rights wherever this is humanly possible nor the idea of stopping at any cost the nuclear arms race which could eventually make the world, which is now revolving unsatisfactorily, stop revolving altogether.

"This is a small world." The superpowers are well aware of this by definition, but in 1981 this saying conjures up much more than mere confrontation of a balance of forces. Carter was right when he reminded the man who defeated him--and, beyond him, the USSR--of this fact in his farewell message.

THE NETHERLANDS

DE VOLKSKRANT COMMENTS ON REAGAN INAUGURATION

LD231251 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 21 Jan 81 p 3

[Editorial: "Inauguration"]

[Text] For the first time in U.S. history Ronald Reagan took the presidential oath on the West side of the Capitol yesterday--with his face turned toward that part of the country which forms his electoral base and which is the source of inspiration for his political philosophy. This symbol is all the more important since there are few tangible indications about the policies which President Reagan is going to follow. Even his inaugural speech provided no information about that.

It was a symbol, therefore, but also something more than that. Just as Jimmy Carter's Georgians "took over" Washington when the administration changed in January 1977, so the U.S. capital has experienced the entry of Reagan's Californians in the past weeks. It is true that in filling the most senior government posts the new President has adopted a more all-round approach than had originally been feared. However, in the lower echelons of the presidential apparatus--especially as regards the several hundred adviser's posts in the White House--it is the West Coast Republican elite which will make up the team. They have come to Washington without any trace of the feeling of inferiority which characterized the Georgians, and with the overwhelming conviction that they are going to lead the United States into a new conservative era.

Therefore all the signs are that in the coming period Washington is going to swing strongly to the right--a swing which will probably be seen most clearly in the foreign policy sphere. However, there are some factors which could make that swing better than expected.

First, there is the question of whether the 40th U.S. President really is led by an indisputable conservative change of atmosphere in the country. The election analyses show that Reagan owes the presidency mainly to wholehearted dissatisfaction with his predecessor's faulty economic policy. The new administration's main concern is to boost and strengthen the ailing U.S. economy, and in this sphere rapid results must be recorded which do not only please the directors of the big companies. That requires a flexible approach.

In addition, Reagan did not show himself to be a rigid administrator when he was governor of California. The "pioneering" mentality which is closely connected with the 19th westerward trail and which Reagan so often takes as his own is in fact characterized by a strong morality-with-your-hand-on-your-revolver, but it is also furnished with a sizeable dose of pragmatism--otherwise the American dream would have remained largely a dream.

Finally, there is the international situation, which has its own dynamics. President Reagan is facing a world which simply no longer lends itself to simple power models and which will not bend to the American will even with great military show.

One of the former actor Reagan's favorite films is "Patton," the story of the famous U.S. general in World War II. The film has "a message which must be spread again today," Reagan said in an interview; the message is that "there are things in life for which men must be prepared to die." For those who see that as a prelude to armed action it is good to know that the new President's hero did not die on the battlefield but in an ordinary automobile accident long after the war.

CORRECTION TO COMMENTS ON SUBMARINE SALE TO TAIWAN

The following is a correction to the item entitled: "PRC Press Attache Deplores Submarine Sale to Taiwan," published in the 26 January Western Europe DAILY REPORT on pages F 2-3:

On Page F 3, the last sentence in the penultimate paragraph should read: "should the Americans themselves supply weapons to Taiwan in the future, we will take precisely the attitude we are now taking with the Netherlands, according to Shen Zhihuan."

24 SPD BUNDESTAG DEPUTIES CALL FOR DEFENSE CUT

['Document' entitled: "More Arms Only Make the World Poorer"]

[Text] Bonn, EPD--Twenty-four SPD Bundestag deputies have filed a motion with their Bundestag faction to cut the defense budget by DM1 billion in favor of development aid.

The faction should decide:

1. The expeditures in the amount of DM16,924,000,000 proposed in the draft of the federal budget plan for 1981--subtitle 14--sphere of responsibility of the federal minister of defense, for "military procurements" will be cut by DM1 billion.

2. The expenditures in the amount of DM4,852,000,000 proposed in the draft of the federal budget plan--subtitle 23--sphere of responsibility of the federal minister for economic cooperation, for "investments" wil be increased by DM1 billion. This is intended to increase appropriately the funds for investments made to date (for example, the world food program, food assistance, International Development Association and so forth) and to set up and finance a German solidarity program for counteracting hunger, epidemics and illiteracy in the 10 poorest countries of the Third World.

Justification: The applicants refer to the report of the North-South Commission and to the introduction written thereto by Willy Brandt, as well as to Willy Brandt's speech before the World War Veteran's Association in Munich. More arms do not make the world any safer but only even poorer. Hence, it must be possible under Social Democratic leadership to begin in the Federal Republic with a rechanneling of a part of the unproductive expenditures for constantly new arms and equipment, an expenditure which is dispensable under aspects of security policy, into productive expenditures for development aid.

The world's annual arms expenditures are approaching the sum of $450 billion. That is more than DM2 billion a day. Compared with this, the expenditures for development aid amount to merely $20 billion, which is less than 4.5 percent.

Some 800 million people of the Third and Fourth Worlds are on the verge of famine. UNICEF estimates say that in 1978 alone more than 12 million children under 5 years of age died of hunger. Estimates of the Bucharest world food conference say that some 60 million children will die of hunger in this decade if no immediate help is given.

Wherever famine exists, peace cannot continue to exist, despite increased armament. Those who want to ban war must ban the poverty of the masses.

Hunger, exploitation, poverty, want and diseases are in the long run the greatest gates for world communism. Those who want to have an effect on this threat to freedom cannot rely only on military security and the irresponsible arms race.

With the military expenditures of 1 single day, the World Health Organization could eliminate malaria, onohocerciasis, bilharziasis and sleeping sickness--illnesses and diseases costing the lives of millions of people. The money for one Leopard II, tank would suffice to build 1,000 classrooms for 30,000 students. With half a percentage of the armament expenditures of the world, famine could be eliminated in the 10 poorest countries of the world through the development of local agricultural production.

Our motion is meant to be a beginning. The motion to curtail the defense budget to the benefit of the budget for economic cooperation is supported by Deputy Rudi Schoefberger and 23 other deputies.

ISRAEL'S PERES VIEWS ARMS SALE TO SAUDI ARABIA

LD271222 Hamburg DPA in German 1110 GMT 27 Jan 81

[Text] Bonn, 27 Jan (DPA)--Israel's opposition leader Shim'on Peres told journalists in Bonn today that if German tanks are supplied to Saudi Arabia, Israel probably will respond by requesting arms from the Federal Republic. Peres, who met with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and SPD Chairman Brandt yesterday, said he is fundamentally opposed to Saudi Arabia receiving German tanks. "Saudi Arabia is not only rich in oil, but also rich in weapons," he said. If Bonn meets Riyadh's request for weapons, however, his country in the interests of its security, also will make demands. "This also includes the request for German weapons," Peres said.

The Israeli politician said he learned from his Bonn talks that Schmidt and Brandt are "deeply aware" of the significance of a possible change in German arms export policy.

At the same press conference, SPD Chairman Brandt explained his party's reservations about a general departure from this policy. "There are considerable doubts about departing from the basic lines of the attitude held so far," he stressed.

NEW JUSTICE, EDUCATION MINISTERS APPOINTED

DW261606 Hamburg DPA in German 1417 GMT 26 Jan 81

[Excerpt] Bonn, 26 Jan (DPA) Juergen Schmude, 44-year-old federal minister of education and science, is the new federal minister of justice. He succeeds Hans-Jochen Vogel who was elected governing mayor of Berlin. At Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's request Anke Fuchs, the present parliamentary secretary of state in the Labor Ministry, is to take over education from Schmude. However, it was reported today in Bonn that in talks with Chancellor Schmidt, Mrs Fuchs hesitated about transferring to the ministerial post. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker told the press in Bonn that today there were "concluding, decisive talks" about Vogel's successor. Apparently alluding to Anke Fuchs' hesitation, Becker said that in any case several talks were needed and it might possibly take up to 2 days before the new staffing of the two ministries is announced.

GISCARD EXPLAINS FOREIGN POLICY OBJECTIVES

["1 Hour With the President" program, consisting of interview granted by President Giscard d'Estaing to journalists Jean-Pierre Elkabbach, Georges Bortoli and Alain Duhamel, in the Elysee--live]

[Excerpts] [Elkabbach] Here is the seventh broadcast in the series "1 Hour With the President of the Republic." It is taking place this evening direct from the Elysee and this time it is the turn of journalists from Channel Two to put questions to you. Georges Bortoli, Alain Duhamel and I will question you on France's foreign policy at this particular important time.

[Question] Mr President, those who criticize France's foreign policy talk of its flux or of its irresolution. When you hear things like that, how do you react?

[Answer] You know that the aim of this broadcast as far as I am concerned is not to reply to criticisms. It is to explain what France's foreign policy is so that French men and women can know it, and knowing it are able to judge it. But it is not to reply a priori to criticisms such as the one to which you have just referred. For me, this is a broadcast which should be explanatory and informative. All the same, just a quick word on what France's foreign policy is, to reply to what you are saying. I recall that very often in parliamentary debates or opinions, it is said: But what are the principles of France's foreign policy? And here it would seem that what is meant is that there should be a dogma, a sort of fixed doctrine, which would take no account of the fact that the world about us is a living world, a moving world, a changing world. I would say that that is more or less the concept which was formerly held, when it was believed that the sun went round the earth. One must see today's world. Today's world consists of 154 nations, 154 members of the United Nations, and the leaders of these nations, their importance, their political orientation change frequently. So one should not speak of principles as immutable. One must set oneself objectives. And that is what I should like to tell you first of all, briefly of course, what for me are the objectives of France's foreign policy, and afterward concerning... [words obscured by interjection from interviewer].

What are these objectives? [words obscured by interjection]... president of the republic. First to defend the interests of France. Not very simple, but for me that is the priority--as it is incidentally for other men in office in the world--to defend the interests of France.

The second objective is to maintain peace and if you have questions on that later, on the importance of peace for France, I will reply to you that for me it has been over the entire period a fundamental objective: to maintain peace; but peace with security and with dignity, which means several things. First, peace but with a strong defense for France and an independent defense for France. It also means France's participation in the alliance of which it has been part for 32 years now; and finally it means a search for a dialogue with those powers concerned with maintaining peace, and in particular a dialogue at summit level with those powers, and therefore, in particular, the Soviet Union.

The third objective is that France should bring a certain contribution to the organization of the world to come, a world which is changing under our eyes. We can see that clearly, as regards the distribution of its resources, its population, and therefore France must contribute to the organization of this world, which means first of all to deal with the problems regarding the dangers to this world and in particular the proliferation of nuclear arms, a danger which will be quite considerable and will be greatly felt by the population in the years to come, the problems regarding the organization of the world, the organization of Europe, and then the problems regarding the inequalities and injustices of the world, unequal resources, unequal incomes, that is the Third World and the North-South dialogue.

Before leaving these objectives--and I shall return to them because I believe them to be essential--I would like also to tell you that France's foreign policy has been in the lead. I reject the possibility of its going backward, and in particular on two planes: the first plane is going back in time. When I took office, almost 7 years ago, you remember the question was raised [words indistinct] it was said, in fact: The president of the republic wants to take France back in time. To my stupefaction, today I see the reverse, that is to say, there a number of people who say: One must go back in time. That is to the past and I reject the possibility of France going back in time. There is a second past which I reject, that of a return to colonialism. We granted independence to a large number of states in the world in 1960 and since then, and even before that in some cases. This was done once and for all. We shall not go back, directly or indirectly. Therefore, we shall not go back, either in regard to France's participation in the integrated NATO organization or in regard to returning to colonialism.

[Question] We shall come back to this subject, Mr President, but the implementation of these principles is undoubtedly (?gladly received).... [Giscard interrupts]

[Answer] And of these objectives... [Questioner interrupts]

[Question] ...and of these objectives is misunderstood by public opinion and one has the impression sometimes that, perhaps, they were mishandled in 1980 in a fairly difficult international situation. You said on 31 December 1979: There is a danger of war which threatens. Would you say the same thing tonight?

[Answer] First, you see, why do some say there is uncertainty? The word hazy [flou] is used; it is merely that they do not understand that France's role is to maintain a dialogue with all the big powers of the world. Therefore, we maintain a dialogue with the United States, with the old administration, now also with the new administration. We have a dialogue with the Soviet Union and I have just said why. The same with other world powers. Those who say hazy said: Why this and why should France not talk to one power alone? But if it were to talk to one power alone, it would address an aligned country. What you call hazy is in reality the fact that France maintains the independence of its dialogue with the big powers of the world. It will maintain the independence of this dialogue. You have said... [words indistinct] coming from the first country in the world to have a program for independence regarding energy; the first, the only country, the only one, to have intervened in Africa to oppose the destabilization of Africa, and to have intervened while running considerable risks, including risks regarding the president of the republic, the only country at the time of Kolwezi; it is the country of the West which makes the largest efforts regarding its defense and which has at the present time the strongest defense it has ever had; I put it to you thus.

[Question] The elements of tension in 1980 are to be found in 1981. How then do you judge the situation this year? Does it preoccupy you? Is it not marked by cold war, detente? Does it have a particular character?

[Answer] The year 1980 was a year of deterioration of the international situation and confidence. This is a fact. This deterioration continues, if I may say so, owing to events that have blocked international life, like the American elections which practically from the month of July until now have blocked one of the aspects of international life; also the question of the hostages in Iran and the long negotiation that preceded their release blocked a part of international diplomatic activity. There was therefore a deterioration which somehow has immobilized us since the summer.

What then is France's objective with regard to East-West relations? The point at issue is not to issue a judgment. What is the objective? To me, the objective must be the stabilization of East-West relations. They have deteriorated to a certain extent, but there are new circumstances: the arrival of a new U.S. president, the end of the hostage problem.

One then looks to the future and the objective must be the stabilization of these relations. And France wants the stabilization of East-West relations. This in fact requires three conditions--and tell me if you want to go into details. This supposes first a balance with regard to security--there cannot be stable East-West relations if there is a feeling that security is not assured because it would be then natural to worry and to reconstitute one's security. On the other hand, there must be self-restraint because there are situations marked by crisis and because there is a Third World bound to experience a considerable number of problems. Now there are very precise preoccupations, I would take the case of Poland. If one wants a stabilization of East-West relations, self-restraint must be showed toward these situations. Finally, there must be the exercising of responsibility in face of the problems posed, problems of nuclear proliferation, a dormant crisis here or there in the world, that is to say, the great problems of relations within the Third World and the distribution of energy resources and raw materials. Three prerequisites then: balance in security, self-restraint and a sense of responsibility.

[Question] But detente? Do we still have it, actually? Some people say that detente for us Westerners has rather shortchanged us and even cheated us.

[Answer] Well, detente--and in the beginning it was largely France which was behind it, France under General de Gualle--what was it, originally? It was the alternative to the cold war. The cold war was a period during which large amounts of arms were tockpiled and relations were of the kind that exist among countries making undeclared war. Detente was the alternative to the cold war. We still, fortunately, have the alternative to the cold war. But during detente, during the period of detente, two phenomena arose. On the one hand, there was what is called peaceful coexistence--that was the terminology used by the Soviet leaders--in other words, living together without making war, but at the same time, there was a shift in the positions of influence in the world which took place, which on the whole took place in this or that area of the world, to the advantage of the Soviet Union. And this is why some people say that detente was a cheat because there was peaceful coexistence, but there was also this shift in the balance of power in the world.

This is why I say now that the word we should bear in mind is stabilization of East-West relations. Stabilization means first of all stabilized mutual relations and then it means that there should not be any shift, any change in the balance of influence in the world today.

[Question] Before going on, a clarification please: When you say restraint and sense of responsibility, could that be interpreted as excessive prudence and self-effacement?

[Answer] But it's the same for both sides. If you want to develop this theme, I will tell you what it means.

[Question] About Poland, which is a subject in which French people are very interested at the moment. How do these principles apply? I mean what role is France trying to play faced with the Polish situation?

[Answer] So we will now talk about Poland. First of all, France is Poland's friend. It has been the friend of Poland and the Polish people for a long time. We have kept up this friendship in recent times. I have been to Poland frequently and have had contact with the leaders very regularly. So France's first attitude is one of sympathy with Poland.

Poland has had great internal difficulties since it has been having economic difficulties since 1 July last year. You remember: the announcement of a rise in meat prices, discontent among the people, then a strike in the Gdansk shipyards starting in August, and then the whole process of internal change in Poland. What is our attitude toward this process? It is to say that Poland must be allowed to live. Poland must be allowed to solve its problems by itself.

[Question] Excuse me. Can it? After all, it does have Soviet troops around it and inside its territory.

[Answer] Well, first one must know what has to be done and then take facts into account. And what must be done is to allow Poland to live, to allow Poland to resolve its problems itself. So we have the principle of noninterference. And any external interference in the affairs of Poland will bring about very serious consequences. And at the present time, everyone knows this perfectly well and is aware of it.

[Question] You told Mr Brezhnev so?

[Answer] I told Mr Brezhnev so. He knows.

[Question] Has it anything to do with the message you sent to Mr Brezhnev, which (?has been made public)?

[Answer] No, it has not been made public. We regularly exchange messages to analyze the international situation. It was not the only subject treated in this message. It spoke about the situation in Afghanistan, as well, and about other problems. I will say something about them in a minute. But it was one of the subjects of which I reminded him because our position on this has been made public several times.

[Question] Do you expect a reply?

[Answer] Yes. We exchange message regularly. I'll come back to your question, Mr Bortoli. No, it is natural that in solving its problems, Poland should take into account its geographic and strategic situation. This geographic and strategic situation is a fact of the present situation which no one can disregard. Therefore, there should be sympathy and noninterference in the domestic affairs of Poland, given, of course, its geographic and strategic situation, which at the present time can neither be ignored nor modified. The third point is that Poland and the Poles must make a big effort to solve their problems themselves, as one can see that their problem is not an easy one. It is even a very difficult one.

Poland, on the other hand, must be able to rely on aid. This aid would not be a substitute for Poland's efforts. It would be to make such an effort possible. Poland must be able to count on foreign aid to support its own efforts, which must be a national effort for recovery. Then, if you want, I will sum it up in three words with regard to Poland: sympathy, noninterference, aid.

[Question] When one sees the aspirations now being manifested in Poland, visible in Lech Walesa, through the Solidarity trade union, in other words, a Polish aspiration to secure a more liberal system, even in the geographic framework which you mentioned earlier, does it seem to you that this is something that the Soviets can put up with for long?

[Answer] It is not up to me to put myself in the place of the Soviets. It is up to them to answer.

My visit to Warsaw is sometimes mentioned. I think that the very frank conversation I had with Mr Brezhnev in Warsaw, in which I told him that the declarations made by this one or that one notwithstanding, it is quite clear that detente, which I now call the stabilization of East-West relations, will not be able to stand up to a fresh shock and that no illusions should be nurtured on this issue.

In the case of Poland, the self-restraint for which we call is not ours. On the contrary, it is self-restraint on the part of the Soviet Union.

One should see that with regard to a certain number of subjects. In fact, we expect the Soviet Union to show self-restraint, for instance, in the acts of destabilization in Africa, which are mistakes committed against the African continent, the poorest in the world, which is faced primarily with development tasks, and which should not become the focal point of rivalry between the superpowers. Well, here too, we call for self-restraint on the part of the Soviet Union. I spoke about this in my message. There should also be self-restaint in our own attitudes. For example, under the present circumstances, it would not be nice to use relations with China, relations that are normal and which should develop naturally, as an instrument directed at or conceived as an instrument of pressure against the Soviet Union. Therefore, there should be self-restraint on both sides.

In other words, a new factor in the international situation. Now is the time to make proposals, to make contact, to undertake action. It was totally useless a few months ago.

What is our attitude toward the new American administration? Well, first of all we have favorable expectations, favorable expectations because of two things: First of all, the new President of the United States is taking time to reflect, to think out his actions. He is not rushing into things faced with problems which, as you realize, are problems that are both very complicated and very serious. And the second thing is that in his statements he has indicated that he wants a strong America which will fully exercise its international responsibilities. This is what France always has wanted. America exercises its international responsibilities and we, of course, exercise ours, and in such a way that ours join with those of the United States. In the world balance, I always have said that it is bad if there is one superpower in a position of weakness and all the more so if this superpower is our ally.

[Question] Isn't there a bit of a dilemma here? Either America is weak and Western policy is then a bit chaotic and disunited or else it is strong and then we Europeans are relegated to rather walk-on parts?

[Answer] That is our problem. When I say it is a good thing if America is strong, I mean it is a good thing for America that America is strong. But of course, that doesn't mean that it will dictate our own policy to us with a correspondingly louder voice. And it is with this in mind that I have been on a crusade since last spring for Europeans to put an end to what I have criticized as a historical anomaly, in other words, the gradual disappearance of Europe in world affairs. I don't know if you followed my trip to West Germany. I started to present this theme in West Germany and it aroused a lot of interest because the leaders agreed with this position. I had the chance to talk about it often with the chancellor. But the German people, of their own accord, once they had been told of this theme, agreed with this position, and when I spoke of it, I was applauded by the German crowds. I took up the same theme in my talks with Mrs Thatcher when she came to France this autumn and I took up the theme again last week on Thursday and Friday when I went to Italy and talked with the leaders of the Italian Republic. In both cases, I met with approval on this theme: in other words, the idea that we must end this gradual disappearance of Europe from world affairs.

[Question] From this point of view, does something need to be changed in the functioning of the Atlantic alliance, to improve it? We were saying before that under the previous American administration there was often a feeling of reaction [words indistinct] dispersed. Are there things that can be done now, because, after all, the alliance is quite old, so one can well believe that it needs to be modified?

[Answer] Yes, I said a moment ago that the alliance was 32 years old. It goes back to 1949. I don't think so. I don't believe so. I'm not saying that nothing needs to be improved in the alliance. In any case, you remember that this latest amendment is not very old, since it dates from 1975 [words indistinct]. No, in my opinion, this is not where improvements have to be carried out. I think first of all that we must ask ourselves about the nature of this discussion, of the joint consultations between the United States and the European countries and how this is to be done. Then I think we must look and see how the European countries themselves must define their political stands on the important problems of the world. Those are the subjects that seem to me to be the most important. [word indistinct] discussion, the method of discussion between the United States and Europe, and the joint action of Europeans.

[Question] [words indistinct] on the consultation proposals?

[Answer] Yes, I think it will have to be done. Of course, France is going to have a period during which it will not be able to put forward proposals, since its political activity will be suspended by reason of its normal democratic process, its presidential elections.

[Question] Mr President, allow me to interrupt, because we have touched upon this rather technical part which you did not want to broach, if you will allow me this remark. I would like to go back to the relations between us, France, and the USSR. When America was not very strong, as you mentioned a moment ago, France could play a role with the USSR. Now that America will again become strong--it aspires to be so and will probably become so--will it be possible to proceed without France? Will France no longer be necessary?

[Answer] No, you know that France is a country which was considerable influence. You can see that in European affairs at present, considering our very close entente with Federal Germany, that there will be a question about that. We have the possibility of adopting a position which deeply influences--I do not say determines--but which deeply influences the position of Europe. The position of Europe is very important to the USSR, very important to the United States. We have, on the other hand, in the world, in Africa, very strong positions, and people will want to know what France's attitude will be in this respect. Therefore, France has great means of influence. I think, on the contrary, that if there exists a situation of better equilibrium between the United States and the USSR, France has a greater role and a possibility of influence.

After all, one word about equilibrium in defense, because we have not spoken about it. The problem in the future is to know whether the general orientation will be an arms race or whether it will be a limitation of armaments at a level as restricted as possible. At present, the question is still in the balance because the line over the past years was arms limitation, the SALT I and SALT II agreements. But you will recall that the SALT II agreement was not ratified. And negotiations on SALT III have not started. Decisions will have to be made in this sphere.

What is France's position? We favor strategic arms limitation. We, therefore, are in favor of the SALT II agreement, if necessary improved, if it has to be on this or that detail. But let us say that we are in favor of the SALT II agreement being finally approved. We are in favor of the strategic negotiations being continued so as to have a limitation on the frightening, frightening technological developments of future weapons. We are in favor of such a limitation.

What has happened? Why is there this debate within American opinion and this uncertainty about the quality of these agreements? I think that an historic error of appreciation has been committed on this subject. From the moment that one enters into an agreement of equalization of nuclear strategic arms, it is slightly technical, but I believe that people can understand.

[Question] There are many other questions that we wouldlike to ask, on Afghanistan, Africa, Tehran.

[Answer] Just another word on the subject. Regarding powerful submarines which can reach both the USSR and the United States within the first minutes of a nuclear conflict, where does one (?freeze) equality in this sphere? One arrives at a certain, not neutralization but limitation of chances on the possible use of these arms.

It is necessary to verify simultaneously that one is not in a situation of weakness regarding other arms. In fact, there are on the U.S. side certain [word indistinct] situations of weakness. We have seen it. There is no conscription. There is no obligatory military service. It exists in the USSR.

One sees certain weaknesses in the means of the land forces or in the deployment forces and even, at certain levels, of nuclear arms. So that, we are in favor of a limitation of nuclear arms and of a continuation of negotiations in this respect, but in a concept, or rather accompanied by a concept, which is that of a global equilibrium of forces.

[Question] I should like to put a question to you on relations between France and Federal Germany since [words indistinct] there is a point which is still obscure in the minds of many people concerning Venice, [words indistinct] and relations with the Soviet Union. After you had met Mr Brezhnev in Warsaw, France let it be known that there was to be a first withdrawal of Soviet troops in Afghanistan. Well, today, several months later, one sees that there still are just as many Soviet troops in Afghanistan. I mean, has the Soviet Union really been playing a game in this matter or has it tried somewhat to maneuver the West?

[Answer] On the intervention of Soviet forces in Afghanistan, I think the Soviets underestimated the reaction of the Afghan people. They told themselves that with a certain level of troops and action by the government installed in Afghanistan and the political parties supporting it, they could in a few months recreate a normal, or apparently normal situation in Afghanistan. This assessment was inexact. It is more than a year after the intervention. The internal resistance is continuing. The Soviets withdrew some troops, but finally they have not carried on this movement of disengagement and have maintained the same troop level since last July. So what is the conclusion to be drawn? It is that one must act again to obtain a political solution to the Afghan problem.

[Question] What can be done?

[Answer] What can be done, in my view, is the following: What are the participants saying? The Soviets sent troops into Afghanistan, and naturally the other countries, the world community is largely in the majority, since the vote in the United Nations was even bigger this autumn than last year. The international community is saying: evident intervention in Afghanistan.

[Question] But are arms not being sent to the Afghan resistance?

[Answer] No, certain countries in the area are doing so. [as heard] The Soviets say that there is intervention since there is support for the Afghan resistance. They assert that this support exists although this is contested or denied by other countries. So, since it is a matter of external intervention, it seems to me that the solution is to bring together at a conference all the countries which rightly or wrongly are accused or suspected of intervention in Afghanistan's internal affairs, primarily those who are intervening manifestly, such as the Soviet Union, or those who are thought to be intervening, such as Afghanistan's neighbors,--Pakistan and Iran, or those countries which are thought to be helping or supporting such movements--I am thinking of the permanent members of the Security Council.

[Question] Including France?

[Answer] Including France, including China, including Great Britain and the United States. And then there are the big countries of the area: India has an obvious responsibility in this part of Asia, and equally, in a form to be defined, the Islamic community, since it has followed this matter with special attention. So it should be a conference concerned not with the status of Afghanistan, because this approach has been tried, and for many reasons cannot reach its goal, but concerned with an end to intervention in Afghanistan, and in which everyone would undertake to put an end to it simultaneously and verifiably, in a way which would then allow the Afghans to recover their nonaligned status.

[Question] Mr President, this would be without the presence of the present Afghan Government as it exists, that is to say that it is not recognized by the international community as a whole.

[Answer] (?Well, really, there would be no reason for it to take part in it) since it is not a negotiations with Afghanistan, it would be a conference on nonintervention in Afghanistan on the part of all countries--I repeat--accused rightly or wrongly of practicing such intervention, and which should arrive at pledges of nonintervention, that is to withdraw forces where there are forces, not to dispatch forces where they have not been dispatched and not to deliver arms to Afghanistan so that Afghanistan can itself choose and affirm its position of a nonaligned country. I have proposed this formula to Mr Brezhnev.

[Question] And is he showing interest?

[Answer] I proposed this formula yesterday.

[Question] So that is a proposal from France. But, you are almost saying it yourself, there has been external intervention in Africa. [Words indistinct] can it be said that there is now a form of Soviet expansionism which can be dangerous?

[Answer] That is why I said just now that if one wanted a stabilization of East-West relations, there would be a need for restraint in international actions, for this stabilization could not be compatible with an alteration in the relationship of forces, or a modification of the relationship of the forces in the world to the advantage of someone or other, in particular the Soviet Union.

[Question] To make things clear to those listening in [word indistinct] if, let us suppose, the proposal you made in this message were to be accepted by all the countries you mentioned, this would not, naturally, lead in any way to the acceptance of a fait accompli, that is of the presence of Soviet troops in Afghanistan.

[Answer] No, because it would be a preliminary condition to put an end to interference and, first of all, to an interference that has been noted and is clearly evident, but also to put an end to threats of interference because the justification of interference means a risk or threat of interference. Therefore, an agreement can only be reached if it entails the withdrawal of all foreign forces. Of course... [interrupted]

[Question] Are the Americans acquainted with the proposal?

[Answer] [Words indistinct] have informed all possible participants.

[Question] One question about Africa. We intervened successfully in Kolwezi. We did not intervene to stop the Libyan thrust into Chad. People wonder whether there are two French policies regarding Africa?

[Answer] I want to maintain calm. Among the most irresponsible suggestions, the most irresponsible and adventurist suggestions I have heard in the past few weeks is the idea of intervention, of a possible French intervention in Chad. Let us ponder for a few minutes. When we intervene in a country, I repeat, (?there are several risks).

We have always intervened at the request of the government of that country and we have always intervened in circumstances such that France has not run the risk of suffering condemnation by international organizations, whether African or world organizations, and to be called upon to leave the country within a few days. Therefore, I remind you that was the situation in Chad. France helped Chad on two occasions. It helped Chad from 1969-72 at the time of General de Gaulle. He was the one to take the first decision which was continued by President Pompidou. It also was helped in 1978 by myself because the Government of Chad was being threatened by subversive forces which were obviously supported from outside. That was in fact the first Libyan penetration in Chad. I remind you, in 1973. You can see on the map, if you look at the northern part of Chad, what is called the Aqzou strip. Its occupation dates back to 1973. Therefore, we helped Chad to defend itself against foreign interference. What has been the situation in Chad since August 1979? Chad has a government, it is called the Transitional National Union Government which means it is a government of transition. It stems from an agreement reached by many African countries, called the Lagos accords. Two things were demanded by the Lagos accords, which is why I have brought the text with me and why I have the papers in front of me. I recall two things which were said: first, the neighboring countries on the northern side pledge not to interfere in Chadian affairs and to observe its territorial integrity. This particularly applied to Libya, Chad's neighboring country. It also was said that all parties representing Chad unanimously admitted that the continued presence of French troops in Chad represented an obstacle to seeking national reconciliation and prevented a peaceful settlement of the Chadian problem. The Chadian parties then agreed that the Transitional National Union Government, once formed, was to proceed to the evacuation of French troops. That was summer 1979. This was said on 21 August and on 23 August. The French cabinet said: In these circumstances, we are ready to withdraw our troops. And it was in spring 1980 that we withdrew our troops without the loss of a single man, without the loss of a single man, while ensuring the evacuation of all French and foreign civilians from Ndjamena. What then happened was a civil war in Chad. In this civil war, the government, the Transitional National Union Government, appealed to the Libyan forces to ensure the success of the government. At that point, the Lagos agreements were violated.

Was France to intervene? Was France to send troops to a country torn apart by civil war, whose legitimate government its most legitimate government, would have opposed the coming of French forces, would have informed the Security Council the same day or the day after? We would not have a single voice raised in our defense. Our unfortunate African friends would have been in an impossible situation because they could not [word indistinct] a legitimate government justify the sending of troops from a foreign country [words indistinct] and which had no national reason to intervene. Therefore, we would have been condemned within the United Nations and we would have been told to leave in the next few hours. We would have entered a civil war with advanced weapons in full view of the press. We would have lost tens of hundreds of men and the responsibility would have been that of the president of the French Republic. Condemned on an international level, we would have sent the French troops into an adventurist action, an adventure without an objective because what could one have done. You know the task in Chad, to occupy Chad and take the troops to the frontier and install a government. This comes from a major, a major political error.

[Question] But if tomorrow one of the African states, worried by what is currently happening, does call on France?

[Answer] If one of the African states calls on France, it will have France's support.

[Question] Will there be another Kolwezi? [words indistinct]

[Answer] Yes, it will have France's support because the French must well understand that when I ee such suggestions, I would say there is a certain amount of unpardonable irresponsibility, because, in these complex situations, to claim that France could and should intervene in a similar situation represents irresponsible adventurism, because we would have had no objective and we would be condemned by world public opinion.

On the contrary, what we did was to condemn Libyan intervention. This is what we had to do. I read recently in an article that no one justifies or approves this condemnation. I approve of it. One cannot tell us in the same breath that one must speak in the case of Afghanistan and keep silent in the case of Chad. Furthermore, two things had to be done: First, a stand regarding the projected merger between Libya and Chad had to be taken and we condemned this projected merger. And what did the African heads of state say? They said that this decision was null and void and they did this a few days after the French Government itself took the same stand. Moreover, I trust the patriotism of the Chadian people because the Chadian people are so patriotic as not to accept such a situation. You will hear little by little voices raised in Chad in protest against this merger which, you will see, will not take place. Then, we had to reassure the African countries with which France has defense agreements. We had thus to tell them what we told them and show them what we intended to do, that should their order and integrity be threatened and should they appeal to France, naturally France would help them with suitable means--and I can tell you that it has the means.

[Question] Thus, in this case also, one does not accept the fait accompli of the Libyan presence and your assessment of the followup is that this presence will not last long and that the present state of Chad as it appears now is provisional?

[Answer] My assessment to the Africans as they (?see) it and to the extent that they want to do it, is that they should exercise the necessary pressure so that the Libyans withdraw from Chad. It is up to the Chadian Government and to the Chadian people through their national spirit to ask the Libyan forces to leave their country.

[Question] Do they have the means?

[Answer] They certainly have the means to apply pressure, of course within the framework of international pressure. On the contrary, I remind you that should they need other African forces to be stationed there to ensure temporary security of the ceasefire, we have never raised objections to the presence of legitimate African forces in Chad. Finally, we maintain the guarantee extended to the African countries with which we have defense agreements, that they should not, and that they can be aware that their security... [interrupted by interviewer]

[Question] There are both the means and the political will to do it?

[Answer] Well, regarding the political will we have intervened [words indistinct] we have intervened every time there was a need to redress an unacceptable situation in Africa. We did it in Mauritania, in Central Africa, we did it in Kolwezi and we did it in 1978 in Chad. We intervened. You make me say things I don't want to say because I don't like to justify what one does. We intervened each time it was necessary to redress an unacceptable situation in Africa. We did it in Mauritania, in Central Africa, we did it in Kolwezi and we did it in 1978 in Chad.

There are two types of criticism one hears about this kind of affair, about Chad, Central Africa, and so on. The first criticism is that our moderation, at least in appearance, is explained by the economic links one can have, for example with Libya. Naturally, when it comes to this, everybody speaks about oil. The second type of criticism is that in this kind of affair one finally accepts relations with people that are not perhaps ideal interlocutors, like Hissein Habre at a certain time, who was one of Chad's leaders, or long ago, Bokassa for Central Africa.

As a matter of fact, the positions taken by the government--you saw it yourselves--bore no relation to economic interests. Besides, the position we took the sending of our forces--notably in Central Africa recently to assure the security of the states neighboring Chad--this position shows that there was no weakness or compliasance. Nobody made a mistake in Africa. Nobody. On the other hand, it is not up to us to choose regimes in Africa. As I said before this is a colonial conception. It is not up to us to choose them. Naturally, such regimes are often open to criticism. This is a fact. What is often difficult is to know whether we should maintain links with them while in fact they are regimes open to criticism, because there are security problems.

As a matter of fact, we had to take into consideration such security situations. May I remind you that when he was deposed, the former Central African leader, where was he? He was in Tripoli, you remember. Where were his forces trained? In Libya. Therefore, we had to take precautions.

[Question] Can one agree to treat as an honorable interlocutor, quite acceptable, somebody who, like Al-Qadhdhafi, behaves in such a way as to permit [word indistinct] the ransacking of our embassy in Tripoli?

[Answer] We deal with different countries and different heads of state, taking their attitudes into consideratin. Has Colonel al-Qadhdhafi been to Paris? While I am in office? Have you seen him? [words indistinct]

[Question] Should our relations with Africa be characterized by military aid? Is there not another way of helping Africa when one sees how much it suffers, how underdeveloped it is? Africa is not emerging from underdevelopment.

[Answer] The theme we have often defended, my theme, is that Africa's big problem is development and that the offenses committed against Africa--that is why I said earlier that the destabilization of Africa was an offense against Africa--prevent Africa from developing. Why do certain states ask us to ensure their security? Because they cannot afford it and it would be really absurd if they used their means to set up modern armed forces, because Africa should devote its resources to its development tasks. You will recall that I have proposed several times, with a certain response but not enough, that there should be a new program of economic promotion for Africa. I have proposed it to our big Western partners and I believe that we should make much bigger efforts toward development for Africa.

[Question] Mr President, is it true that there are certain French-German difficulties? People are saying that there are difficulties between Valery Giscard d'Estaing and Helmut Schmidt. [words indistinct]

[Answer] No, this is not a good approach to foreign affairs, that is, starting with stories or the fact that someone is doing something. The facts should be examined and the facts are a lot clearer. France and Federal Germany comprise the core of the organization of Europe. These are not exclusive relations [words indistinct] Great Britain, relations with Italy but it is a fact that they comprise the core because it has been the reconciliation which has marked the history of Europe over the past decades. So we have very close cooperation with Federal Germany. This cooperation has not experienced any recent modification. Why is this question being asked? In my view, it is because it has been seen that Federal Germany has attached much importance to what is called intra-German relations, relations between West and East Germany. Since it is said that this is a subject which concerns Germany exclusively, one which does not affect France directly, there is a principle of divergence here. The Germans are going to attach great importance to this issue, the French less, and so thay are going to see their political line gradually diverging. I tell you this because I understand very well that for the Government of Federal Germany intra-German relations are a very important issue and I take this into consideration. The government of any country placed in such a situation would do the same thing.

I can also tell you that regarding our relations with Federal Germany, no one is authorized to say that the principles to which we both adhere should be questioned in any way, that is, the principles of our membership in the organization of Europe, bilateral French-German cooperation and the approach to the problems of security. So, the French-German core remains and will remain, in my view, the central core of Europe. Moreover, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is coming here next week. You already have questioned him once. You will be seeing him next week.

[Question] In a word, you have no doubt about the loyalty and solidarity of the German partner?

[Answer] I have no doubt.

[Question] Quickly, if we can, we only have 5 minutes left with you. I would like to ask you about relations with Israel. You met a few days ago with Mr Shimon Peres. Can it be said that there is an improvement in relations with Israel?

[Answer] [words indistinct] Problems of peace in the Near East and I want the Israeli Government, whether it is the present one or a new Israeli Government after the elections--this is above all a fundamental idea--to arrive speedily at a global peace. I am convinced that this global peace is possible. It presupposes some concepts, obviously, but I am convinced that it is possible and having listened to the people with whom I have talked, I think that one can work usefully to seek (?this peace).

[Question] The American hostages are arriving in the United States practically at this moment. I would like to know how the French Government, how you, yourself, followed the development of this affair?

[Answer] We followed this whole problem very closely. I can tell you that we often had public contacts, often secret contacts, that Mr Warren Christopher came to see me, to speak to me about this matter of negotiation at a period which was critical and we said that we had spoken of other things because we could not reveal it all. Thus, from one end of the affair to the other, France showed the solidarity which was required in this affair since the detention of these hostages was indescribable. It was contrary to international law. It could not be accepted, so we had to show solidarity with any effort to secure their release.

[Question] Under Genral de Gaulle and Mr Pompidou, and under you yourself, foreign policy appears to be a field reserved for the president of the republic. Does this seem normal to you in a democracy. Is it a matter of temperament, constitution or international necessity, Mr President?

[Answer] I have never opposed the holding of debates on foreign policy in parliament. So, I am a supporter of a broad parliamentary debate on this subject, a supporter of a broad debate within public opinion on this subject, a debate which, of course, respects the objectivity and restraint which are necessary since these are very important and very complex issues. It happens that in current international life state leaders have particular responsibilities. And one sees this at summit meetings. One sees this in the correspondence which they exchange. But I can tell you that I do not make any decision or announce any initiative without very close consultation with the government, and in particular not without my asking for the opinions of the minister of foreign affairs and the premier.

[Question] When will you say whether you will be a candidate in the presidential elections?

[Answer] In fact, you are going outside the subject of our debate tonight, but, if you will, I will return to it for my conclusion. As for the presidential election, I have duties toward French men and women, duties to inform them. And I have duties only toward them. You know that article 7 of the constitution stipulates what the normal period of notice is in the case of the election of a president of the republic: This period of notice is between 20 to 35 days. Thus, I shall inform French men and women of my intentions on this point within a period of time which respects their right to be informed and their right to be able to reflect.

Going back to foreign affairs, we have spoken about various issues. We have had little time. It is a vast subject. A few days ago I had a conversation with a foreign prime minister. He said to me: We look at France from the outside and what strikes us is that France has advanced. France has advanced in the field of energy independence. France is the country in the world which has made the greatest effort in this. France has advanced in industrial restructuring. France is organizing its industry to confront the crisis. France has advanced in the field of defense since of all the Western countries it is the one which has made the greatest defense effort in the most recent years. So, France has advanced. This is what we see from outside. Well, my wish for France is that it will continue to advance.

GOVERNMENT TO EXERT CAUTION IN RESUMING IRAN TIES

[Maurice Delarue report: "Paris To Observe Interval of 'Decorum' and Prudence before Reestablishing Relations With Tehran"]

[Text] The release of the hostages in Iran creates more problems than it resolves for the French Government. The tone of the official statements on the raising of sanctions, contradictory in spirit if not in their letter, betray a certain embarrassment. As things stand, it is at least possible to reveal certain lines of conduct:

1. The French Government is keen to ensure a good beginning to its relations with President Reagan;
2. Paris will maintain with respect the Tehran a certain wait-and-see attitude, until the Iranian regime and its policy are more firm;
3. Good relations with the Arab world are still generally a priority, though they are difficult with some governments;
4. Irrespective of political fluctuations and conflicts of interests, existing trade contracts, including armaments contracts, will be honored.

France "concluded" well with Mr Carter's Presidency, as indicated by the outgoing U.S. President's message to Giscard d'Estaing. It has not gotten off to a bad start with Mr Reagan's, with a telephone call expressing no more--but for the time being that is what is needed--than a mutual willingness to work together. Firm dates have been set for conversations with the new Washington leaders to prepare for the private visit (planned a long time ago) which Francois-Poncet will pay to the United States on 2-5 February. Of course, Mr Schmidt has already met the new President. Mrs Thatcher will be the first European head of government to pay him an official visit, and no French-U.S. summit is envisaged before the July summit of the "seven industrial giants" in Ottawa, but the race to shake hands with the new occupant of the White House is prompting some showy diplomacy, it is said in Paris.

But it is the basic stances that are important. With regard to the hostages affair and its repercussions, irrespective of the criticisms sometimes made of French policy in the United States, the U.S. leaders are well aware that France is one of its allies whose conduct has been most loyal and that it now intends to act cautiously. Several EC governments were ready to resume relations with Tehran as if nothing had happened. One of them even decided to announce officially to the Iranians "its satisfaction" that they had at last consented to release their prisoners! Moreover, at Wednesday's cabinet meeting the president of the republic said, according to his spokesman Mr Poirier, that "it would not be decorous to respond immediately to the U.S. hostages' release with a gesture of a commercial nature." The following day the presidential spokesman explained as follows: "The government is taking measures to set a process in motion to permit economic sanctions to be raised."

Mr Giscard d'Estaing's reference to "decorum" is undoubtedly prompted less by moral scruples than by basic caution. Major political and economic uncertainties still loom over Iran, and the revelations about the tortures suffered by the hostages will not allow the matter to be quickly forgotten.

In practice, the raising of sanctions should depend first on a collective decision by the Ten--this was taken Tuesday--and then on national decisions, that is by France, to annul a decree dated 22 May 1980. Then there is the effective resumption of trade relations, which does not depend on the governments alone. There is a major source of contention between France and Iran, involving among others, the following companies: FRAMATOME, EURODIF, ELF, GAZOCEAN, the Enterprise Bureau and Dumez.

Obviously the most delicate aspect is the sale to Iran of three missile-launching gunboats hitherto kept in Cherbourg by the embargo. Though the government maintains great discretion in matters concerning armaments, it seems that it will not oppose the delivery of the gunboats, as long as the problems regarding payment are resolved and the Iranians still want them.

Be that as it may, there is still a risk--cynics might say a chance--that France will also supply weapons to Iraq. At a 27 November meeting with Iran's emissary Mr Navab, Mr Francois-Poncet rejected his request for a halt to deliveries of Mirage fighters purchased by Iraq, replying that France "will fulfill current contracts."

Furthermore, this principle will be applied also to Libya, despite its intervention in Chad. Of course, events in N'djamena have led the French Government to alter its long-term policy and to abandon any further dangerous gambles on Colonel al-Qadhdhafi. However, it has no intention of not honoring its commitments.

VISITING NIGERIAN FOREIGN MINISTER DISCUSSES CHAD

AB262117 Paris AFP in English 1806 GMT 26 Jan 81

[Excerpt] Paris, Jan 26 (AFP)--Visiting Nigerian Foreign Minister Ishaya Audu today expressed hope that the people of Chad, a former French colony, will be left to decide their future by themselves in the next few months, if not immediately. We would like to see that the people of Chad are left to decide their future by themselves without any apparent coercion by anybody else, he told journalists after a 30-minute meeting with President Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

In practice, we are hoping such a situation will become feasible, possible, in the next few months, if not immediately. It is hoped that this will help to consolidate peace in Chad , he added. He mentioned no foreign country by name.

Mr Audu, who arrived here today for a five-day official visit to France, said that Nigeria was prepared to help with logistic and other arrangements for an African peace-keeping force for Chad. But he recalled that the 1979 Lagos agreement that called for the creation of such a force ruled out active participation by Nigeria and Chad's other immediate neighbors. The Lagos agreement, signed by 11 of Chadian political and military factions, set up the Chadian transitional government, which is led by President Goukouni Oueddei.

Mr Audu, the first Nigerian minister to make an official visit to France since the return to civilian rule in Nigeria in 1979, said that he and the French president discussed Chad and other problems of common interest in Africa. He added that they had also discussed economic cooperation very briefly and mentioned one or two world problems.

Mr Audu, who said that France and Nigeria had had one or two ups and downs in their past relations, added that he had come to France to build a solid foundation for future relations between the two countries. He expressed the hope that this would lead to more ups and less downs in the future. Nigeria is France's third largest supplier of oil, after Saudi Arabia and Iraq.

Additional comments

NC271255 Paris AFP in English 1234 GMT 27 Jan 81

[Excerpts] Paris, 27 Jan (AFP)--Nigerian Foreign Minister Ishaya Audu said here today that he believes the majority of Chad's people are opposed to a merger with Libya.

He told reporters that Nigeria was ready to give Chad any help it could, including military, to allow it to withstand merger pressures.

He said Nigeria was worried that if Libya consolidated its presence in Chad, it could be used as a jumping-off point for incursions into other countries. Chad has borders with Nigeria, Niger, Cameroun, Central African Republic and Sudan. Mr Audu said Nigeria, Sudan and Egypt are in regular contact on the Chadian situation.

Libya had no right to demand that France withdraw its troops from African states--such as Central African Republic, Senegal and Gabon--if they were there at the express request of those governments, the Nigerian foreign minister said.

Although it was preferable that no foreign fórces be present in Africa, Mr Audu said, every legitimate government had the right to call on whoever it wanted for help.

But he said Chad's transitional government under President Goukouni Oueddei, set up as a result of the Lagos accords of August, had "limited legitimacy" and was not competent to decide on a merger with another state. Only a freely elected government could decide that, Mr Audu said?

Further Remarks

AB271255 Paris AFP in English 1209 GMT 27 Jan 81

[Excerpt] Paris, 27 Jan (AFP)--Nigerian Foreign Minister Ishaya Audu said here today that he believes the majority of Chad's people are opposed to a merger with Libya. He told reporters that Nigeria was ready to give Chad any help it could, including military, to allow it to withstand merger pressures.

Nigeria would not intervene unilaterally in Chad, but might do so, if asked, in the context of an Organization of African Unity (OAU) force, Mr Audu said.

The Nigerian minister, who is on an official visit to France, said his government believes the Libyan presence in Chad is a threat to the security of Africa. This position tallies very closely with France's stand on Chad, and Mr Audu said the two countries should coordinate their objectives so as to allow Chad to be in a position to manager its own affairs.

Mr Audu said Libya's past attempts at mergers--with Egypt, Tunisia and Syria--had failed, but that in the present case, Tripoli was dealing with a very weak country.

PERTINI TERRORISM COMMENTS GET SOVIET PROTEST

AU280937 Rome ANSA in English 0820 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Text] Rome, 28 Jan (ANSA)-- Authoriative sources close to Italian President Sandro Pertini's office have made it clear here that Pertini's recent interview with French television on the eventual international ramifications of political terrorism in Italy made "no reference to the precise responsibilities of any particular country". The clarification, issued Tuesday evening after the Italian ambassador in Moscow was called in by the Soviet Foreign Ministry and read a toughly worded oral protest against what were described as "absurd" statements contrary to friendly Italo-Soviet relations.

Saying they were merely limiting the polemics to the bounds of "objective fact", the sources said Pertini merely pointed out that "two countries on the frontiers of the Atlantic area, Turkey and Italy, are the object of an intensive terrorist offensive".

On the domestic scene, the interview, granted during a visit here by French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, sparked a hail of parliamentary questions and a decision from the speaker's office at the Rome lower house to hold a debate on the subject next Tuesday. Apart from the clarification in circles near to Pertini's office, no further official reaction was forthcoming.

At the Italian Foreign Ministry, usually reliable sources noted that diplomatic chief Emilio Colombo was making a "close examination" of the Soviet protext and reserved making the "appropriate contacts". The tough wording of the protest was noted in political circles but the major stress linked official silence to the upcoming parliamentary debate. In these circles, the Foreign Ministry's position was held to be one of due respect for Parliament. In other words, the argument went, the Rome Government will make no official response to the Soviet move until the parliamentary discussion is complete.

Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani advanced the hypothesis that, if the government had "immediately" made it clear it would answer the parliamentary questions on the case, "it would have prevented any foreign intervention". "With this", he added, "I do not mean to enter even minimally into addressing any form of reproof, because this is not in my competence or intention, against our colleagues with government responsibility".

Christian Democrat Party Secretary Flaminio Piccoli observed that, "in the state of the facts", it is not possible "to know on the basis of what information the head-of-state founded his intuitions" on the international links of terrorism. Piccoli also stressed the government's readiness to offer Parliament "all the elements useful for an objective evaluation" and voiced his party's conviction that "clarity, accompanied by discretion and reserve, are required for a serious and effective contribution to the battle against terrorism".

Secretary Bettino Craxi of the Italian Socialist Party, another member of the governing coalition, urged that the government should "know how to respond to the Soviet Government with the precision, seriousness and rigor the case requires". Craxi added that it would be interesting to know if the Soviet Government's protest should be understood as also being made on behalf of the "governments allied or linked to the Soviet Union".

Social Democrat Party Secretary Pietro Longo, speaking for the third of the four government parties, told reporters that it was in the "historical tradition of dictatorships" to follow "an official policy of peace and friendship, and an underground one of destabilization and the fomentation of subversion".

"The Soviet Union has never escaped from this rule", he declared.

COLOMBO REPORTS ON CAIRO TALKS WITH AS-SADAT

AU270837 Rome ANSA in English 0805 GMT 27 Jan 81

[Excerpts] Cairo, 27 Jan (ANSA)--Not only does Egypt look with favor on the European Economic Community's peace initiative for the Mideast, but considers it vital to a solution of the problem, according to Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo who has just wound up two days of talks in Cairo with Egyptian President Anwar as-Sadat.

Sources close to the delegation led by Colombo said that As-Sadat approved by the EEC Mideast peace venture because it would help [word indistinct] the signers of the Camp David accords to get on with implementation of the agreements.

Speaking to journalists yesterday, Colombo said that the intransigence of Israeli Premier Menachem Begin had brought the Mideast question to an impasse which must be broken. Colombo also reported that Italy will open a credit line of 100 million dollars to Egypt and will set up a technical cooperation program between the two countries which will employ financial resources worth 75 million dollars to be allocated over a three-year period.

PCI LEADER BERLINGUER ELABORATES ON EUROCOMMUNISM

LD271243 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 22 Jan 81 pp 1, 19

[Unattributed report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer 21 January interview on Italian television: "Berlinguer Answers Questions on PCI's History and Policy"]

[Excerpts] The 60th anniversary of the founding of the PCI yesterday gave rise to several political and cultural events and initiatives. Enrico Berlinguer was interviewed on television Newsreel 1 by Pierantonio Graziani. Berlinguer answered a number of questions concerning the reasons which led to the birth of the PCI and on Communist policy today.

[Question] What is the difference between the Togliattian line that began with the "Salerno swing," the "Italian road to socialism" and present-day Eurocommunism?

[Answer] The basic differnce lies in the fact tha through Eurocommunism the struggle for a socialist transformation of Italy along a democratic path and for a kind of socialism itself built on the foundations of democracy and freedom is taking place no longer solely in a national dimension but in a European dimension, that of Western Europe, taking into account the shared traits that exist among the economically most advanced European countries, including Italy, and taking into account also the need to unify the experiments that have been carried out in this period of history by the various political groups of the West European workers movement. [answer ends]

Next the interviewer asked, basically, about the nature of the "famous third way between social democracy and real socialism."

"In short," Berlinguer explained, "it can be said to be as follows: We wish to differentiate ourselves on the one hand from the social democracies, which we criticize because, even through their government experiences, they have never managed to take a real step forward on the path to transcending capitalist society; and at the same time we wish to differentiate ourselves from the experiences of socialism that have hitherto been realized in the East European countries, inasmuch as we are struggling for a kind of socialism based on the observance and expansion of all freedoms."

[Question] Is there any room for dissent and, if not for organized currents, then for any opposing these in the innovative conception of the party outlined at the latest PCI Central Committee meeting?

[Answer] Not in organized currents. We believe that organized currents constitute--as shown by the experience of other parties--a degenerative form of democracy and of moral standards in party life. There is indeed room, and very much so, for dissent--even for dissent expressed openly and freely in voting.

[Question] What is the significance of the 27 November "swing," that is the democratic alternative proposed by the PCI, with respect to previous formulations of party strategy?

[Answer] We stand by the quest for unity among all democratic forces and for the broadcast social alliances within the working class. The innovation lies in the fact that in view of the DC's now obvious inability to lead the necessary task of regenerating and reforming the country, the Communist Party considers itself entitled to put itself forward as the driving force behind, and major guarantor of, a unity government comprising all the democratic forces which will rally honest and competent people from all the parties. [answer ends]

Next the interviewer returned to the subject of Eurocommunism, asking what the "prospects for an Italian-style, French-style and Spanish-style communism" are, particularly in view of the PCF's criticisms.

"We believe," Berlinguer said, "that Eurocommunism is a profoundly valid inspiration with a role to play in the future. There might be temporary difficulties, ups and downs, along this road, but where does its instrinsic validity lie? It lies in the fact that we are now witnessing a turmoil among the social democratic parties, within whose ranks there is a quest for new paths, and at the same time we are witnessing progress beyond old forms and ideas that have in the past characterized communist parties. Hence the need to find a new path. We believe that not only in the Italian working class, but also in the working class, the workers' masses and the young people of the European countries, there are now these expectations and this quest for something new that will help surmount the ills of capitalist society and achieve a profound regeneration of the socities on this side of the European Continent."

NEW ARMY CHIEF OF STAFF GARCIA DOS SANTOS SWORN IN

LD280104 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 27 Jan 81

[Text] A change-of-command ceremony was held this morning at the army headquarters in which General Garcia dos Santos was sworn in as the army chief of staff.

Speaking at the ceremony Garcia dos Santos said:

[Begin Dos Santos recording] Since 25 April 1974 we have set out on the road to finally creating a democratic military apparatus in Portugal, that is, an armed forces made up of democratic servicemen at the service of democracy and the nation. A democratic serviceman is one who, irrespective of his political direction as an individual citizen manifested through the forms of membership laid down by the law, is an element of the armed forces as a whole and forms part of this whole, abiding by the laws written by the legitimate representatives of the people. The ideas within this concept are numerous but all of them boil down to the qualities I referred to earlier and which I would like to highlight as follows: discipline [words indistinct] based on a civic sense and patriotism which leads to the fulfillment, individually or collectively, of the mission appropriate to the armed forces; conscious and permanent defense of the ethical and professional values which represent the indispensable and continual unity, moral strength and efficiency of the armed forces; efficacious and responsible exercise of command as a guarantee that the armed forces will, under all circumstances, respect the decisions of a democratically legitimized political power. [end recording]

The question of institutional balance and the other widely discussed question of the subordination of military power to civilian power were not, contrary to expectations, overlooked in Garcia dos Santos' speech.

[Begin Dos Santos recording] It is up to us, the military--without creating any mechanisms to isolate the armed forces from civilian society--to let the armed forces develop in accord with the social evolution itself, without prejudice to the preservation of the fundamental values which make the armed forces truly and (?markedly) democratic. It is incumbent upon us, as the military, and for the defense of the democratic and pluralist regime already set up in our country, to adopt a strictly neutral and nonpartisan conduct by casting aside our political options as individual citizens. [end recording]

President Ramalho Eanes, who spoke next, referred to the changes to be carried out in the relations between the military establishment and civilian society. He expressed hope:

[Begin Eanes recording] I am sure such necessary changes will take place during your term of office, thereby ending a long cycle of military interference in political affairs. The army [words indistinct] the people's will, democratically assumed and respected. For this reason, the army neither is nor can be the (?support) or an instrument of the wishes and restricted interests, of ambitions and projects that do not conform with the democratically affirmed will and national interests. [end recording]

The president of the republic also referred to the degree of political (?intervention) desirable in the military establishment.

[Begin Eanes recording] Each serviceman has his vote and nothing more in political terms. The armed forces is a national institution, at the service of the Porguguese people and democracy, and respects the legitimate choices expressed in the free and universal suffrage. And if these are unquestionable norms, the armed forces cannot serve as a shelter to any form of organizing pressure groups, where these hold a corporate intent which clashes with the hierarchical responsibility or are a base for political intervention which betrays the national mission and democratic commitment of the military establishment. These are not only norms that are unquestionable but which are solidly grounded on an experience that guides us and on a coherence of military policy which practice has proven valid and suitable to the needs of the Portuguese Armed Forces.

All these are indeed norms which we shall have to continue to abide by, so that the tasks and problems peculiar to the armed forces can be resolved satisfactorily and in keeping with the country's resources. [end recording]

CUNHAL RETURNS FROM TRIP TO GREECE, YUGOSLAVIA

LD252258 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 25 Jan 81

[Text] On arrival in Lisbon from Yugoslavia yesterday, Communist Party leader Alvaro Cunhal told reporters that the PCP is in full agreement with the doubts expressed by the leaders of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia and of the Greek Communist Party with regard to the present political situation in Portugal.

On the revision of the constitution, the PCP secretary general said that he is not against introducing changes to the country's fundamental law, but maintained that this must be done in accordance with the constitution's own stipulations.

Alvaro Cunhal added that he is aware that draft amendments have been drawn up and he expressed concern at the expression, "the liberation of civilian society from the tutelage of the military," being used in certain quarters. He said that the goal implicit in the phrase might be to replace the 25 April (?hierarchies) with reactionary ones.

PCP Statement on Trip

LD261356 Lisbon in Portuguese to Timor Macao and Australia 0930 GMT 26 Jan 81

[Text] The PCP released a communique yesterday in connection with the recent visit to Yugoslavia and Greece by its secretary general, Dr Alvaro Cunhal.

The communique says that the Portuguese and Greek Communist Parties agree on all the matters discussed in Athens and that both express their solidarity with the Afghan and Polish regimes. They also voiced their solidarity with what they call the Turkish democratic organizations and advocated the withdrawal of all (?nuclear) warships from the Mediterranean and the transformation of this area into a zone of peace and cooperation.

SECOND PHASE OF CSCE BEGINS PLENARY SESSION

LD272016 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1400 GMT 27 Jan 81

[Text] We begin with a dispatch from Madrid's Palace of Congresses, where the sessions of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe resume today. Over to you, Jose Manuel Salgado:

The second phase of the CSCE began at Madrid's Palace of Congresses this morning, with pretty hardline stances being struck.

The plenary session, meeting behind closed doors, was addressed first by the head of the Soviet delegation, Deputy Foreign Minister Leonid Ilichev, who after some words of congratulation on the way the first pahse had been held, spoke of the proposals--some 90 of them--submitted so far. Ilichev described some of them as constructive and others as less constructive, or even provocative, since, he said, they are aimed at undermining the Socialist order. One must always bear in mind, he said, that this forum--the only one at which dialogue between East and West is currently in progress--(?represents the interests) of political systems, and that should never be forgotten. Naturally, he voiced support for the Polish proposal for a conference on military detente and disarmament, stressing that no prior conditions should be laid down.

The Netherlander, (Van Donging), spoke on behalf of the 10 members of the European Community, rejecting the idea put forward by the Soviet speaker that an attempt is being made to rewrite the Helsinki Act, and he referred to the confidence building measures, which are not sufficient for Europeans. He supported the French proposal for a conference on disarmament, the main point of which is to treat the whole of the European part of the Soviet Union, that is, as far as the Urals, as falling within the area over which disarmament on the continent is to be effected.

The British speaker took an ever harder line, suggesting peace through change, freedom and cooperation. And he accused the Soviet Union of continuing to fail to respect human rights, even after the Madrid Conference had begun.

This point was pressed also by the U.S. delegate, Max Kampelman, who said that since 9 September, the date when the preparatory meeting for this conference began, 20 arrests had been made in the Soviet Union; and that since 19 December, the date of the ending of the first phase of the conference, 9 trials and been held in the USSR and 2 more arrests had been made. He cited specific cases and names.

Kampelman began his address by saying that his country's position would remain the same, despite the change of administration. He referred again to the case of Afghanistan, with which, he said, the Soviet Union is (?consistently) challenging the other 24 countries at the conference [words indistinct]. If the word detente means anything, he said, it does not describe the current state of relations between East and West, but rather signifies a goal to be attained.

UCD COMMUNIQUE ON CONGRESS POSTPONEMENT

[Text] The Information Secretariat of the Union of Democratic Center [UCD] has issued communique from the Executive Committee at whose meeting the suspension of the second congress of the centrists was decided.

It said: At its meeting tonight under the chairmanship of Adolfo Suarez, the UCD Executive Committee decided unanimously to postpone its second national congress because of the impossibility of delegates being able to travel [to venue in Palma de Mallorca] because of the work-to-rule by air traffic controllers which began today. UCD subordinates its interest to the superior interest of the state and the public which demand a solution to the conflict by the appropriate means without interference from events which could be exploited as an irregular means of pressure. At its next meeting, the UCD Executive Committee will examine a new date for the second national congress.

PCE OFFICIAL REJECTS REPEAT OF MONCLOA PACT

LD261315 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 20 Jan 81 p 15

[Antonio Nunez report: "PCE Is Opposed to Further 'Moncloa Pacts,' According to Sanchez Montero"]

[Text] Leon--The PCE will not accept a "second edition" of the Moncloa pacts, according to what Communist leader Simon Sanchez Montero stated on Sunday in Leon, during a press conference at which he was asked about his party's readiness to support an "economic policy of consultation," as was demanded on Saturday by Felipe Gonzalez. The Communist leader added that the PCE's entry into the negotiation of an economic plan for the country "will depend on the specific way in which it is approached," and, at all events, will require the participation of a leftwing party (the Spanish Socialist Workers Party) [PSOE] in the government, as a guarantee that there will not be a failure to implement the most progressive aspects of the plan, as happened in the case of the Moncloa pacts.

Nevertheless, Sanchez Montero said that he was pleased by Felipe Gonzalez' statements, and reiterated that his party has been demanding for months the formation of a union of the Democratic Center-PSOE government, "even without the Communists' direct participation," but provided that the latter could take part in the negotiation of its political program.

With respect to the possible convening of a special congress of the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC], he said that this will not take place immediately, "but when the opportune conditions exist." At all events, this possibility had already been raised at the first PSUC Central Committee meeting, and negotiations continued until only 4 days ago, when the latest meeting between the chairman of that party--Pere Ardiaca--and PCE leaders took place.

Throughout his statements, Sanchez Montero emphasized that, according to a section of the Catalonian Communists, only 15 percent of party members took part in the election of the delegates or in the debate on the reports for the last congress, as a result of which "they believe that the labor is not a faithful reflection of the party." He added that what happened in Catalonia is due not so much to an internal power struggle among the PSUC's various ideological groups as to a radicalization of many party members in light of the economic and international crisis. "There are people," he said, "who are returning to the great certainties and the traditional policy, which is now outmoded."

PCE'S BRABO ANALYZES PROBLEMS RAISED BY PSUC

LD271425 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 21 Jan 81 p 4

[PCE Executive Committee member Pilar Brabo article: "Eurocommunism and the PCE's Renewal"]

[Text] The rejection of the term "Eurocommunism" at the first Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] congress raises a number of issues of the greatest importance to the future not only of the PSUC or of PCE-PSUC relations, but also the PCE itself. In my view, the need to retain the PCE's Eurocommunist character and to reestablish it within the PSUC is the most important battle to be waged in relation to the 10th PCE congress, on the one hand, and the kind of future envisaged by the PSUC, on the other. But this battle must be neither static nor merely symbolic: It must be a dynamic battle that will open up to communists throughout the Spanish State the prospect of what is to be done in the eighties. The decade promises to be difficult, but it will be essential, from the viewpoint of democracy and socialism in our country, to consolidate the Communist Party's strength and influence.

It would be wrong for us, the PCE, to set ourselves up as supreme judges of what has happened within the PSUC, as if all the problems, shortcomings and errors could be attributed to the Catalan communists. It would be even more wrong to ascribe the causes of defeat of the term "Eurocommunism" to the alleged "nationalism" of the PSUC.

Nevertheless, we must not underestimate the problem or act as if "nothing happened." Something--and something serious--has happened, and it is creating an "exceptional" situation, as described by the Executive Committee elected by the PSUC congress, which is affecting the Catalan communists and communists throughout the Spanish State and which is having negative repercussions in Europe.

Perhaps outside Catalonia insufficient emphasis has been placed on the fact--and I believe it would be opportune to rectify this now--that in the voting on Eurocommunism a convergence of votes took place between the so-called "Eurocommunist" and "Leninist" sectors and that they were both defeated by the advocates of abandoning the term "Eurocommunism." In other words, that the sector which now occupies the PSUC Executive Committee defended and voted in favor of the term "Eurocommunism" and was defeated. From the PCE viewpoint, it is difficult to understand why, despite this defeat, the secretary generalship was accepted, but it would be equally mistaken to equate the stances of the sector which now holds the majority within the PSUC Executive Committee with the stances of those who wish to eliminate the term "Eurocommunism" and all that it implies at any price, namely the "pro-Soviet" stances. The future will tell how far the PSUC's present secretary general and Executive Committee will manage to surmount the ambiguity inherent in accepting the leadership of a party that has eliminated Eurocommunism from its definition and that has as its chairman one of the people who championed this elimination. Meanwhile, I believe that the intelligent attitude for the PCE to adopt would be to help this ambiguity to be resolved in a direction favorable to the reestablishment of Eurocommunism.

But, parallel to what is happening within the PSUC, we in the PCE are faced with a congress process, and to prevent what has happened within the PSUC from happening to us it is necessary to learn its lessons now and to analyze to what extent the criticisms being made of the PSUC must also become self-criticisms of our own work.

I believe that in both PSUC and the PCE there are a number of battles that have either not been fought or have been badly fought, and this is all the more serious at a time of economic crisis, of increased tension between the blocs on the world plane and of lack of clear options on the left.

One of these battles is that of the PCE's foreign policy stances and of our concept of socialism within freedom, of pluralist socialism, with its critical content with respect to the countries of so-called "real socialism.'

Nonaligned Policy

In other words, it is necessary to debate and to define the revolutionary character of the policy of "nonalignment" in either of the blocs--a policy whose only aims are mankind's survival and socialist building not only in Europe but also in the Third World. At the same time, there must be a more thorough study of the problems and contradictions being experienced by the countries of "real socialism," this being the only way to understand the world we live in from a Marxist viewpoint. The failure of the working class to participate in those countries' social and political life, the nature of a state which prevents such participation and the causes of the armed confrontations between socialist countries (China and the Soviet Union, China and Vietnam, Vietnam and Kampuchea) are fundamental topics without an understanding of which it is impossible to understand the reasons why the PCE condemns, for instance, the Soviet Union's intervention in Afghanistan or Czechoslovakia or defends the thesis of the Poles' sovereignty in resolving their own problems, and without an understanding of all this it is impossible to fully realize the importance to Eurocommunism of independence for all socialist states.

For instance, the PSUC's official theses had very little to say about the real problems of "real socialism." This kind of socialism, excluding the Chinese version, was portrayed in these theses as an almost perfect model containing certain defects or errors--mainly the lack of freedom--which, however, were presented as being easily surmountable. Obviously with such a degree of superficiality and without a thorough debate, with the inadequate involvement in the debate of the PSUC leadership itself and with an organization secretariat controlled by people opposed even to such a timid criticism of the socialist countries--all this amid the difficult objective conditions of our country's domestic and international situation--the foreseeable result could not have been very different from the actual outcome.

And I do not believe that debates on these topics are impossible or counterproductive owing to the "backwardness of the social and cultral base" of the party, to the fact that "workers do not read" or to other arguments often brandished within the PCE, because as long as some people believe these arguments, the pamphlets of the Ponomarevs or the Brezhnevs will circulate among the party's ranks without being opposed by a responsible and consistent policy of PCE publications on these and other topics. People are even being recommended not to read NUESTRA BANDERA--and not just because of its shortcomings, which in any case are only a reflection of the absence of a consistent policy on information and publications, to which I referred.

I believe that this debate, this discussion, profoundly effects and is capable of being fully assimilated by the Spanish workers and that it must constitute one of the inalienable foundations of the proper training of PCE members. This debate must be approached in the conviction that the anticapitalist and anti-imperialist struggle demands a degree of Marxist elucidation which has no reason to be abstract or intellectualist, because any well-formulated theory imparts an enormous impetus to specific practice. An investigation of this issue in turn demands a clear understanding that the term "working class" today implies freedom, democracy and participation. In the closing decades of the 20th century the working class has a profound desire for freedom and democracy, contrary to what is envisaged by concepts rooted in the Stalinist past, for which these terms are conflicting.

Revolution of the Majority

Together with this set of issues, which I can only set out briefly here, it is necessary to tackle the issues of the "revolution of the majority" and of the democratic and pluralist path toward socialism. This path is very frequently confused with the PCE's political practice over the last 3 years and, insofar as this practice has been excessively institutionalist, it cannot be understood how it is possible to secure the consensus of the majority of society in favor of socialism through it. It is therefore necessary not only to explain but above all to practice that "revolution of the majority," as an ideological struggle waged at all levels of society--in parliament and in municipal councils, of course, but also at workplaces, in residents' and parent-teacher associations and throughout the social fabric. The issue of mobilizations can only be understood from this viewpoint. It is not a matter of the party leadership or other higher bodies calling for more or fewer mobilizations. It is a matter of the communists' giving impetus to the entire debate and social protest against the rightwing policy and against capitalist interests and of this protest's articulation in a host of different forms of mobilization, emanating from the grassroots.

In short, it is a matter of recovering the Gramscian conception of struggling for hegemony; for a hegemony which today must have a pluralist dimension which it obviously could not have in the years through which Gramsci lived--pluralist from the political viewpoint of unity with the socialists and of a joint advance toward socialism, and pluralist from the social viewpoint, assimilating the fact that the political parties do not account for all the forms of political and social action of the men and women in our society, and that feminism, the ecological movement, the citizens' movements and the hosts of new forms of participation embody fundamental aspects, from new viewpoints, of today's struggle for socialism.

But all the aforementioned requires a party which is alive, thinking and participating at all levels in the formulation and implementation of a revolutionary line and strategy, a party whose support and enthusiasm for that line and that strategy will be the outcome of its collective thinking and practice. This presupposes transformations from the party's very basis--from the associations. They are associations whose life is now languishing and in which it has not been established that their fundamental task is a task oriented toward society, through the work which each and every one of their members carries out in it. It is only this practice which lays the foundations for formulating the party's policy and, as such, must be debated and analyzed. The present-day associations scarcely make it possible--I maintain--to establish a Eurocommunist party. It is said that the professionals and intellectuals have left these associations. But it also seems that the workers have left, except in the instances in which the factory association exists and lives. But many of the latter have not simply gone home, as is the case among many professionals, but to the Workers Commissions, in which the problems which are not debated in the PCE itself are examined and debated, with the resulting distortion of the Workers Commissions and of the party itself which have recently become clear, sometimes causing interference, without considering the source of the problems and helping to muddle and confuse all plans.

The "going home" of many professionals and of a large part of the PCE's Eurocommunist cadres has frequently been resolved with excessive ease by attacking the "intellectuals," "speechifiers," and so forth in a pejorative manner. As if the party's working class nature were incompatible with the presence of the best professionals in its ranks; as if this fact which once so strongly characterized the PCE no longer began to reflect the working class' hegemony over society as a whole; as if the analyses which led to the formulation of the "alliance of the forces of labor and culture" had now been abandoned.

Being described as an "intellectual" or "professional" has recently often become synonymous in the party with rightism, opportunism or backing down.

This was never the case for those of us--workers, students or professionals--who created the party which operated inside the country between 1968 and 1977; a party which, despite the clandestinity and the closed system of the cells, was a living and acting party, full of debates and of very tough confrontations with reality, in which each member felt an active participant in the formulation and implementation of a policy with which he identified; a party which, however, has today lost its central nervous and vital system.

Struggle For Socialism

For this reason, it is necessary to thoroughly reorganize the functioning of the associations and, with it, that of the committees and leadership bodies. Achieving synthesis is more difficult today than in other periods, because the problems are more complex and we communists are not always in agreement with them. But synthesis requires taking all opinions into account, and not just those which coincide in advance with the same old stance, and proceeding with all of them to formulate a political line capable of affecting reality.

In conclusion: I believe that it is necessary to create the Communist Party necessary for the struggle for socialism in the perspective of the year 2000. A deeply democratic party with a democracy which will make possible thorough debate of all the issues affecting us, in the conviction that it is democracy which makes arugmentation possible and that Eurocommunism can only be based on it and on the party members' Marxist reasoning.

Because to seek to base Eurocommunism, instead of on argumentation, on blind acceptance of what the leadership says, loyalty to that leadership, the leaders' charisma and the strength of the apparatus, would be the worst service which we could render that cause. Because as far as uncritical loyalty, obedience and support are concerned, those who want a party dependent on other countries will always have the advantage over us, and, as the instance of the PCF Demonstrates, it is in that direction that they will end by outstripping us.

The revolutions of the past, Marx said, oppress the minds of the living like a nightmare. Let it not be so for us. Let us free ourselves from what they have today of nightmare to recover what they had at their time and still have today of real dream and feasible utopia.

CARRILLO DENIES CLAIMS OF INTELLECTUALS' ALIENATION

LD252202 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 25 Jan 81

[Text] Santiago Carrillo today delivered the closing speech at the first assembly of professionals, artists and intellectuals organized by the Spanish Communist Party. In his speech, the secretary general said, among other things, that during the political transition the party had not displayed an agile approach and had therefore lost some precious time. Carrillo added that it is not true that the intellectuals have remained on the fringe of the party's activities, and said that this division between intellectual and manual work must be eliminated.

As well as its discussions on cultural and intellecutal matters, this first assembly was witness to harsh criticism aimed at Spanish Communist Party leaders. These criticisms did not go so far as to abandon Eurocommunist terminology but stressed demands for greater internal democracy and for greater attention to be given to the concerns of professional people within the party since these represent a sector of mmbership which has declined markedly in the last 3 years.

CABINET RENEWS DECISION ON SELLING FOOD TO USSR

LD270947 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 17 Jan 81 p 10

[Text] On Thurdsday [15 January] the cabinet renewed its decision in principle on the export of agriculture products, which takes place within the framework of border trade between Finland and the Soviet Union. According to the decision Finland can export butter, cheese and processed meat products.

The National Board for Foreign Trade Licenses will check that the value of exports corresponds to the value of imports through border trade. The Trade and Industry Ministry together with the Foreign Trade License Board will in turn check that the export of meat products is evenly distributed among the various suppliers. Thursday's decision concerns this year's exports and is the same as last year's decision. The cabinet also empowered the Agriculture Marketing Board to reach decisions on the export of beef to a maximum of 1,000 tons for the current year.

MINISTER HAS FIRST 'BRIEFING' ON EEC POLICIES

LD270913 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 19 Jan 81 p 8

[Text] Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund returned to Oslo late on Sunday [18 January] evening from his informal discussions with EEC Council of Ministers chairman, Netherlands Foreign Minister Christoph van der Klaauw, in The Hague on Saturday and Sunday. The meeting marked the beginning of the expanded foreign policy contacts between Norway and the EEC which came about after Prime Minister Odvar Nordli's visit to Brussels in September, and which mean that Norway will be given first-hand briefings on currents in the EEC nations' increasingly integrated foreign policy. After the talks Frydenlund said that trade cooperation between Norway and the EEG nations is now going well. As well as discussing economic policy and energy questions at the meeting, the two foreign ministers also exchanged views on the international situation, but Frydenlund did not go into detail about what had been said.

LABOR PARTY'S FOREIGN, SECURITY POLICY DISCUSSED

LD271657 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 23 Jan 81 p 6

[Paal Nordenborg report: "NATO and Detente"]

[Excerpt] The general agreement surrounding the foreign policy sections in the Labor Party's new draft manifesto set its stamp on the 1-day foreign policy conference which the party arranged in the Samfunnssal yesterday.

The disagreement which was evident concerned how much importance should be attached to European arrangements in the context of the efforts to set up a Nordic nuclear-free zone.

Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund said the past objections to the Kekkonen Plan were still valid. But on the other hand he said that the call to include the Kola Peninsula's strategic arms in a nuclear-free zone would lead to deadlock.

It looks as if the main outlines of the Labor Party's security policy would be those sketched by Knut Frydenlund in his address yesterday--the party attaches greater importance than in the past to detente, arms control and disarmament, while the connection with the Western alliance remains unshaken.

Two main objectives are weighed up against each other--security and detente. This means good defenses in Norway on the one hand-- as the draft manifesto states, "Our security policy must also include strong conventional defenses"--and membership of NATO.

Detente will be preserved by not acting in a provocative manner toward neighboring countries or increasing tension in this part of the world. As Frydenlund said: "Our base and nuclear policies are not industrial accidents [arbeidsulykker] which we will gradually attempt to put right. They are an essential part of our defense policy."

He pointed out that the manifesto also includes a new formulation on a ban on chemical weapons--on their production, storage and use-- and that this ban is a joint objective for both the party and the trade union movement.

PARTY LEADER SEES REAGAN FAVORING TURKEY

NC280926 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 28 Jan 81 p 1

[Text] [Leader of the Center Union Party] Tasos Papadhopoulos foresees that, with Reagan in the Presidency, the prospects for Cyprus will be even worse.

Answering a relevant question, Papadhopoulos said that, if we consider Reagan's strong policy on East-West relations and that Turkey happens to be a good ally within NATO, then the possibilities for a Cyrpus solution that would not satisfy Turkey's interests become less.

GOVERNMENT DENIES U.S. SEEKS RADIOS IN NORTH

[Text] No question was raised about the reopening of the U.S. radio stations in the occupied areas during the contacts held between the Foreign Ministry and the American Embassy in Nicosia over the arrival of two U.S. officials in the occupied areas through the illegal Tymbou airport.

The government has been given assurances that the visit of the two Americans did not concern any possible intention for actions that would aim at providing maintenance for the equipment of the U.S. radio stations.

With regard to yesterday's press reports that the Americans have dispatched to Cyprus spare parts and equipment for the radio stations, an authoritative source has said that the government does not have such information.

PARTY LEADER OPPOSES VAROSHA, AIRPORT ISSUES LINK

[Text] The leader of the Union of the Centre, Mr Tasos Papadhopoulos, yesterday reiterated his view that it would be a mistake to link Varosha with the Nicosia airport issue. "It would lead to the burial of the Varosha issue and would make the intercommunal talks meaningless at worst or would predetermine a confederal and partitionist solution at best", he said.

Mr Papadhopoulos, who met the press yesterday, said the proposal of the operation of the Nicosia airport under UN control would introduce the "trichotomy" of Cyprus. He explained that the two sides had committed themselves to present concrete proposals on territory and constitution and the linking of Varosha with Nicosia airport provides excuses and an alibi for the Turks.

Besides, he said, the operation of the airport is linked with vital functions of the state like customs, passports and so forth, and decisions in this respect would create a precedent that would allow the Turks to demand similar concessions in other organisations like the Cyprus Telecommunications Authority, Ports Authority, electricity etc. Mr Papadhopoulos urged the prompt "delinkage" of the Varosha issue from that of the Nicosia airport.

In answer to questions, Mr Papadhopoulos said there were other exchanges which the Greek Cypriot side might think of in return for the freeing of Varosha. Mr Papadhopoulos blamed the government for keeping the party leaders and the people in the dark about its intentions.

He also said that there have been no consultations about the widening of the National Council, the advisory body on which the party leaders are represented.

GOVERNMENT REPORTS OPENING OF U.S. BASES TALKS

Joint Communique

NC271506 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1200 GMT 27 Jan 81

[Text] The U.S.-Greek talks on the defense agreement--within which the settlement of the question of U.S. bases in Greece has also been included--began at the Foreign Ministry at 1030 this morning. Secretary general of the Foreign Ministry Ambassador Roussos and other officials are taking part in the talks on the Greek side, and senior military personnel from the Pentagon, headed by the U.S. ambassador in Athens, Mr McCloskey, on the U.S. side.

A joint U.S.-Greek communique issued today states:

Negotiations for the conclusion of an agreement for defense and economic cooperation between the Government of the Republic of Greece and the Government of the United States began officially today. The opening meeting, which was characterized by a warm and cordial atmosphere, included a general exchange of views and the establishment of procedures and schedule for the negotiating meetings. Both sides noted that it is a matter of talks between countries that have been friends and allies for a long time, and expressed their conviction that the negotiations, though complicated, could be accomplished within a reasonable period on the basis of mutual interest. The Greek side was headed by Ambassador russos and the United States side by Ambassador McCloskey.

At 1330, Deputy Foreign Minister Rendis gave a luncheon in honor of the members of the two delegations.

TA NEA Assessment

NC271845 Athens TA NEA in Greek 27 Jan 81 p 1

[Text] The U.S.-Greek talks on the bases began at the Foreign Ministry at 1100 this morning and it is envisaged that an agreement will be reached by the middle of the week. Specifically, informed sources, asked by TA NEA last night, made the assessment that the U.S. side will not put forward any new grievances, that discussions will proceed relatively uninterrupted and that an agreement will be achieved within "a matter of days."

According to information from good sources, the discussions began in an optimistic climate. The Greek side believes that the Americans will not express any objections to the substantive control of the bases by Greek commanders. On this point, in the final agreement in particular, an authoritative source categorically declared yesterday that the Greek side is and will remain firm.

On this point in the discussion on the bases that is so crucial to the Greek side, reports from various sources were saying yesterday that it must be clearly stated in the texts of the agreements that:

The Greek commander will have unlimited right of control and that there will be no restrictions on him in the operation of the base.

The Greek counterproposals and the geographic appendices, which are already known to the U.S. side, will be examined thoroughly at the talks that have begun. The working out of the various component parts of the agreement will be done by separate working groups which will be set up today by Greek and U.S. diplomats and military experts. It is estimated--unless something unexpected happens--that the working groups will complete the draft of each component part in about 5 days.

At the beginning of next week, the two delegations will be in a positon to proceed to high-level overall discussions and reach the formulation of the agreement's text and the letters with which the United States will be obligated:

To preserve the balance of power in the area and to dynamically safeguard it against any attempt to upset it.

This and the boundaries of operational control of the Larissa headquarters now being established--which is linked with the bases--also appear to be crucial points to be discussed by the Greek side. Despite the apparent problems, no concern is being expressed.

According to diplomatic observers' assessments, this optimism is based on the assumption that "the political will of both sides to achieve an agreement is a fact."

As TA NEA has reported, the Greek Ambassador to Washington Tzounis is coming to Athens this week to participate in the discussions on the bases that have already begun. As is known, the discussions concern the bases of Soudha, Irakleion, Ellinikon and Neas Makris. There are also four NATO communication stations operating on Greek territory, specifically in northern Greece.

TO VIMA Comments

NC271615 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 27 Jan 81 p 1

[Comment: "The Protocols"]

[Text] The demand of the Greek side in the talks with the Americans on the bases to be informed, prior to any final settlement, about the contents of the "technical arrangements" that accompany the U.S.-Turkish defense agreement is self-evident.

The main concern of the Greek side must naturally be the preservation of the military balance in the Aegean. An assessment, however, of whether the balance is maintained or possibily disturbed at the expense of our country, obviously presupposes full knowledge of the U.S.-Turkish protocols.

We do not doubt that the Greek diplomats and soldiers talking to the Americans have made it clear to the other side that the demand for "prior know ledge" is irreversible. Much more so since the unwillingness of the Americans to respond so far to the Greek demand justifies additional concern.

The question is neither procedural nor incidental; it is the whole essence. If the American interlocutors don't realize this they are the only ones.

ELEVTHEROTIPIA Report

NC271809 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 27 Jan 81 pp 1, 13

[Reportage by Sp. Karatzaferis]

[Text] U.S.-Greek talks about the bases begin today at the level of experts and the reports that we have from reliable diplomatic and military sources state that: We are asking for crumbs while the Americans are refusing to give us even these, blackmailing us with military aid in order to retain the absolute control they now exercise over the American bases in this country.

At the same time they are pressuring us, through NATO, to agree to the Turkish claims on the Aegean airspace that would be tantamount to partition "for the good of the alliance."

The American demands on the bases and our other national issues have displeased our military leadership, which insists on its original stand regarding firm Greek positions without overlooking the fact that the threat by the Americans to upset the 7 to 10 balance with Turkey would create problems for the defense of the country.

Now everyone recognizes that our haste to be reintegrated into NATO without conditions, and with our problems with Turkey unsolved, had been "the gravest mistake," just like the Mitsotakis line which had linked the question of the American bases to our reintegration.

On the question of the bases, reports from diplomatic and military sources mention more specifically that:

1. At today's talks, the Greek military experts will ask that we should at least be able to check who leaves the American bases and what weapons are transported through them, abandoning, of course, our demands formulated in the counterplan (effective Greek command, and so forth).

This very least that the Greek military will ask for today has been refused by the Americans through diplomatic channels (McCloskey: "I don't think something like this will be accepted") and the only things they agree to are:

A. To have it written outside the bases that they are "Greek,"
B. A Greek flag at the entrance,
C. A Greek commander as a figurehead but for effective command to be exercised by an American.

On the question of NATO and the Greek-Turkish differences, the reports mention that: At the two meetings of Greek and NATO experts (one a short time ago in Naples and one last week in Athens) there was not a single point of contact because:

1. We are insisting on the status that has prevailed so far as regards the Aegean airspace. That is; the Greek commander of the Larisa headquarters, which is to be set up, should have operational control under his command.
2. The Turks, insisting on their unreasonable claims, are asking that they should be the ones to have control from the Limnos altitude; that is, from the line established by NOTAM 714.
3. In the discussions they have had with the Greeks, the NATO officers supported the Turkish position with the rational: "What do you mean Greeks and Turks? We are all in NATO...."
4. NATO is insisting that we should set up the Larisa headquarters immediately, but we are delaying this because it is a trap. If we put the Larisa headquarters into operation without the Greek-Turkish differences being settled we would be accepting "de facto" the Turkish demands.

Thus, although the headquarters is ready on paper (it will be housed in the headquarters of the 28th Tactical Airforce Wing--ATAD) and its commander will be whoever is in charge of the ATAD, we are refusing to make it operational under various pretexts (officer evaluations in March, and so forth) and so retain operational control over the Aegean under national control.

Because our military are adamant in their position regarding issues related to Greek-Turkish differences and it does not appear that, despite the Greek foreign minister's optimistic view, the agreement will have been signed by March, the agreement on the bases will go ahead without turmoil. The commander in chief of NATO, the American General Rogers, a personal friend of the new U.S. secretary of state, Mr Haig, and his successor to the post of NATO commander in chief, will be coming on the 9th of next month to Athens, ostensibly on a courtesy visit. In the assessment of Greek experts, General Rogers is coming to exert more pressure on the Greek government to agree to the unacceptable American and NATO proposals, regarding both the bases and Greek-Turkish issues.

PRESS REACTIONS TO NEW U.S. ADMINISTRATION

NC261145 [Editorial report] The Istanbul Turkish press has carried the following comments on President Reagan's new administration following his inauguration. On 20 January, MILLIYET on Page 1 carried an unattributed editorial: "Reagan on Duty." The writer says among other things: "His personality and attitude during the election campaign show that Reagan appears to be a politician who both believes in the greatness of the United States and plans to pursue a diplomacy based on military strength. If this should also form the basis for his policy, we can conclude that detente, of which we have talked so much in the past 10 years, is doomed.

"However, periods of tension between blocs create more problems for the rival superpowers' allies than for them. At such periods, the alliance leaders demand discipline from their allies and efforts are made to hold alliance interests above national interests. Strategies are drawn up by the alliance and the national forces have only to establish tactical targets. But even if Reagan is in favor of toughness, his intentions will be balanced by strength calculations and world conditions."

On 20 January, HURRIYET on page 3 carried an editorial by Oktay Eksi who, after dwelling on former President Carter's failures and successes as President of the United States, makes the following comment on Ronald Reagan's assumption of office as President: "A totally different type of president is now in office at the White House. The new President does not care about 'moral values' as much as Carter did. Moreover, the new President does not go for peace at any cost, as Carter did. The new President is a pragmatic man. He is trying hard to prove to the entire world that the United States is a strong nation. He must, therefore, be expected to base his foreign policy more on 'strength' than on 'principles.'

"However, although this approach may be considered 'realistic' because it is based on the concept of 'strength' which is still extensively valid in international relations, yet it is equally dangerous."

The writer then concludes: "When we look at the event from Turkey's angle, it is possible to point out a few positive aspects. There is every reason to think that President Reagan will pursue a policy which favors 'strengthening Turkey militarily.' It must, however, be brought home to President Reagan that it will not be fair to give Turkey new assignments."

On 20 January, TERCUMAN on pages 1 and 12 carried a commentary by Nazli Ilicak who, after saying that "the helplessness of the Carter administration has led to the rebirth of a conservative mood in American society," says: "Reagan contends that detente can be possible only if the United States remains powerful. He also argues that the SALT agreements serve no other purpose than forcing the United States to make concessions. The appointment of the former NATO commander as secretary of state is the natural outcome of Reagan's view of the international situation and the way he evaluates East-West relations. Haig, who is one of the most prominent U.S. generals is a strong personality who expresses his views openly without resorting to evasive language. His appointment is an important deterrent which will force the Kremlin to pursue a policy of moderation. Haig did not wait for Afghanistan to be occupied to maintain that detente is deceptive. He had expressed this view immediately after Fidel Castro intervened in Angola."

The commentator then concludes: "A powerful America will assure the survival of the West. It is extremely important for the security of the Free World that an important office such as the secretary of state should be entrusted to a confident general who does not mince his words."

On 20 January, CUMHURIYET on pages 1 and 7 carried an unattributed article: "Toward a New Era," in which the writer says President Reagan is facing an arduous task with inflation and record unemployment at home and a new polarization abroad, and adds: "The American people, who watched the hostages and the Afghanistan problems in helplessness and who were disillusioned by economic crises at home, have proved their warm support for the 'powerful America' slogan by voting Reagan into office."

After saying that time will show whether or not the Reagan administration will be able to cope with inflation at a time when defense expenditures will be extensively increased, te writer adds: "However, it is apparent from the speeches of competent officials of the Reagan administration that one of the obvious characteristics of the newly emerging period in foreign policy is a tendency to get 'tougher'. Apart from the fact that the armament race will be accelerated during the Reagan era, the United States may be expected to adopt a more interventionist policy toward the Third World countries."

On 21 January, TERCUMAN on page 4 carried an article by Fahir Armaoglu. "Reagan's Foreign Policy." After saying that we must expect certain serious changes in U.S. foreign policy, Armaoglu expresses the opinion that the following points can be deduced from the statements made recently by General Haig before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee: "The new U.S. foreign policy will be consistent, reliable, balanced and predictable. This means that U.S. policy will take a definite form and that it will not allow room for ambiguities. It will not be hesitant in the face of developments as the Carter administration was; it will have a resolute character. Consistent with the above characteristics, a 'toughening' is expected in U.S. foreign policy. This 'toughening' should rather be interpreted as 'resoluteness.'"

Armaoglu further contends: "The new U.S. foreign policy envisages a close cooperation with its allies. However, the nature and scope of this cooperation will be determined by the extent of the allies' preparedness to share the principles of this new foreign policy. Finally, we can say that this new policy will attach more weight and importance to Turkey. Haig is a soldier who has long been aware of the importance of Turkey. The two negative votes which were given to General Haig at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee were cast by Sarbenas and Congas, both senators of Greek origin. This is significant. We must also point out that the importance given by the United States to the Persian Gulf may lead to developments that would closely concern Turkey. Naturally, everything will become clearer in application."

On 22 January, CUMHURIYET on page 3 carried a commentary by Ali Sirmen who says among other things: "Ronald Reagan wishes to revive the 'great American' dream and aims at bringing splendor and enthusiasm into the limelight again." The writer adds: "But Reagan's 'great America' policy coincides with a period when world detente is losing ground. The hawks of the Pentagon and the real politician, Kissinger, are marching hand in hand. There are indications that make the arms dealers dance with joy. The CIA on the other hand has announced that it will reembark on its 'mission impossible' type operations in foreign countries. All this clearly shows that the passion for splendor will continue to cause yet more tensions in the world.

The writer concludes: "The new Reagan era will be one of passion for splendor, show and grandeur. But how will this policy be received by the world and how will it resolve problems at home? At this moment, Reagan is at the peak of his passion. This reminds us of the saying: 'All passions have a sweet beginning'."

DELEGATE PROMISES EARLY RETURN TO DEMOCRACY

TA271737 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Jan 81

[Text] The Council of Europe Political Commission is continuing to work on the report about Turkey prepared by Austrian parliamentarian Ludwig Steiner.

According to a report by Turkish Radio and Television Strasbourg correspondent Nadir Saygili, the Turkish member of the Political Commission, Metin Toker, addressed the Commission this morning. In his speech, Toker said that both the Turkish people and the military administration are determined to make a transition to a normal democratic order in a short time. Referring to the initial report adopted by the Council of Europe in September, Toker noted that a great development and amelioration has been observed in Turkey's situation since that report. Toker pointed out that Head of State Gen Kenan Evren's announcement concerning the constituent assembly constitutes a proof of this. He stated that there is total consensus among the Turkish people regarding the necessity of military intervention and the relief created by the intervention. Addressing the Political Commission members, Toker said the Turkish people have no doubts about a return to a democratic order.

VOTCP REJECTS CALL FOR LEADERS TO RETURN, SURRENDER

[Untitled station commentary]

[Text] In a communique issued on 26 January, the General Staff Martial Law Military Services Coordination Office has asked Turkish Labor Party [TLP] leader Behice Boran and Turkish Teachers' Unity and Solidarity Association [TOB-DER] leader Gultekin Gazioglu who are residing abroad, to return to Turkey and to surrender to Turkish security forces. It adds that they will be deprived of their Turkish citizenship unless they do so.

Dear listeners, since the 12 September coup, the junta which seized power has thrown tens of thousands of progressive, patriotic, revolutionary and democratic persons into dungeons under heavy pressures. Thousands of people are being subjected to torture in the dungeons, prisons and police stations. Who would surrender to torturers under the circumstances? Yet the junta is calling on TLP leader Boran and TOB-DER leader Gazioglu to surrender, and it is threatening them with depriving them of their Turkish citizenship in the event they do not comply with this request.

The junta and its government have no right to issue such a call at a time when no security of life exists in dungeons and prisons and when so many patriots--including the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions leader Abdullah Basturk--are imprisoned and tortured. What about a call to Mehmet Ali Agca [killer of MILLIYET daily editor Ipekci] to return to the country and surrender?

What about calls to other hundreds of fascist murderers? The fact that the fascist Aydin governor who issued the necessary passport to Agca is still kept in his post and that fascist NAP officials are released while the call is issued to Boran and Gazioglu to surrender prove again the antidemocratic stand of the junta.

The unity of action of all democratic forces in a bid to recover the democratic rights and liberties from the junta has become imperative. This is the only force that can restore democracy and resist the junta.

VOTCP DISCUSSES THIRD ISLAMIC SUMMIT AGENDA

TA271100 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 27 Jan 81

[Station commentary: "The Islamic Conference"]

[Text] The third summit of the Islamic Conference is being held in At-Ta'if. There are 37 countries--including Turkey--participating in this conference. The conference convened at a time when the situation is tense: U.S. imperialism supported by Israeli Zionism is continuously threatening peace in the Middle East, inciting differences existing among Arab countries, and increasing its military presence in this area in a bid to seize its rich oil resources.

U.S. imperialism is hatching new plans in the Middle East in order to establish new miltiary bases and create new military pacts. Recent visits by the Pakistani dictator, Ziaul Haq, to Turkey, Jordan, Qatar, Bahrain and Oman were closely connected with these plans of the Pentagon generals. Instead of discussing bilateral problems, the Pakistani dictator examined the possibilities for the creation of a new military pact planned by the United States.

As PRAVDA pointed out in its 20 January issue, the United States is willing to include Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Egypt in the new military pact it wants to create in the region, and to drag Turkey into it as well. Washington has intensified its pressure on Turkey to this end.

The agenda of the Islamic Conference, which is meeting in this climate, is very loaded. The agenda, which is composed of 21 articles, includes such important subjects as putting an end to the war between Iran and Iraq, seeking a solution to the Palestinian problem and reviewing the economic situation in Islamic countries. A constructive approach to such problems which are closely connected with regional peace and security will be greeted with approval not only by the people of the Islamic countries but by all the progressive and peace-loving peoples of the world at large.

However, along with these issues a so-called Afghanistan issue has been included in the agenda of the meeting in accordance with the request of certain reactionary Arab countries under imperialist pressures. In a statement sent to Islamic countries participating in the summit, the Afghan Government has asked for the subject of Afghanistan to be dropped from the agenda. This request is an appropriate one, because the Afghanistan issue is only being created by imperialism. In a bid to impede the Afghan revolution--which reached a new stage--the imperialists and the Chinese hegemonists are arming the counterrevolutionary groups based in Pakistan to provoke the Afghan people and to engage in armed clashes against them. All this is an effort to bring that country back into the imperialist camp.

Dear listeners: The aim of including Afghanistan in the agenda of the Islamic summit is obvious. The United States is trying through reactionary Arab countries to fan anti-Sovietism and to cover its adventurist and expansionist plans in the Middle East.

It is not the first time that world public opinion has witnessed such imperialist tactics. In effect, these same circles provocatively created a Polish issue during the NATO meetings held last year in a bid to cover up their plans for the heavy rearmament of their NATO allies, as well as for the redeployment of nuclear missiles in Western Europe. Resolutions were reached which would mean grossly interfering in the internal affairs of that country--a socialist state and a member of the Warsaw Pact.

Now, dear listeners, the same tactic is being used in the Islamic summit. As already pointed out, the aim is to create an artificial Afghanistan issue and to divert world public attention from developments in the Middle East, from the real issues which are awaiting a solution and from the adventurist U.S. initiatives.

In a statement, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, who is participating in the Islamic Conference, said Afghanistan was among the subjects to be discussed. Does this statement mean sharing in the policies of tension created by imperialism in this region? Such a stand would not be compatible with the principles of independence and friendship with neighboring countries. On the contrary, such a stand would transform Turkey into a tool of the adventurist policies being pursued by imperialism in the Middle East and would serve at intensifying tension in the region.

COLUMNIST CRITICIZES OZAL'S ECONOMIC MEASURES

NC280843 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 25 Jan 81 p 3

["The World Today" column by Ali Sirmen: "24-25 January and the IMF"]

[Excerpts] The first year of the implementation of the 24-25 January economic and financial measures which bear Turgut Ozal's mark is over. Before we attempt to examine the results of these implementations as well as foreign reactions, which concern us so deeply, we deem it useful to emphasize a point: It would be utterly wrong to identify the administration which has been in power in Turkey since 12 September with the 24-25 January decisions. The 12 January administration which has been in power only a short part of a year of implementation, is one thing and the 24 January decisions another.

We find it impossible to say that Ozal's measures have been successful in the past year. These decisions have brought no solution to the structural disarray which exists in the foundation of Turkey's economy.

There are, of course, people at home, like Turgut Ozal, who do not share this view. But events have shown that foreign circles from which Turkey expects to secure credits also entertain views very close to ours. So much so that, faced with the negative attitude of these circles, Honorable Ozal has had to limit his requests for credits from foreign banks.

The call which the IMF has made to foreign banks are two-sided: One side concerns the deferment of Turkey's debts and the other concerns the granting to Turkey of adequate fresh credits.

It is natural for the IMF to urge foreign banks to grant Turkey adequate fresh credits, because the 24-25 January measures are nothing other than the overfulfillment of the conditions envisaged in the IMF's suggestions. Foreign sources say that the amount of aid to be extended to Turkey within the OECD framework and by the foreign bank circles will be less this year than that of last year.

At this juncture, the matter ceases to concern only Turkey or Ozal; it directly concerns the IMF itself, because if hitches crop up in practice, the matter will affect not only Ozal's prestige, but it will damage the credibility of IMF as well.

That is why the IMF is making intensive efforts to secure the deferment of Turkey's debts and to obtain adequate fresh credits for it. If the IMF fails to persuade the circles concerned to extend Turkey's credit, Ozal will have unwillingly dealt a heavy blow to this establishment with his 24-25 January economic and financial measures.

OZAL REPORTS ON 1981 ECONOMIC PROSPECTS

NC280842 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 26 Jan 81 p 6

[Excerpts] Ankara (Special)--Expressing his views to MILLIYET on the occasion of the first anniversary of the 24 January economic and financial measures, State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal has stated that Turkey's economic indexes at the beginning of 1981 show better prospects than those at the beginning of the previous year.

Maintaining that Turkey had entered last year with unfavorable economic indexes, with shortages in several areas, and with black market prices, to say nothing of the doubling of petrol prices which had to be met, Ozal added that the Turkish economy had overcome the shock to a great extent and that the prospects during the current year will be much better than those of last year.

In a statement to MILLIYET, Ozal admitted that investments had greatly decreased over the past 3 years, but he maintained that this situation could not be blamed on the 24-25 January decisions.

Ozal said: "However, when the 1980 program was prepared, the 24 January measures were not known, nor was such a program being contemplated. The investment figures for 1980 are not yet known, but my feeling in this connection is that the tendency in 1978 and 1979 to invest less has changed for the better. This situation will manifest itself in 1981."

Responding to our question regarding the continually increasing unemployment, Ozal said: "You are saying that the 24 January decisions have increased unemployment. What do you think would have been the proportion of unemployment had not these decisions been taken? It would have been worse, as the present factories would not have been functioning. There were several idle installations because of lack of raw materials. The 24 January measures have brought structural changes to certain branches of industry. The automotive industry provides the best example for this. Buying a car is now a luxury. The prospective car buyer finds it more profitable to invest his money in the bank.

Some unemployment in some sectors is bound to result from our measures. But the opposite will occur in other sectors, and the increasing unemployment will be absorbed by these sectors.

Question: How do you view the economic situation in 1981?

Answer: When we embarked on this business, we said that 1980 and 1981 would be critical years, and we made our calculations accordingly. Last year was a year of 'salvaging goods from the fire.' We said 'any diminuation of loss may be counted as a profit,' and this helped us to obtain fine results. This year is also critical. The results obtained last year must continue. We knew that all the problems of our country could not be resolved in 1 year. If we fare well in 1981, we shall be more comfortable in 1982.

Question: Is it not at all likely that 1981 might be worse than 1980?

Answer: If we do not make serious mistakes in the implementation of the decisions, that is, if we pursue seriously the implementaion of our stability program, 1981 should be better. However, we have to take into account such probable circumstances as new big increases in the price of oil and, God forbid, adverse weather conditions which might affect agricultural production.

CABINET PASSES 1981 ANNUAL ECONOMIC REPORT

LD281412 Hamburg DPA in German 1258 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Text] Bonn, 28 Jan (DPA)--The Federal Cabinet in Bonn today passed the 1981 annual economic report in which the government, in accordance with the stability law, sets out its economic goals and assessment of possible developments.

According to the report, the Federal Government is expecting economic growth at least to stagnate this year. In the event of a poor development, the GNP could even drop by up to 1 percent. Real economic growth in 1980 was almost 2 percent.

The rise in consumer prices, which was 5.5 percent last year, is to be limited in 1981 to approximately 4.5 percent. Because of the weak economic situation and the growing number of unemployed, an increase of 4.5 - 5 percent averaged over the year is expected in the unemployment rate. This will mean an average number of unemployed of approximately 1.1 - 1.2 million compared with about 900,000 in 1980.

In its forecasts the Federal Government is assuming, among other things, that there will be no shortages of oil supplies and that oil prices will not increase drastically.

CSU CHAIRMAN ADDRESSES BUNDESTAG BUDGET DEBATE

DW281249 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0803 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Speech by Franz Josef Strauss, CSU chairman and minister-president of Bavaria, in the Bundestag budget debate in Bonn--live]

[Excerpts] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen, the finance minister's budget speech contains a number of remarkable, although naturally partial, truths and insights, last but not least the painful farewell to the full employment guarantee of Willy Brandt and Helmut Schmidt. Full employment is a good thing, but much nonsense is caused by making such guarantees at the wrong time. The speech contains the insight that economic programs which only elicit a short-lived enthusiasm are costly and ineffective.

We are somehow better off than most other industrial countries and, naturally, better off than the developing countries--that is correct. But our downhill slide is that much faster.

The German economy in the early 80's is in an outstanding situation, but unfortunately in the negative sense of the word. Last year, in 1980, for the first time in the history of the Federal Republic all of the aims of the economic quadrangle were missed, namely, price stability, high employment, foreign trade balance and a continuous and adequate growth rate. Further deterioration is in the offing in 1981. With an inflation rate of almost 6 percent in January, we are far from price stability. A big increase in unemployment with a simultaneous demand for manpower is anything but a high employment rate. The total economic growth in 1980 amounted to 1.8 percent. It was neither adequate nor continuous. The growth rate took place in the first part of 1980 and was reduced practically to zero in the second half of the year. In other words, no growth rate.

The new annual economic report, adopted yesterday by the economic cabinet, is the first annual economic report with the dreaded words, minus growth, that is, a predicted decrease. It cannot be ruled out that the currently predicted minus 0.5 to 1 percent--percentage figures have changed greatly since 5 October [laughter, applause]--that this prognosis will turn out to be much too optimistic.

Only one possibility exists for stopping this fatal development: Through a smooth and energetically promoted construction program for alternate energies, particularly nuclear power. In this way, our dependence on oil-producing countries has to be decreased so much that they will not be able to dictate prices and quantities to us and that they will have to deal with us as partners in a state of mutual dependence. [applause]

The international confidence in the Deutsche mark must be reestablished. That means providing signs and creating facts to convince the world that the Federal Republic of Germany has a greater capacity for bringing its crises under control than other comparable industrial states. That is the only way to reestablish the international confidence in our currency despite the geographic and politically endangered position which brought about considerable capital transfer to the West.

Regarding a decisive breakthrough to an independent oil policy, which under current technical conditions means development of nuclear energy--unfortunately, that is logical for us--the Federal Government has goofed in the past 4 years, or else it has been hiding. For almost 4 years, no new nuclear powerplant has been licensed in the Federal Republic. However, in the meantime, the French have promoted the development of nuclear energy with all their strength. By 1990, they want to reduce their dependence on oil to the low level of 28 percent. A large number of nuclear powerplants are being planned and quickly built.

The Federal Republic of Germany is not facing economic problems but rather structural problems, and not only in marginal areas. These are structural problems affecting our entire economy. Their solution calls for a pact of reason--I do not say it ironically or cynically--between the politicians, the businessmen and their organizations as well as the employees and their organizations. Full employment in East Asia is none of our business, although we would like to see it there. It is our task to see to a high employment rate in the Federal Republic. [applause] This means lowering costs or restraining cost increases. High manpower costs have contributed considerably to this situation. [applause]

Allow me to say a concluding word concerning security in the Federal Republic of Germany and, above all, for the Federal Republic of Germany. With the inauguration of new U.S. President Ronald Reagan, a new phase no doubt has begun in relations between the Federal Republic, Europe and the United States. We are convinced that in Reagan's case politics, idea, word and deed have a discernible interconnection--to the extent this is at all possible--and if possible from an entity. The overwhelming success of the new U.S. President and of the Republicans leaves no doubt that the awareness of the Americans with respect to their tasks up to the end of the century has changed decisively.

Anyone who heard Reagan's speech yesterday during the reception for the hostages and watched it over television will confirm this analysis--which I have already put on paper--beyond any doubt. Relying on this proof of trust, the U.S. President is obviously determined to put an end to the decline in the position of the U.S. world power and to replace the illusory detente policy pursued for much too long in the West with a realistic policy of relaxing tensions. It is in the very own interest of Europe and of the Federal Republic of Germany to stand by the side of the United States with determination and quite unequivocally. [applause]

We should do so out of free conviction and voluntarily, because we ought to be aware of the indissoluble character of this community of destiny. It is impossible to try to sneak out of it through secret plans of pseudoneutralization or long-term neutralization. But we should also do this as a result of the community of political convictions and concepts of values to which we feel committed. We cannot advocate these convictions and concepts of values in the world without the Americans' support and leadership.

We should do so, furthermore, out of our responsibility to peace in the world and the preservation of freedom which would be inconceivable in Europe and elsewhere without the U.S. alliance. This is why we call on you to affirm the alliance of destiny of Germany and Europe with the United States, not only with words but with deeds, instead of either purposely or inadvertently shifting the differences in interests increasingly to the foreground out of regard for the leftists in your party.

There may indeed be differentiations when it comes to interests. This goes without saying. Yet on the whole, the interests of the Atlantic world's destiny are common interests because it represents a community of values and not just a military community. [applause]

But I do not emphasize this only for idealistic reasons. We must not close our eyes to the fact that the energy and raw material resources threatened by the Soviet Union are indeed important to the United States, although replaceable; but for Europe, they are vitally decisive because they are irreplaceable. You cannot destabilize a tribe of nomads. A highly industrialized mass society like our modern democracies, however, can be destabilized solely by crisis in the fields of energy and raw mateial supply to a point where unpredictable political developments and risks may occur. [applause]

For this reason, it is irresponsible and unmasks the true attitude of large segments of the SPD for the newspaper VORWAERTS, dated 15 January 1981, just a few days prior to the inauguration, to write that the profound differences of opinion within the Western alliance after Afghanistan are the consequence of objective differences in interests which most probably will increase in the future. For the newspaper to write that Secretary of State Haig made it clear to the Senate committee that the efforts for detente and arms limitation will no longer be in the center of U.S. foreign policy, but that they will be replaced by global confrontation, amounts to an announcement of a disassociation maneuver. I would have preferred to have read this in PRAVDA than in an organ of a democratic German party. [applause]

The VORWAERTS article goes on to claim that Haig said there are more important things than living in peace. Even if Haig has shaken the European detente politicians out of their dreams it would be the duty of the chancellor--who time and again referred to his friendship with and his esteem for Haig in the past several days--to rectify the matter by saying that Haig did not come out against peace but against the misuse of peace by a pacifistic ideology in West Europe which refuses to recognize the interconnection between balance and safeguarding of peace and which in effect works into the hands of the Soviet Union. [applause]

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG wrote about Haig's remarks that if the preservation of peace were made the only raison d'etre of politics, the goal would be destroyed which we have set for ourselves, namely, peace. And SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG is more of an admirer of the social-liberal coalition. Let me quote one passage verbatim: Haig's sentence caused a sensation. Some people were alarmed; they fail to see that peace at all cost might become a temptation to potential aggressors to use military force with a minimum of risk. The threat alone might be sufficient to achieve an objective otherwise gained by war. That was written by SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG.

Owing to your lax attitude, Mr Chancellor, it is not surprising that the discussion on the dual NATO decision has fully erutped again in the SPD. Colleague Voigt, chairman of the foreign affairs working circle of the SPD, declared that the nonratification of SALT II creates a new situation with respect to the SPD party congress decision on NATO's counterarming. This means that the SPD will review its decision. Whether the Americans ratify SALT II is their affair, theirs alone, and is strictly in their sphere of decision-making. We should refrain from interfering here. Voigt further declared that the discussion on counterarming must be waged by the entire left, also outside parliament. Voigt also discussed this with the Socialist Bureau in Offenbach, a leftist socialist collective movement, as reported by FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE of 19 January. SPD deputy floorleader Mrs Schlei has advocated the view that Voigt's statement concerning SALT II and NATO's dual decision is an opinion not unique to him among the Social Democrats.

Mr Genscher has said that nothing would be more dangerous than if the Soviet Union in this phase were to arrive at erroneous assessments of the firmness of the Western alliance. It was only on Reagan's inauguration day that the chancellor made up his mind to warn against calling the NATO dual decision into question, in view of the discussion of the SPD. He thereby admitted the internal dissension of his party. But it is his task to act on his own judgment and to halt at long last the constant attempts from the SPD ranks to talk into nonexistence and unhinge the NATO decision on counterarmament.

SPD Deputy Wolfgang Roth, also a contemporary of some standing, told the Vienna ARBEITERZEITUNG that the new U.S. administration under Ronald Reagan is acting in accordance with the motto: guns instead of butter. To me, these are terrible words. Is this not an intolerable burden on cooperation with the new U.S. Government? [applause] Some nerve comparing Ronald Reagan or Mr Haig here with Hermann Goering! Guns instead of butter!

The semiofficial SPD PARLIAMENTARISCH-POLITISCHER PRESSE-DIENST offers another example. In its issue of 14 January, it says: There is no getting around it nor evading the hope that the United States will become more predictable under Reagan. The U.S. leadership threatens to change from the unstable and luckless Carter administration with its moral integrity to an unequivocally neoconservative trend in which internally the right of the stronger and externally the glory and the strength of the American nation will become the guiding line. Europe is facing the decision of either joining the new nationalist and sabre-rattling tunes from across the Atlantic--this would inevitably unleash anti-American sentiments and actions such as we know from the terrible days of the Vietnam war, it reads--or continuing through European self-awareness the policy of detente and worldwide dialogue and, in so doing, risking dissension with Washington as well as quarrels in the alliance. This introduction then is followed by vehement criticism against the new U.S. secretary of state. Is this supposed to be cultivation of alliance psychology? Is this the real relationship of the SPD or of large segments of its grassroots and of its official position and mandate holders toward the new U.S. Government? Unfortunately, we cannot but fear that this is so. [applause]

It is here, Mr Chancellor, that you should prove what your crisis management is worth. This is where you should ensure in your party that the bases of the alliance and the consequences emerging from this alliance are not called into question every day and continually brought up for discussion by your party. [applause]

PAPER VIEWS SPD QUARRELS OVER DEFENSE BUDGET

[Eberhard Wisdorff commentary: "Harmful Discussions"]

[Text] Friendly words were exchanged across the Atlantic just before new U.S. President Ronald Reagan was inaugurated. Secretary of State Alexander Haig certified good performance for the European alliance partners and for a moment diverted attention from the unpleasant debate on the exact percentage figures in the military budgets.

Chancellor Helmut Schmidt picked from Haig's remarks those passages which seemed to be best in line with the view of his own government about the continuation of the arms limitation policy and the dialogue with the USSR. He clearly rebuffed those comrades who criticized the dual decision of the Western alliance on counterarming and the West's receptiveness to negotiations.

This was just the other day. Yet there is already another debate on the defense budget going on in the SPD. Chancellor Schmidt and the SPD elite had a hard time rejecting the motion of a strong faction concerning a DM1-billion cut in the defense budget with a simultaneous increase in development aid spending. Coalition partner and Foreign Minister Genscher warned of serious consequences for the alliance.

The discussion is bound to be all the more unpleasant to those who are governing in Bonn since the friendly words accompanying Reagan's inauguration can hardly gloss over a latent conflict potential between the two alliance partners, the United States and the Federal Republic.

The East-West policy position of the Federal Government, as before, remains characterized by an at least gradually greater preparedness for talks vis-a-vis Moscow and by special interests with regard to Germany and trade policy. The new U.S. Government can be expected to use economic relations in times of a cooler East-West climate more than before as an instrument in overall political relations.

The United States is not bringing direct influence to bear on the current discussion on tanks for Saudi Arabia. But many aspects of the debate cause one to view the forthcoming transatlantic debate on division of labor in the Western alliance to relieve the Americans in case of their greater involvement in the Gulf region, which would in the end serve the safeguarding of West European raw material interests.

One could consider as an additional conflict potential in view of foreign trade deficits, high inflation rates and a deteriorating economic situation, the danger of trade restrictions on both sides, something the federal chancellor warned against years ago.

At such a time, debate on the defense budget could only be harmful to transatlantic relations between Bonn and Washington. Regardless of how important increased development aid might seem, friendly words do not help much in such a case.

BANK CONSORTIUM SET TO NEGOTIATE SOVIET LOAN

LD281222 Hamburg DPA in German 0953 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Text] Duesseldorf, 28 Jan (DPA)--Representatives of the Deutsche Bank and the USSR met in Duesseldorf today for talks on a DM10-billion loan for the Soviet Union. The delegations, headed by Deputy Soviet Foreign Trade Minister Viktor Mikhaylovich Ivanov and the Deutsche Bank board spokesman Wilhelm Christians, expect the talks to last 2 or 3 days.

Deutsche Bank said in a statement that a German consortium of banks, headed by the Deutsche Bank, is prepared in principle to finance at market conditions supplies and services for the Yamal natural gas project intended to supply West European countries with Siberian gas. The planned agreement depends on the Federal Government's approval and the corresponding hermes [export credit] guarantee.

It was learned from banking circles that, because of the complicated subject matter, it is deemed unlikely that a final agreement will be reached straight away on the credit terms. The approximately 20 banks involved in the consortium met several times prior to the talks with the Soviet delegation.

The Deutsche Bank further explained that the credit financing is intended to help German exports, especially large pipes, compressors and accessory equipment, and to contribute to securing German energy supplies. One condition is orders for the German export industry and a long-term gas supply agreement to provide the Federal Republic with energy.

LE MONDE DISCUSSES FRENCH-SOVIET CONSULTATIONS

[Daniel Vernet dispatch: "Paris and Moscow Hold Consultations Before Resumption of Madrid CSCE Conference"]

[Text] Moscow--Despite the ups and down in the international situation, French-Soviet cooperation is continuing at its usual pace in the most diverse spheres. On Friday, 23 January, the biennial agreement on cultural relations was signed in Moscow. In addition, Quai d'Orsay Political Affairs Secretary Gabriel Robin had talks with two Soviet deputy foreign ministers on the Madrid conference. Finally, the "small commission" on scientific and technical cooperation is to meet in Paris from 11 to 13 February.

Mr Robin had 2 days of talks with Mr Ilichev, head of the Soviet delegation at the Madrid conference, and he was received by Mr Korniyenko, first deputy minister of foreign affairs and an expert on disarmament questions. These consultations were arranged in principle during the meeting between Mr Francois-Poncet and Mr Gromyko at the United Nations last September.

Although the TASS agency communique does not mention this--the French refused to make any statement--the problems connected with the "followup" to Madrid and in particular with the possible convening of a conference on disarmament in Europe were the main topics discussed.

The Soviets would like the Madrid meeting, whose second phase begins 27 January, to decide to convene such a conference, to draw up its agenda and to fix its location and date. However, the Western countries are reluctant to launch into this enterprise without having secured some guarantees from the Kremlin.

The idea of this conference was put forward by Giscard d'Estaing when he decided that France should be more active in disarmament negotiations. The French plan aims to be strict and binding; it only relates to conventional weapons but covers Europe as a geographical whole from the Atlantic to the Urals. Furthermore, it makes provision for the confidence-boosting measures which might initially be taken to be intrinsically bound to real and significant arms reductions. This plan was initially received with great distrust by the Soviets, who fully understood that it was aimed primarily at them. However, instead of rejecting the idea of a conference on disarmament in Europe, they adopted it, even claiming to have first conceived it but swamping the practical measures intended to achieve effective arms limitation with more vague and general plans.

The things which interests them in this conference, which Poland has proposed should be held in Warsaw from 20 October, is primarily that it should take place to enable them to develop their innumerable initiatives on disarmament. They want it to receive a "broad and flexible" mandate from the Madrid meeting. Thus, all proposals could be examined without precondition or exception. This is, the Soviets say, a "realistic and democratic approach which does not prejudice the results." It does not seem that Mr Robin's talks in Moscow helped bring the viewpoints closer, although they provided an opportunity to clarify the respective stances.

JOSPIN ELECTED SOCIALIST PARTY FIRST SECRETARY

[Text] A congress in the form of a "high Mass"--the PS Congress in Creteil on Saturday, 24 January--was deliberately organized in that spirit since it was not so much a matter of choosing as confirming Francois Mitterrand--who obtained 83.64 percent of his party members' votes--as Socialist candidate in the presidential election.

The Creteil extraordinary congress also adopted the manifesto summarizing the party's main lines, while the executive committee unanimously elected Lionel Jospin as the new first secretary "for as long as the PS wishes," to quote Mitterrand. The solemn nature of this meeting was to be strengthened by a meeting followed by a dance at 1800 Saturday at the exhibition park, Porte de Versailles. Mr Mitterrand was to deliver the first major speech of his campaign.

PCF HOLDS HOPES FOR MITTERRAND'S ELECTION

[By Philippe Thibault]

[Text] Paris, Jan 27 (AFP)--The French Communist Party would hope to enter the government if next April's presidential election was won by Socialist leader Francois Mitterrand. Charles Fiterman, secretary of the Central Committee, said in a television interview here that: "We want the Communist Party to have its due place in a government responsible for carrying out a new policy--just its due place."

The last Communist ministers to serve in a French Government were dismissed by Premier Paul Ramadier in 1947. The Communist Party can count on from 20-25 percent of the national vote, and Mr Mitterrand could never win without its aid.

Presumably Mr Fiterman has in mind Mr Mitterrand awarding ministerial portfolios to Communist ministers in the same proportion as their party's vote--which would mean at least half a dozen. Mr Mitterrand fought the 1974 presidential election as head of the triangular "Leftist Union" formed by the Communist-Socialist-Radical allaince which disintegrated two years ago.

He lost to Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing by a mere 400,000 votes in an electorate of over 25 millions. Mr Mitterrand, who announced his candidacy last Sunday, said last May that if he were elected president he would dissolve the National Assembly (parliament) and call new elections. At present the government of Premier Raymond Barre has an overwhelming majority. Mr Fiterman's remarks are seen here as embarrassing for Mr Mitterand, for many voters who are critical of the Barre government would not be pleased to see Communist ministers in a French Government. Mr Fiterman agreed that it was "legitimate" for Mr Mitterrand to keep his options open, but he attacked him for failing to answer crucial questions and "acting slowly in a deliberately created fog."

There has been no official Socialist Party reaction to Mr Fiterman's remarks, but observers feel that moderate Socialists will be unhappy about the issue of Communist ministers being raised at this moment, as this could lose votes of the anti-Communist left. So far Socialist Party officials have hinted that they would like to see some kind of an alliance with the Gaullists rather than the Communists. Communist Party leader Georges Marchais is also a presidential candidate, but is expected to be eliminated in the first round of voting.

PCF SECRETARY GENERAL SPEAKS IN RENNES

[Excerpt] In a speech yesterday evening to a crowd of Bretons gathered in Rennes, Georges Marchais stated:

"In an interview published on Monday, Francois Mitterrand openly states that he is prepared to govern with the right. He explains that, if elected, he will dissolve the assembly. He stresses that regarding 'the future majority, there are many different hypotheses and they cover the sphere of our country's historical realities.' He was then asked: "Leftwing president, rightwing majority--a Portuguese-style situation?' He replied: 'Something like that.'

"What would the government program be under those conditions? What would the policy be? He does not say. However, what is certain is that capital's forces clearly will not tremble at such a plan.

"Of course, the workers know that they can expect nothing good to come of such pseudo-political alliances. The objective of this political operation aimed at installing a real "tripartite consensus" between the UDF, RPR and PS is very clear. It is to channel discontent into a blind alley, to avoid change and to establish a lasting cooperation between the right and the PS in one form or another to ensure the continuation and aggravation of capital's policy.

"I am well aware that in discussing such facts I am exposing myself to accusations that 'Georges Marchais is attacking Francois Mitterrand again....'

"I would, therefore, like to take this opportunity to clarify things. Is my objective--as I hear every time I switch on the radio or television--to hit out as hard as possible at Francois Mitterrand whenever I have the opportunity to do so? Is my adversary the PS? No, definitely not. My adversary is the policy of unemployment, deprivation of the workers, restriction of freedom and national resignation. That is what I am fighting. It is the deliberately planned escalation of this policy, carefully designed by the employers that I want to prevent. It is this line and the man implementing it--Giscard d'Estaing--of which I want to rid France.

"Therefore, if I am forced to emphasize Francois Mitterrand's stances and demonstrate their dangers, it is not because I take pleasure in criticizing Francois Mitterrand. It is because I do not want to allow him to save Giscard d'Estaing's policy--the policy which I am fighting with all my strength. I am fighting the 'tripartite consensus' because I intend to do everything I can to thwart this political alliance, which could enable capital to tighten its grip as it wishes.

"What I want to do with my party is to create the right conditions to defeat the man who wears the colors of the National Council of French Employers: Giscard d'Estaing. I want to pave the way for the change which the workers expect and achieve a union which will impose it--a union of all people's forces, the leftwing union for change.

"That is my objective. That is the aim of my struggle in this presidential election battle."

Comments on Poland, Unions

LD261213 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 21 Jan 81 p 4

[Report on interview granted by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais to Rennes and Brittany Press Club journalists in Rennes on 20 January]

[Excerpt] The Communist candidate was questioned both on the situation in Poland and on the possibility of the socialist countries' taking up Poland's experience.

Georges Marchais was anxious first to assert that "the Poles are in control of their affairs" and that it is up to them to "solve their problems themselves." For instance, he pointed out, stressing that he was not referring to the CGT's attitude, that he would not visit Poland, as others have, to preach to the workers in that country.

He was then asked whether Poland should take the French trade union situation as a model. Georges Marchais took pains to demonstrate the highly original character of the trade union movement in our country. Indeed, according to him, the French trade union's mission is to rally all the workers, whatever their political opinions, in the struggle against the employers, as the CGT is doing.

While strongly reaffirming his attachment to trade union independence from political parties, he nonetheless noted that everybody should have the freedom to belong to the party of his choice. He criticized trade union leaders who keep quiet about their membership in parties in which they nonetheless play a major role. Returning to the question of a "model" for the Poles, he stated: "Models do not exist; we have rejected the theory of models and our decision is irreversible."

Finally, questioned on the possible consequences of the Polish situation in the other socialist countries, Georges Marchais noted that "socialism already is showing great diversity. This diversity increasingly will be shown and this will enrich socialism." Demonstrating that the adoption of socialism by new countries would only increase this process, he concluded on this point by saying: "The events in Poland are bound to prompt reflection in other socialist countries on the nature of the problems raised." In conclusion, the Communist candidate stressed the positive development of the situation in the socialist countries.

PCF SENDS 60TH ANNIVERSARY GREETINGS TO PCI

LD271535 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 23 Jan 81 p 19

[Text] "Dear comrades," the PCF Central Committee's message reads, "on the 60th anniversary of the PCI's foundation, we wish to convey to you the French Communists' fraternal and warm greetings and to ensure you of our solidarity in the struggle for peace, disarmament, democracy and socialism. In January 1921 at the Leghorn congress, in a situation of harshest class struggle, the creation of the PCI constituted the new weapon with which the Italian workes armed themselves. Following the tragedy of World War I and the failure of the Second International, the PCI forged itself in the major struggles against exploitation, cultural suffocation, Fascism and war. During these years of oppression, the PCI managed to withstand the cost of sacrificing many of its members and leaders, including Antonio Gramsci. In the national liberation war, the party played a decisive role in providing the resistance forces with a unitary prospect for the country's democratic transformation. The PCI now constitutes a decisive force in Italy's defense and regeneration. On your 60th anniversary, dear comrades, we again express to you all sincere good wishes of success."

OPINION POLL SHOWS DROP IN SUPPORT FOR GISCARD

[Text] According to an opinion poll carried out by the Louis Harris Institute and published in L'EXPRESS of 24 January [presumably reference to edition dated 21 January], Valery Giscard d'Estaing would receive 51 percent of the votes cast as against 49 percent for Francois Mitterrand. This poll, carried out between 12 and 16 January on a representative sample of 1,000 people aged 18 years and over, marks a drop in support for Giscard d'Estaing. The outgoing president has lost 8 points compared with the previous poll carried out in November (51 percent compared with 59 percent).

In the first round, Giscard d'Estaing is down 2 points (32 percent as against 34 percent in November and 36 percent in September). Francois Mitterrand who is still in second place is up 5 points (24 percent as against 19 percent in November). Georges Marchais is down 2 points (16 percent as against 18 percent) as is Mr Chirac (10 percent as against 12 percent). Michel Debre has not gained or lost any ground (6 percent).

The opinion poll institute offered the people questioned a second hypothesis for the first round which included Michel Colucci, known as Coluche. The entertainer would receive 5.5 percent of the votes.

CSCE REVIEWS DISARMAMENT, ECONOMIC EXCHANGES

LD281832 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1400 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Jose Manuel Salgado dispatch from the Palace of Congresses]

[Text] At the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe it has been a morning of work in commissions. Of the three commissions which were due to work only two did so, since the followup commission adjourned shortly after convening because there were no speaker.

Some serious work was done in the security commission. Contrary to expectations, there were no confrontations but rather a serious review of the two proposals for a conference on disarmament in Europe: the Polish proposal, backed by the socialist countries; and the French proposal, backed more or less by the Western countries. The first of these without a fixed agenda so as to decide upon the subjects to be discussed in the second phase. And logically, it is proposed, this should deal with both conventional and nuclear weapons. For their part, the French are asking that the territory over which disarmament is implemented should reach not just 250 kilometers beyond the Soviet border, as Moscow would like, but right to the Urals.

The economic commission dealt mainly with a Soviet proposal relating to the Helsinki accords, especially the one which says obstacles should not be placed in the way of economic exchanges. Although it has not been mentioned explicitly, what lies behind this is an attempt to counter the embargo measures taken by the United States. There was also talk of the facilitation of trips by businessmen and the increased exchange of information between countries, and the European Community countries stressed the question of compensatory trade exchanges, that is, where imports are paid for in other products rather than in currency.

All in all, then, quite a positive morning at the Madrid Conference.

SUSPENSION OF BAN ON SOVIET SHIPS IN CANARIES

WA281300 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 16 Jan 81 p 15

[Article by Diego Talavera]

[Text] Soviet scientific ships will again be able to use the Canary Islands as ports of call after a 5-month suspension period. The ship, Professor Vodyanitskiy, will be the first to arrive at Las Palmas port next week.

Since last August, Soviet scientific ships had not been allowed to enter La Luz port. Spanish authorities wanted to get more information about the nature of these ships before they could permit them to enter again. These measures were taken as a result of comments made by the press and in political circles that these ships were engaged in espionage in the Canary Islands.

Nevertheless, Spanish authorities have again authorized entry to these Soviet scientific ships. The Professor Vodyanitskiy, weighs 1,172 gross register tons and carries 36 crew members and 31 scientists. This same ship was in the Canarian port approximately 1 year ago.

BRIEFS

PCE-EPK PARTY OFFICIAL--Roberto Lertxundi was reelected secretary general of the Communist Party of Euskadi [PCE-EPK] at the closing session of the Fourth Congress of the Basque Communists which ended this morning in Lejona, Vizcaya. The PCE-EPK continues along the Eurocommunist line, observers say, and thus also opens up the path towards its convergence with Euskadiko Ezkerra in the search for a Basque nationalist left. Also reelected as president of the PCE-EPK was Ramon Ormazabal. [Text] [Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1400 GMT 26 Jan 81 LD]

PRESS REPORTS U.S. STATEMENTS ON 'NORTH' ISSUES

O FILELEVTHEROS Report

NC290906 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 29 Jan 81 p 1

[Text] According to information we received from the U.S. Embassy in Nicosia, through the International Communication Agency [ICA], there are no U.S. radio stations operating in the occupied areas of Cyprus.

To a relevant question by O FILELEVTHEROS, the U.S. Embassy has given the following laconic answer: "There are no U.S. radio stations in operation in northern Cyprus."

The question was put because of the disclosures in the Turkish Cypriot press that American officials of the U.S. Embassy in Ankara had recently arrived in the occupied areas, through Tymbou airport, especially for the U.S. radio stations.

Protest

The "Indomitable Kyrenia" Association has sent a cable to the U.S. ambassador in Nicosia expressing its strong discontent and protest over the arrival of U.S. officials in the occupied areas of Cyprus through the occupied Tymbou airport.

This action is regarded as a flagrant violation of the sovereign rights of the Republic of Cyprus and an indirect recognition of the occupation's faits accomplis.

O AGON Article

NC290901 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 29 Jan 81 p 1

[Excerpts] Through its ambassador in Cyprus, Mr Stone, the U S. Government has expressed regrets to Foreign Minister Nikos Rolandhis over the recent visit by two U.S. officials to the occupied areas through the illegal Tymbou airport, and has given the assurance that such "unfortunate events" will not be repeated.

U.S. Embassy circles have said that the U.S. officials were accompanied by a Turkish employee of the U.S. Embassy in Ankara who--as they put it--could have a problem entering the occupied areas if he arrived through the Larnaca international airport.

The same circles also said that the U.S. officials did not use their diplomatic passports on their arrival in the occupied areas.

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS DISCUSS TERRITORIAL ASPECT

TA281641 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Text] The fourth round of the intercommunal talks will be concluded with today's meeting on the territorial aspect of the Cyprus problem. Today's meeting began at the Ledra Palace hotel at 1630. Umit Onan is attending the meeting on behalf of the Turkish Cypriot community, Yeoryios Ioannidhis on behalf of the Greek Cypriot community and the UN secretary general's special envoy to Cyprus, Hugo Gobbi, on behalf of the United Nations.

Replying to journalists' questions before the meeting, Gobbi said that the territorial aspect is one of the most important aspects, that new developments are being discussed and that the talks have reached a sensitive point. However, he said that this aspect is now less sensitive than before.

In reply to a question, Gobbi said that the developments concern the Maras [Varosha] issue, but he did not want to comment further. Gobbi noted that some of the views of the UN secretary general are currently being studied, that there is widespread speculation regarding this subject, and that these views have not been rejected.

Replying to questions before the meetings, Ioannidhis said that today the Greek Cypriot side expects the Turkish Cypriot side to submit concrete proposal and a map, and that the views of both sides on all four subjects will thus be clarified. In reply to a question, Ioannidhis noted that Waldheim did not [word indistinct] on the subject of Maras, but he did express certain views. Replying to a question whether or not he regards the Maras issue as a separate issue, Ioannidhis said that according to the 19 May agreement, the Maras issue is a separate issue and has priority.

In his statement before the meeting, Onan noted that no one can complain about the atmosphere of the talks, but accusations of intransigence leveled by the press or by either side against the other do not help the talks. Onan said that every word spoken at the talks is being recorded and that those who level these accusations would be very ashamed if they saw the record.

In reply to question on whether or not the Turkish Cypriot side rejected any proposal made by Waldheim, Onan said that no proposal submitted by Waldheim has been rejected and that everything that comes from Waldheim is being answered in a constructive manner. Onan added that it is not possible to link the Maras issue with the issue of the Lefkosa [Nicosia] international airport.

The meeting was still in session when this newscast was prepared.

NEWSPAPERS REPORT ON DEFENSE TALKS WITH U.S.

I KATHIMERINI Article

NC281650 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 28 Jan 81 p 1

[Excerpt] The Greek counterplan is the basis of the negotiations that began yesterday with the United States to conclude a Greek-U.S. defense and economic agreement. This was decided yesterday at the opening meeting of the negotiating teams of the two countries, despite the fact that during the substantive and constructive discussions that followed the U.S. side had asked for negotiations to begin on the basis of the U.S. plan for the main agreement. In any case, the acceptance of the Greek proposal entails, according to the observations of diplomatic circles, the submission of more amendments on the party of the U.S. side and more complicated negotiations that will definitely also affect their duration. The five geographical appendices concerning the operation of an equal number of bases were also handed over to the U.S. side yesterday.

According to information received by I KATHIMERINI, yesterday's discussions also mentioned the secret protocols in the defense and economic cooperation agreement between the United States and Turkey, knowledge of which the Greek side regards as necessary for the formulation of its proposals on the substantive points of the agreement, especially in order to determine what our country will receive in exchange within the framework of maintaining the balance in the region. On its part, the U.S. side regards these secret protocols as classified technical arrangements and consequently minor importance to the Greek-U.S. agreement. Given this U.S. opposition--at least so far--the Greek side is studying ways of safeguarding its national interests.

In any event, the final U.S. position on the question of the protocols will, according to all indications, be the subject of consultations at higher levels in the next few days. The arrival in Athens next Friday of the Greek Ambassador in Washington, Mr I. Tzounis, who will definitely be bringing certain views of the new U.S. administration regarding the Greek position on the matter of the bases, seems to be linked to this issue.

APOYEVMATINI Report

NC281810 Athens APOYEVMATINI in Greek 28 Jan 81 p 16

[Excerpts] The substantive phase of the negotiations for the Greek-U.S. agreement on the bases begins today, the second day of the talks, in which Mr Roussos and Mr McCloskey, along with officials from both sides, will take part, just as yesterday.

In any case, the guarantees for the security of Greek borders that must be given by Washington and the preservation of the balance of power are a fundamental demand of the Greek side within the framework of the final agreement. On this point the Greek position, which does not seem to be meeting with serious objections from the U.S. side, will remain firm.

After an assessment had been made of the first meeting, it was being reiterated yesterday that the atmosphere had been so cordial and the views of the two sides had been put forward in such a friendly manner that the impression had been created that it would not be long before the final agreement is on the way to being concluded.

This, however, is also being strengthened by the fact that the reports converging from various U.S. sources present Washington as being in a hurry to conclude the Greek-U.S. agreement as soon as possible because this would remove a pending issue that is linked directly to the strategic interests of the United States in the region at a time of unavoidable realignments, which are a consequence of the Middle East crisis.

I AVYI Comment

NC282045 Athens I AVYI in Greek 28 Jan 81 p 6

[Comment: A "Legal-Looking Coup"]

[Text] The U.S.-Greek discussions that began yesterday on the status of the U.S. bases in Greece and the signing of the pertinent agreement, are provoking the feelings of the great majority of the people. The government must not nurture delusions on this point. The obligations to which the government will give its consent are based on very rotten grounds.

With the presence of U.S. bases on Greek territories, the consequences are not neutralized nor are they diminished in the least with the guarantees that the Greek side appears to demand in the discussions and which refer to the existence of a Greek commander at each base with substantive authority. So far, much data and many arguments have been written by very competent experts. They indicate that this method of "Hellenization" of the bases is a deception. The U.S. bases--with the Greek commander as "figurehead"--will continue to be American and they will continue to send the coded data that they collect for final processing to the U.S. Pentagon. The bases will continue to serve U.S. strategy. Of course, the U.S. has never found any difficulty--nor will it find any difficulty in the future--in "utilizing" the data that it will gain from the bases in Greece in order to provoke the socialist countries, to fight the people in the Middle East and to inform Turkey, this "irreplaceable" NATO ally in the region of the eastern Mediterranean and Middle East.

And, if all of this was reality in the past, now it is doubly real with Reagan's accession to the U.S. Presidency. The reintegration into NATO's military wing and the imminent agreement on the bases creates, in the new situation, a much more dangerous character than that of the past, because this same U.S. strategy is expected to become more adventurous and dangerous.

Therefore, this constitutes a willful downgrading of the importance of the decisions that are to be adopted in the U.S.-Greek discussions, when the whole problem appears to be revolving around the authority that the Greek commander of the bases will have, or whether the United States will consent to guarantee the notorious "balance in the Aegean." The problem is very serious and it concerns the progressive blockade of our country by the U.S. strategy, with all the consequences that are derived from this event.

No agreement for U.S. bases is recognized by the Greek people, who are struggling for the abolition of the bases. The government that is negotiating such a vital issue at the end of its term, and when the people's disposition is evident, is substantially creating a "legal-looking" coup. And it can be certain that this is how it is being classified in the conscience of the Greek people.

TO VIMA REPORTS RALLIS INTERVIEW IN STOCKHOLM

NC281711 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 28 Jan 81 p 8

[Report by TO VIMA correspondent St. Psikharis]

[Text] Stockholm, 27 Jan--Saying that he couldn't reply to a hypothetical question, Prime Minister Rallis today refused to answer a question as to whether the New Democracy would agree to collaborate with another party in the formation of a government in the event that no party secures an overall majority in the next parliamentary elections.

Mr Rallis nevertheless expressed the hope that the New Democracy will have an overall majority in the Chamber of Deputies after the elections. He in any case ruled out the possibility of the right to vote being given to immigrants.

As for the rest, the Greek-Swedish talks ended with the meeting that Foreign Minister Mitsotakis had with his Swedish counterpart. The essential result of these talks was the decision to set up the joint committee which will study the possibilities of economic cooperation.

In the interview which he gave to Greek journalists, Swedish Prime Minister Falldin pointed out the many difficulties that exist in the education of Greek children as put forward in the Greek proposals, and ruled out the possibility of their education being undertaken by Greek teachers whom the Athens government would send to Sweden.

In his interview, Mr Rallis said the following:

No one in Greece is prevented from assuming any post because of his beliefs. The only restriction is that women cannot become priests or bishops.

In the matter of political exiles who live in Eastern bloc countries, each case is dealt with separately and mass repatriation is ruled out.

For constitutional, but also for other, reasons the right to vote cannot be given to Greek immigrants.

Finally Mr Rallis refused to answer a question on the issue of U.S. bases in Greece while declaring at the same time that Greece returned to NATO because this was dictated by its defense interests.

In the evening, Mr Rallis gave a reception during which he met representatives of the Greek community. At the same time Mr Rallis also received two representatives from a group of Greek demonstrators who had gathered in a nearby square and were shouting slogans against NATO, the United States, the bases, and so forth. Several dozen persons took part in this demonstration which ended up with slogans being shouted against Mr Rallis personally. PASOK representatives had announced that their organization was not participating in this demonstration.

Rallis Returns From Visit

NC281540 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1500 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Text] Prime Minister Rallis returned to Athens from Stockholm at 1630 this afternoon. His visit to Sweden is described as useful and constructive. Both sides have emphasized their desire for expanding commercial and financial relations, especially now that Greece is a full member of the EEC, and have assigned a joint committee of officials to examine each field of possible cooperation separately. The issues examined during the Greek-Swedish talks were related to education, the modernization of Greek railways, telecommunications and the undertaking of several large public projects in our country by the Swedes.

ECONOMIC DETERIORATION SEEN THREATENING GOVERNMENT

[Pierre de Vos dispatch: "Belgium, A New Government Crisis Seems Inevitable"]

[Text] Brussels--The political and economic situation has rapidly deteriorated over the past few days and Belgium is again threatened with a government crisis. The fourth Martens cabinet formed at the end of October seems to be on the point of collapsing, and all the indications are that the prime minister who has headed four different coalitions in less than 2 years will not return to 16, Rue de la Loi again if he fails. There will be no fifth Martens cabinet, and a general election, which would be inevitable, could be held in March.

The government has not succeeded in imposing the recovery plan which the previous majority had already recommended during summer 1980. Since consultations with the employers and trade unions failed, the prime minister had a wage freeze scheduled to start on 1 January 1981, but he will probably be incapable of imposing it. The government is gradually falling back under pressure from the trade unions, and the latter now seem determined not to accept any sacrifice on the pretext that the state "is not taking the money from where it is to be found." The workers' organizations (above all the General Federation of Labor of Belgium [FGTB] which has socialist leanings and, to a lesser extent, the Christian trade unions) are criticizing the Christian-Socialist coalition government for not eliminating tax fraud stringently enough and not imposing high enough taxes on high incomes.

Unemployment, Bankruptcies...

A demonstration organized by the socialist FGTB rallied several tens of thousands of members in Brussels on Saturday 24 January, and the organizations' Secretary General Debunne imposed an outright veto on the measures envisaged by the Martens cabinet. The majority's Socialist wing will have to take account of this revolt even if PSB Chairman Andre Cools is still recommending a tough line and repeating that the party and the trade union are separate movements. Karel van Miert's Flemish Socialists are much closer to the FGTB. There are also other reasons why they are prepared to launch a government crisis by withdrawing from the majority: They are no longer in agreement with the government's foreign policy and are making demands in the education sphere.

Furthermore the government gives the impression of being caught in a real maelstrom and of no longer being at the helm. Unemployment has started to soar again and is by far the highest in the European Community with 385,000 unemployed, 20 percent more than last year, almost 10 percent of the working population according to official figures (but in reality infinitely more because fictional posts are found). The experts predict further job losses in the coming months and an unemployment level next June which will be 40 percent higher than in 1980.

The crisis is making itself felt in all sectors. There is an increasing number of bankruptcies. Following the closure of the Citroen factories in Brussels in December the imminent closure of British Leyland's only European factory near Mons has been announced. The Walloon iron and steel industry is in a worse state than ever, and the merger of the Liege and Charleroi steelworks, vital to their survival, will mean the loss of 10 percent of the sector's jobs. A Belgium-Luxembourg summit was held in Brussels on Saturday and failed to ally fears in Wallonia, where people fear competition from Luxembourg's Arbed and the reservations shown by the EEC, which may not grant the 12-billion Belgian franc loan requested from the Community.

Total Disarray

The textile industry seems to be in as much danger as the steel industry. Enterprises are closing one after the other, and in one such factory in Brabent the threatened staff have even started a hunger strike. The state is clearly no longer capable of providing the aid requested. Its own coffers are empty: the public debt increased by BF300 billion in 1980, and fiscal receipts for the year were BF47 billion lower than expected.

Other, purely political quarrels have arisen in this atmosphere of panic, and these could bring about the government's fall on questions other than the economy: in Belgium, majorities do not like to "fall" on economic and social matters. The coalition is in conflict over education, and the "peace treaty" on schools signed in 1958 after a "war" lasting several years has been questioned. Socialists and Social Christians do not agree on how money is to be shared between state education and the Catholic free schools. Things are rapidly becoming heated.

This is also true of the Zaire question. In view of General Mobutu's recent action against 12 Zairian deputies, Mr van Miert's Flemish Socialists are demanding that Belgium suspend its military aid to Kinshasa and that the Belgian Parliament censure the Zairian head of state, which the Social Christians categorically refuse to do on the grounds that such a motion would threaten the tens of thousands of Belgians still in Zaire and would affect that country's orders to Belgian industry, further aggravating unemployment.

In short, there is complete disarray and everything again seems set for a political crisis exactly 3 months after the formation of the fourth Martens cabinet.

MINISTERS SPEAK DURING BUNDESTAG BUDGET DEBATE

Defense Minister Apel

DW291053 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1535 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Speech by Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel during the Bundestag budget debate in Bonn--live]

[Excerpts] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen: Deputy Wuerzbach in the earilier part of his speech made several remarks which surely do not require any comment, for it is also known to you, colleague Wuerzbach, that all political forces in this parliament wish to pursue detente policy on the basis of military balance.

There is among our youth and in both churches--and you just referred to an ecclesiastical community, a Catholic community located at the border of our two voting districts--and in many social groups serious unrest about the question of whether what we generally are calling military balance still is the proper answer today as the prerequisite for peace and detente. In my church, there is the movement for living without arms. There is an action called Pax Christi in the Catholic Church which shows the same trend. Therein, I must critically say that young people are questioning the correctness of our security policy.

Surely, you do not believe that I was happy about the mention to cut DM1-billion in our case. Definitely not. But I do think it inevitable that a debate on these central issues at long last is being held in parliament. Young people ask: You spend DM40 billion on defense while hunger prevails in the world. And if we say, and surely all of us are saying it: No German troops in the Persian gulf, no German troops outside the NATO territory, but definitely a German contribution to worldwide security policy, diplomacy and development aid, then we will have no choice but to explain how these two things fit together. Therefore, the debate is as difficult a party as the SPD undoubtedly cannot be anything that jeopardizes our future but ultimately provides the chance to wage this debate altogether. And I wish you would likewise conduct that debate in your own church circles.

We must not give the impression that everything is wrong with our Bundeswehr and that the Bundeswehr as part of NATO is no longer mustering its proper contribution toward deterrence, toward Western defense. U.S. Secretary of State Al Haig is quoted here often. Let me, too, quote him for a change, namely, answering the question of what he really plans to demand of the Europeans, he said, and I quote: You know, Messrs Senators in the U.S. Senate, that if Helmut Schmidt were sitting here today and you were asking him: Why are you not doing more, Mr Chancellor?, he would reply: Senator, we constantly are keeping about 500,000 men under arms today. This corresponds to an armed force of 12 divisions which are deployed in their defense areas in full defense readiness. I repeat quoting Al Haig: which are deployed in their defense areas in full defense readiness. If you Americans would want to carry an approximately identical burden you would have to maintain 42 divisions in Europe now instead of the present 6 plus.

Yesterday I heard the speakers of the opposition lament the great net state borrowing, the problems of the federal budget--and you, colleague Hase, also offered some vaudeville performance, as I heard on the radio, and you made it sound very funny. And yet you were dead serious in your contention that we cannot go on like this. Very well, ladies and gentlemen, this is exactly what I wanted to hear, and now just take a look at this budget.

It represents a 4.3 percent increase; the defense expenditures increase by 6.2 percent, meaning by 50 percent more than the expenditure rate for the entire budget. And this, I feel, must be properly appreciated. It is not at all a foregone conclusion. I know quite a few countries, West European countries and NATO members, with Christian Democratic governments, in which the defense budget actually is the piggy bank, in which rigorous cuts are made even into nominal deficits [nominale miesen]. And even a government like the Conservative government in England has made it clear that it must tone down its ambitious goals.

You will say that this is also attributable to the MRCA Tornado. Surely it is. But I believe that we should take a look at the figures and soberly assess the budget and see whether your assessment, Mr Wuerzbach, is correct. And it is my finding that you are wrong. Let us take a look at it.

The expenditures for procurement, which involves equipment, and arms, will increase by 17 percent. Surely, the expenditures for the MRCA Tornado claim one-fourth of that. But we are spending 17 percent more on arms in 1981, and I tell you that we can indeed finance in 1981 all projects of the new arms generation. We will not have to cancel orders, cut, or reduce at the arms conference. The problem is a different one. The problem is that we must reconcile ourselves to the fact that the growth rates will not continue that way in the budgets. And that takes me again to your excited complaint about problems of the federal finances. You don't believe, and neither do I, nor can I expect, that the budget for defense in the long run can remain exempt from the problems of budget consolidation. [applause]

Now let us take a look at the other items of the budget so that we can also get down to the problems. We will increase the soldier's pay by 13 percent by the middle of the year. Our soldiers will participate in the general increase of public service salaries. Even though this is a skipover budget as far as personnel is concerned, that is to say, no extra position increase, we will get approximately 500 position advancements so as to implement the army model No four.

I am getting now to the general problem. In 1978 a sum of DM350 million for this plane had been left over. This money could not be spent because the production progress of the three industries of Italy, England and the Federal Republic was not as expected. In 1979 we more or less made ends meet with the money. And in 1980, at the end of the year, we were short DM500 million. You say any company operating this way would end up in difficulties. Oh no, any company having to build as highly complicated a weapons system as this, and jointly with other countries to boot--with Italy and England, with highly complicated regulations, involving several hundred supplier companies, with a NATO agency which controls the whole thing--a company which would have to do such a project would accumulate reserves. It would have transferred the DM350 million of 1978 to the reserves.

We are in the terrible situation of the annual character of the budget estimates. And this, mind you, makes the planning of such a project extremely difficult. In this weapons system we order parts which will burden the federal budget 4 years from now: these are referred to as long-term orders. And we proceed from financial expectations which are not covered by anything, not even by the medium-term finance planning. So what needs to be done now? Mr Wuerzbach, you will say that this is not enough, the analysis may be right, but where do we go from here?

To begin with, it is an incontestable fact that mistakes were made at Hardthoehe. I pointed out that planning errors occurred. I have drawn attention to what we have changed in that respect. And it goes without saying, I emphasize here once again, that I am bearing the ministerial responsibility. Who else?

We have changed something organizationally in new measures so that we will have an idea of how matters stand more quickly and thus will be warned earlier. Yet, the problem of the annual character of budget calculations, the impossibility of having any reserves and, the fact that the ceiling has become quite low for really financing the procurement projects equally with all that belongs to them are absolutely obvious.

At the forthcoming arms conference we must proceed from financial expectations which are somewhat realistic. We must then submit to you and the Federal Cabinet alternatives which will then show, in the efforts toward making our country's defense capability the best that can be had, some alternative solutions which will then be up to your decision as well.

Talking about money, by the way, Mr Wuerzbach, do you really believe--I must ask that, really--that we should fulfill all eight American demands? You said the master stationing plan, the forward deployment of brigades, is highly important and should be implemented. This is what you said. It is, however, not my judgment that counts here; the decision will have to be made in the Federal Cabinet. But I do have the responsibility for one measure, namely, the advance stockpiling of U.S. war material on German soil, so that just the units need to be flown in--the host nation support. For this measure I am bearing the responsibility, not for others. And I would like to tell the opposition the following in warning: Notwithstanding all readiness to examine and take everything quite seriously, let us beware of returning to the times of the offset payments, meaning the payment to our allies for their being on German soil. And let us beware of starting anything with an ally--even if it is only the renovation of barracks--which then would continue all the way through all allies like a red thread. I would like to warn you in the interest of the German taxpayer to say things here too rashly which ultimately the finance minister would dump on the defense minister since these also involve defense expenditures under NATO criteria. So I as you to be a bit more careful here.

Let me sum up. The budget problems concerning the Bundeswehr insecurity policy will confront us with the greatest difficulties. Who would want to doubt that anyway? And in that respect we are no exception at all with respect to other industrial nations. And yet I can state that, and this has been confirmed by the judgment of our Western allies and by the considerable increase in the 1981 defense budget by 6 percent plus, this is a key issue of social-liberal policy. This key issue will enable us to live up to our tasks in 1981. Under the medium-term finance planning we will be facing problems which will we discuss and present in all frankness.

The next problem will be to induce society to enter into a debate with us on the significance of the Bundeswehr and of home defense. [Words indistinct] neither left nor right, nor any hardening in the Bundeswehr or in society. What we need is the receptive ear for each other and the frank dialogue with each other. I prefer the critical dialogue with the Bundeswehr to mutual silence. And it is a good thing that in the next few months, in February and March, the debate on traditions will be conducted with the Bundeswehr. All of us then will be invited to state our views, and conclusions will be drawn.

I would not even dream of pulling the Bundeswehr out of the public or even hiding it. Home defense and the Bundeswehr are an integral part of our society, this being the consensus of the democratic forces in our country. And we should not allow anybody to call this in question. Thank you. [applause]

Foreign Minister Genscher

DW291225 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1355 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Address by Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP chairman and foreign minister, to the Bundestag budget debate in Bonn--live]

[Excerpts] We all support help for the Third World, and it is to the great credit of the discussions we had here in the German Bundestag that help for the Third World has never been considered by us as public development aid. We consider opening the markets of industrial countries for semiproducessed and processed goods of the Third World states as help for the Third World. We must make an end to the idea that the states of the Third World are raw material and energy suppliers. If they should be incorporated in our free world economy system with equal rights, they must be given the same market chances, even if it entailed difficult structural adaptation processes for the industrial states. [applause]

I must say that the socialist states must soon make up for their considerable lagging behind not only with regard to development aid, but also with regard to opening their markets. Less than 5 percent of the exports from Third World countries go to socialist states, while more than 70 percent go to market economy states. The rest is exchange between developing countries.

The basis of foreign and security policies supposed to guarantee our country a life in peace and freedom is our being imbedded in the European Communist and the North Atlantic alliance. We must contribute our share, so that these two communities will remain united, strong and able to act. That is a basic task of great importance for German foreign policy. A coordinated policy of solidarity is the need of the moment for Western democracies. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, one must be aware of it that the center of the common policy must be agreement between North America and Western Europe. That is a stability factor for the whole world. One thing must be clear to the Europeans: It is correct that Europe wants to talk with equal rights about the common aims in the alliance with the United States, but equal rights in the alliance presupposes the will to make a balanced contribution to the common security. That is a task of Europe. [applause]

These weeks will be so decisive because, among other things, the Soviet leadership will set the basic orientation of Soviet foreign policy for the coming years at its party congress in February this year. Nothing would be more dangerous for future developments and for peace than wrong signals given by the Europeans and the Americans, signals of discord, creating wrong hopes in the East with regard to some drifting apart of Europeans and Americans. I think it is important not only for ourselves, not only for the states of the Third World, but most of all for the Soviet Union to realize that the Western alliance in its cohesiveness represents a firm and predictable quantity in international politics. The U.S. President and his secretary of state have stressed that they want to maintain peace and freedom by safeguarding the balance. We will make our contribution to this.

Ladies and gentlemen, several voices here in Europe create my suspicion that one likes to take the security guarantees of the Americans, but that one hestiates to make one's own contribution. [applause] But we cannot and may not become security policy hitchhikers of the United States. Security is a common affair. [applause]

In dealing with this problem--colleague Brandt has brought it up and given an answer in line with the government's opinion--we must examine how German interests, the interests of a divided country, can be incorporated in the common Western policy. It is important for our country to realize that all the progress achieved in relations with East European countries and in German-German relations has been achieved not despite our belonging to the Western communities, but only because of this belonging to it, and its framework. German policy alone would soon end in the deadend street of dependence.

The weight we carry vis-a-vis the East, ladies and gentlemen, the question how much importance is attributed to what the Federal Republic of Germany will and what says, the weight we carry vis-a-vis the East depend very much on the weight carried by the Western communities we belong to, and on our position in these communities. It was correctly said today that the alliance is not a traditional military alliance for all its partners. It is a far-reaching community with regard to our values and our fate. Friendship between the German and the American people is a most important factor in this respect. [applause]

The first and central task of a coordinated policy of liberal democracies in Europe and North America as well as the world as a whole, is the preservation of peace between the East and the West. This peace policy--peace policy is a moral claim and not a technocratic matter, as one sometimes tends to believe when the critics of our common Western policy take the floor--this peace policy calls for the absolute determination of the West to maintain the balance and reestablish it wherever necessary. In line with this realization, we must make our contribution to this balance. In pursuing the aim to reestablish the balance, we are in accordance with the new American administration. The firm will of the alliance is to guarantee a balance in any case. But if it were up to us, to the West, we want to guarantee a balance on as low an armament level as possible. This shows that we want the opposite of entering a new arms race.

This is why arms control negotiations have such a high priority. I am very grateful that Secretary of State Haig supported the priority of arms control negotiations in the name of his government. Arms control negotiations, ladies and gentlemen, are more important in the eighties than ever.

Ladies and gentlemen, I believe that our country was well advised in pursuing a restrictive arms export policy, regardless which parties had formed the government. In saying that our country was well advised, I view the current interests. But I believe there is also a moral reason for it. It fits our country to belong to the restrictive arms export countries. [applause] Nothing would be more dangerous than to set up industrial capacities for arms exports, which would later on force the government to look for markets wherever it can find them.

Ladies and gentlemen, I think that whenever we discuss arms exports, and when we will try to come to terms on principles--the Federal Security Council will have to have some thorough discussions--we will always have to take into consideration that whenever arms exports to the Middle East are involved, we must seemingly consider Israel's security interests as well as the historical responsibility of the Germans vis-a-vis the Jewish people. [applause] This is something we will also say, and it will be understood in all international camps.

Ladies and gentlemen, as regards arms control here in Europe, it is a matter of making our contribution to the Vienna MBFR negotiations so that they will produce concrete results. The Western suggestion aimed at an interim agreement is still a main issue. We hope that one will succeed to solve the data problem which is of decisive importance.

I hope that the attention of the world public will be more strongly focused on the second phase of the CSCE followup meeting in Madrid. I consider it particularly important in this respect that we should support together with our Western partners, with the United States, with Canada, with the states of the European community and with our NATO allies as well as other countries, the French proposal suggesting a concrete mandate for a European disarmament conference. That is an urgently necessary task.

Ladies and gentlemen, we have noticed with satisfaction that the new American administration will continue the SALT process. Of direct importance for Europe are the talks that have begun last year on medium-range nuclear missiles. We hope that these talks will experience the hoped-for progress. Efforts aimed at arms control are part of the security policy, but--and this is also important for the public discussion--efforts aimed at arms control can only be part of the security policy. They cannot be a substitute for the own necessary defense efforts.

We have always considered detente policy as a realistic detente policy, as a policy which would be successful only if the own security will be guaranteed. That was not the case in all Western states. The Soviet Union, for example, has continued its armament with quite some efforts--probably to the limits of its industrial capacity--at a time when defense efforts were rather stagnating for a longer period in the United States. The Soviet Union did that not only in the field of intercontinental nuclear arms, where it wanted to make up for lost ground, but it continued its armament in all fields, including the conventional field where it was superior in Europe anyway.

In the late seventies the Soviet Union began something which the federal chancellor was the first to point out to the international public, namely the quick deployment of modern, mobile and most accurately firing SS20 medium-range missiles. A most dangerous imbalance has come about here which must be seen on the background of American-Soviet parity in the intercontinental arms system, on the background of the conventional arms balance as well as the geographic position of the Soviet Union vis-a-vis Western Europe.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is therefore so important to implement the decision in all its elements. In the 1972 American-Soviet agreement, the United States conceded, so to speak, nuclear parity to the Soviet Union as well as equal rights as a world power. In doing this, the United States expected the Soviet Union to exert self-restraint and to renounce its extreme armament and expansion in the Third World, aimed at achieving one-sided advantages. This expectation of the United States did not materialize, although the United States had taken measures indicating that it did not at all want an arms race.

I remind you that in this period the United States canceled compulsory military service, renounced the B-1 bomber and suspended the decision on the neutron weapon. The other side did not take this into consideration, and in the Third World the Soviet Union started a policy of zones of influence and exertion of power which culminated in the invasion of Afghanistan.

Ladies and gentlemen, here lie the dangers for cooperation and detente. The treaties concluded by the Federal Republic of Germany in the seventies, the Helsinki Final Act which we have signed, all these things have lost none of their significance and correctness through this development.

The Soviet leadership ought to realize that the cooperation offered by the West, that Western preparedness, that such cooperation--a policy of worldwide partnership--would be more profitable for the Soviet Union than a policy of predominance, of striving for power, which handicaps East-West cooperation, which is a considerable burden to the economy of communist countries and which creates more and more of an antagonism between the Soviet Union and the states of the Third World.

The nonaligned movement will gain significance. The ability and the will to help solve conflicts from a nonaligned position is becoming stronger and stronger. I just want to mention the action of the frontline states in Africa in the solution of the Zimbabwe problem. I want to mention the efforts of these states to solve the Namibian problem. I want to state here particularly that I was impressed and that I am full of gratitude due to Algeria's successful mediation between the United States and Iran, which eventually led to the release of the American hostages. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, I think that the GDR leadership should seriously ponder on it whether cooperation would not be more advantageous for it. Travel restrictions through an increase of the minimum exchange amount is a violation of the spirit of the basic treaty. The fact that those are suffering most from it whose income is not the highest among us, this is just a sign indicating how the real problems of the people in Germany can be misjudged. People want to travel to see their relatives, independent of their income, travel from the West to the East, if East-West travel is impossible.

Ladies and gentlemen, one must be aware of it that no progress can be achieved for the benefit of the people in the divided country, if demands are being raised again although it turned out when the basic treaty was concluded that they cannot be implemented.

In no case at all will we be prepared to issue a bill in the Federal Republic of Germany which would make foreigners of our German compatriots in the GDR. [applause]

BERLIN ENVOY REGRETS NONRECOGNITION OF GDR

LD281358 Hamburg DPA in German 1213 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Text] Hamburg, 28 Jan (DPA)--Despite the setbacks in relations between the two German states, Guenter Gaus, the outgoing head of the Federal Republic's permanent mission in East Berlin, believes there is readiness on the part of the GDR to reach further agreements with the Federal Republic. He cited as an example a protocol on cultural issues. This is less than a cultural agreement but nevertheless more than we have now, Gaus said in an interview for the Hamburg weekly DIE ZEIT.

Gaus regrets the fact that the GDR has still not been inwardly recognized by the Federal Republic. "We are taking part in the show boxing matches of the past." According to Gaus, many people in political discussions are still avoiding the fact that "the two German states exist and, in all probability, will exist longer than today's generations." The Federal Republic should overcome its inward attitude toward the GDR and stop regarding it as merely a police state.

The interview was prereleased to DPA.

FRG PRESS ON SPD CRITICISM OF CHANCELLOR SCHMIDT

DW280908 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 28 Jan 81

[From the press review]

[Text] KOELNER STADT-ANZEIGER deals with the attacks of SPD Deputy Hansen on Federal Chancellor Schmidt and with the reaction of the party leadership: The reproach that Schmidt is responsible for political dirty tricks is a bad faux pas, but it does not necessarily force the top politicians to exhibit such drastic reactions. That Brandt and Wehner nevertheless involved party institutions is because they believe they have to apply the brake to leftwing discussions. More and more new conflicts are being unceremoniously produced in a faster and faster way with regard to more and more extensive issues.

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG points out in its commentary: Schmidt's position will be undermined more and more vis-a-vis his coalition partner--and even worse--vis-a-vis the allies, if the impression is aroused that his policy is increasingly losing the backing of the SPD. In this critical situation the support of Wehner and Brandt is useful for the chancellor, but only Schmidt himself can achieve a turn for the better. He is, therefore, expected to speak clearly on his own behalf in the budget debate and in the faction. The chancellor cannot avoid clearly pointing out his position once more in matters of nuclear energy and disarmament.

In the opinion of WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG, the chancellor, too, must tolerate criticism from his own party's ranks, but that he, too, is entitled to demand that this criticism remain objective and fair. The editorial then says verbatim: It may be painful for the leftwingers in the SPD that they are the ones, above all, who have to give in time and again. Yet on the one hand they are not the only ones, and on the other hand it must be clear also to the far-out leftists in the party that deserting Helmut Schmidt now would mean farewell to governmental responsibility. Granted, pure doctrine can be held high in the opposition, but not much more.

GISCARD EXPECTS 'CLEAR DEFINITION' OF U.S. POLICY

LD291645 Paris LE MONDE in French 28 Jan 81 p 7

[Text] On the occasion of his visit to Rome, Mr Giscard d'Estaing was questioned by Mr del Noce of Italian television about the international consequences of Mr Reagan's arrival in the White House. He stated:

"We have all suffered from the uncertainties of U.S. foreign policy over the last few years. These uncertainties were partly due to circumstances...such as the kidnapping of the hostages in Iran.... But overall we did not have the impression that there was a stable U.S. foreign policy line. Moreover, the United States has found itself, not because of the last president's conduct but because of what happened over the previous 10 or 15 years, in a position of evident weakness.

"It is not good in the world for one of the big powers, especially a democratic power, to appear in a position of weakness.

"There are two things which we can expect: First, a clear definition of U.S. policy--a definition which we will then discuss among Europeans. On certain points, it will be in harmony with ours; on others, it will certainly call for discussions with the United States. The second point is that the United States should not be in a position of weakness. I do not mean by this that it is necessary to embark upon an arms race...but that it is necessary to ensure a good balance, an exact balance, between the two superpowers' means of security."

LE MONDE QUESTIONS THEMES OF GISCARD TV ADDRESS

LD291425 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Jan 81 pp 1,20

[Jacques Amalric commentary: "Independence and Restraint"]

[Text] Mr Giscard d'Estaing can deny it as much as he likes but his television speech Tuesday evening was essentially an electioneering exercise. In the guise of explaining to the French people a good policy which apparently has been misunderstood, he tried to refute some fundamental criticisms, especially allegations of a "woolly" attitude toward the USSR, made by Marie-France Garaud on the same network the previous evening. This was demonstrated by the highly irritated "please" with which he intimated the instruction to one of his interlocutors never again to utter the sacrilegious word "irresolution" in his presence.

The cold anger shown by the head of state--he was to show it again when Alain Duhamel dared to refer to the "personal relations" between the president and some African heads of state--was understandable; he wanted to present an image of resolution and determination and eradicate the image of hasty improvisation and diplomatic "do-it-yourself." Did he succeed, however?

Once again the unsuspecting viewer will have been impressed by the learned tone and the impression of implacable logic given in the speech. However, when the head of state's remarks are examined more closely you cannot help having a rather uncomfortable feeling: Is it good policy for a man whose main objective is to "defend France's interests" and to "maintain peace with security and dignity" to show so much understanding for the potential adversary and to limit his action in advance to what he regards as extraneous to the other side's higher interests? Are there things which can be thought but must not be spoken?

This uncomfortable feeling is strongest with regard to Poland. Is it really the job of a Western head of state to place so much emphasis on that country's "geographical and strategic position"? Is it his place to advise the Poles to restrict themselves to economic reforms? Is it his place to establish no link between Western aid to Poland and the continuation of the reform process inaugurated by the Gdansk agreements? In short, is it his place to make do with asking Moscow to show some "restraint" in this affair after leading the Soviets to think that they are already assured of our restraint.

Is it not furthermore both extremely optimistic and highly presumptuous to suggest that we owe the fact that Moscow has still not intervened militarily in Poland--other types of intervention are constant--to the trip made by Giscard d'Estaing to Warsaw last spring? How can we believe that when we know what happened to Mr Gierek, whose name was not mentioned but who, as was frequently stressed in the past, had "personal ties" with the president? Is it not rather because the Soviets are well aware of the enormous difficulties which an intervention would pose for them in the field that they would only use that "solution" as a last resort?

Even with regard to China, which was only mentioned in passing, Giscard d'Estaing showed his hand in advance by confirming to Mr Brezhnev--the latter must have had some inkling of this--that France is hostile to the idea of "using relations with Beijing as a means of exerting pressure on the Soviet Union." At the same time, this was a warning to Mr Reagan, who enjoys a "prejudice in his favor" [in terms of France's assessment].

It was with the same attitude of mind that Giscard d'Estaing dealt with Afghanistan which was, nonetheless, to contitute the high spot of this evening lecture with the proposal of an international conference. "The Soviets," he said, "underestimated the Afghan people's reaction." But did they underestimate the West' reaction? What would have happened if the Afghans, in such great numbers and virtually without any military aid, had not been prepared to die rather than accept a foreign occupation? What if Moscow, instead of sending a contingent of around 100,000 men, had sent in twice or three times as many?

The president's explanations on Chad and Libya are not free from ambiguity either. The legalism behind which he sheltered--no French intervention without an official request from the legal governemnt--was aimed at diverting the real debate rather than answering the real question. The question never was why France did not intervene in Chad, but why Paris assessed the political forces in the country so badly and then completely underestimated and even kept quiet about the Libyan military intervention.

Indeed, it was only on the eve of the triumphal entry into Ndjamena by Colonel al-Qadhdhafi's troops that the Elysee admitted that the intervention had been made--without, however, daring to name Libya. Did not this silence from Paris--this "restraint"--constitute an outright encouragement to Tripoli? In these circumstances are we to admire Giscard d'Estaing's persistent refusal to invite Colonel al-Qadhdhafi to Paris, especially since lower-ranking Libyan envoys are still being received in Paris even though our embassy in Tripoli is still uninhabitable....

Mr Giscard d'Estaing's refusal to revert to colonialism is as praiseworthy as his refusal to be reintegrated into NATO. However, it is difficult to see how this can be reconciled with French action in Central Africa where France has behaved with a cynicism which is neocolonial to say the least and for which most of our African friends still reproach us today; and where, after having defended the indefensible, we intervened against that country's legal authorities despite the noninterference theory. Apparently, what applies to Chad does not apply to Central Africa. On what mysterious grounds?

Poland, Afghanistan, Chad and Libya--the main sections of the speech give a good indication of the president's election worries. The way in which other international issues were dismissed does not dispel that impression; dodging the Israeli-Arab issue; entirely theoretical negation of the reserved sphere [reference to forein policy being a sphere reserved for the president]; rejection of a reform of the Atlantic alliance but recognition of the need to find new methods of consultation with the United States; a "crusade" to end "Europe's effacement in world affairs," followed by the rather contradictory exaltation ofthe "French-German nucleus." No matter! "France," we are told, "is a country which has considerable influence," and this influence will be increased if there is a better balance between the United States and the Soviet Union. All that will remain will be to achieve a more balanced mixture of the independence and restraint which Mr Giscard d'Estaing claims to follow.

LE MONDE VIEWS GISCARD'S AFGHANISTAN PROPOSAL

[Editorial: "Skepticism"]

[Text] When, following a brutal invasion of its territory, a people is forced to take up arms on a large scale against the occupier and the regime he has installed in power and when that people sees its social structures and its very life radically upset by civil war, how can we fail to show interest in any initiative aimed at ending the conflict! However, why does the proposal made by President Giscard d'Estaing for a conference on "noninterference" in Afghanistan arouse a degree of skepticism?

Of course, at first sight this proposal should satisfy the Soviets who are constantly denouncing foreign "interferences" (by Pakistan, Iran, China and Egypt being implied) in Afghanistan. However, in a way it also puts the USSR on the spot since that country is cited at the top of the list of countries "visibly" intervening.

This is not the first--and probably will not be the last--attempt to reach a settlement. However, it is so far the first which blatantly disregards participation by the Afghans whoever they might be, the Karmal government or nationalist and Islamic resistance fighters. Even if this high-handed attitude can be regarded as a sign of skill, it still reduces the significance of the French proposal. In addition, it cuts the ground from under Pakistan which is at present striving to convene a conference with Afghanistan and Iran under the aegis of the United Nations. Kabul would not take part in this tripartite meeting as a government but would be represented at it by the ruling communist party which amounts to the same thing. After seeming to give its consent to such a procedure the USSR seemed to back out. The plan is stumbling over the precise role which would be assigned to the United Nations.

For fear of calling down the wrath of an ally who is valuable, notably in the Near East and on the Palestine question, the Islamic countries have greatly moderated their condemnation of the USSR's action in Afghanistan. For the same reason, both because Moscow and Kabul did not reply and because Tehran did not follow up its reply, the Islamic movement's mediation misfired.

While that mediation had assured them of some publicity, the rebels are excluded from these new Pakistani and French initiatives. Wishing to avoid any tension with Afghanistan and the USSR and to avoid becoming the sanctuary for a prolonged resistance--in which the new U.S. administration would eventually show an interest in order to contain the Soviet advance toward the Gulf--Pakistan is bound to welcome any move towards a settlement.

To the extent that it includes the United States in such an attempt to reach a settlement, the French proposal is nearer to the plan put forward by Kabul--with Moscow's approval--in May 1980. However, could the USSR be happy with the fact that China, among the other permanent members of the UN Security Council, would be invited to the proposed conference while the Karmal government would not? Do the big powers have more chance than the Third World countries of making the USSR step down through diplomatic means when in general, contrary to Moscow's assertions, they are refusing to give the Afghan resistance fighters the military means of fighting on the spot.

MITTERRAND'S ELECTION MANIFESTO SUMMARIZED

LD291311 Paris LE MATIN in French 26 Jan 81 p 3

[Text] The introduction to the manifesto which Francois Mitterrand will champion during the presidential election begins with a violent attack against Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

"The incumbent president," the document states, "monopolizes everything and involves himself in everything in order to use even the smallest thing as an instrument of power." And it continues: "Whether through indifference or through license, the state is letting racism, violence and hatred revive. Young people know nothing except a repressive world which excludes them from any decisionmaking or even work. We are witnessing a gradual corruption of the Republic's principles. Democracy is at stake."

With reference to foreign policy, the manifesto states: "Our diplomacy espouses the language of our successive interlocutors."

And it continues: "How should Giscard d'Estaing's results be assessed? The questioning of the great achievements of the Republic, Popular Front and liberation (education, status and neutrality of the Civil Service, social security and so forth) arises from a desire for revenge and restoration of privileges once threatened. How can the rising bitterness, anxiety and even anger cause surprise? We live under a kind of monarchy, aloof from the people's reality and daily problems."

The manifesto further emphasizes the struggle against unemployment--the No 1 priority--and against inequalities. It insists on the need for a "rally of energies." "The Socialists believe that a great people cannot long tolerate the lack of any grand plan. They appeal to the people's conscience. They ask people to choose between surrender and overcaution [sursalut] and between the past and the future." The manifesto sums up its thought as follows: "Sweeping anxieties away," "reviving hopes" and "mobilizing energies."

The manifesto develops four themes for action.

First, peace--peoples' right to self-determination, gradual disarmament (withdrawal of Soviet SS-2 missiles and abandonment of the plan for the deployment of American Pershing missiles in Europe), nonproliferation of nuclear arms, talks on collective security in Europe, reform of the international monetary system and genuine implementation of the Treaty of Rome.

Second, employment--a program for large-scale projects. Increased numbers of civil servants (creating 21,000 jobs), reduction of working hours, reform of distribution networks, diversified energy policy, aid for small and medium enterprises and small farmers, protection for savings and development of savings facilities ("A"-type state savings scheme to be indexed on prices), struggle against speculation, and tax equality.

Third, freedom--(A) political democracy (either a 5-year presidential term renewable once or a 7-year nonrenewable term), genuine implementation of constitutional rights vested in Parliament, proportional representation in regional elections and municipal legislative elections in cities of 9,000 or more inhabitants (every list to include 30 percent women) and abolition of the president's right to appoint members of the Law Council.

And (B) social and economic democracy; reform of enterprises, professional equality of men and women, reduction in wage scale differentials, increase of low wages, family policy (creation of 30,000 places in day nurseries), creation of a great "unified and secular national education" service, "conquest of leisure time" and protection of natural balances. And, finally, many measures to ensure "decentralization" and "self-management," including the creation of a special status for Corsica and transfer of "powers seized by the state" to a level "closest to daily life."

And, fourth, France--(A) security; autonomous deterrent strategy, clear determination of the range and content of the Atlantic alliance, respect for accords with the USSR, special links with nonaligned countries, development of "heavy and pace-setting industries" and active presence in Europe; And (B) identity; universal message of cultural freedom and demographic development.

PCF MEMBER EXPELLED OVER POLICY DISAGREEMENT

"Own correspondent" report: "Deputy Mayor Expelled De Facto From PCF"]

[Text] Lille--In Tourcoing, Christian Maes, deputy mayor in charge of cultural affairs in the leftwing Union Commune Council headed by Maurice Devloo (PS), has just been expelled de facto from the PCF. The split between Mr Maes and his party dates from the invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet troops. During a commune council meeting in early 1980, Mr Maes publicly condemned that intervention.

Since then, Mr Maes, a history and geography teacher, has continued to act as deputy mayor, but his ties with his party have been increasingly less. At the beginning of this year, Mr Maes, a PCF member for the past 20 years, who still regards himself as a Communist, asked for his membership card to be renewed. The reply came last Saturday in a message from the Tourcoing section which states: "For the past year, Christian Maes has not only disagreed with the PCF but has fought it.... Today his attitude is leading him to fight against us and hence side with PS policy. He has, therefore, placed himself outside the party."

Mr Maes says that the PCF's rules have been violated: "My cell did not meet to debate this expulsion. The decision was taken by the section bureau on the federation's orders. This is a perfect example of undemocratic centralism.... I deplore the fact that the PCF leadership refuses to debate the line taken by PCF policy, which is resorting to anathema and slander."

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON BARRE'S MOROCCO VISIT

For the text of a French-Moroccan communique issued at the end of Premier Raymond Barre's visit to Morocco from 21 to 24 January, see the Morocco subsection of the North Africa section of the 29 January Middle East and Africa DAILY REPORT.

CORRECTIONS TO GISCARD TELEVISION INTERVIEW

In the 28 January Western Europe DAILY REPORT, page K 1, item entitled "Giscard Explains Foreign Policy Objectives," insert the following additions to make the article "text" instead of "excerpts":

Page K 2, end of fifth paragraph, insert new paragraph: "Now, if you like, to your question about the year 1980. (?These were in fact the wishes) for 1980. I spoke about the danger of war. You will remember that it surprised and perhaps shocked some people. (?People said): Is this true? Well. And some people said to me: You are going too far. Well, in 1980, there were a certain number of events. First of all, there were wars. There was, for example, the war between Iraq and Iran. There was continuation of the crisis situation in Afghanistan. And there were the anxieties connected with Poland from the summer of 1980. So, indeed, the situation was altogether worrying. Well now, at the present time, did your question bring in East-West relations?"

Page K 2, seventh paragraph, insert between "[answer]" and first sentence: "I am thinking about the clarity of the subjects, because we shall be talking on two levels. Unfortunately, there is a technical level in these matters of foreign policy. These are very complex issues which involve many countries, different negotiations. So there is a technical level. I do not think that it is necessary this evening to go into this technical level. I (?would do) it under different circumstances. On the other hand, there is the level of the big picture, the big explanation. That is what I would like to try to do with you."

Page K 3, end of first paragraph, insert: "We can, if you like [interrupted by interviewers' conversation]."

Page K 4, end of eighth paragraph, insert new paragraph: "[Question] And are you expecting a reply?

"[Answer] Yes, we correspond. We exchange messages regularly. To come back to your question, Mr Bortoli."

Page K 4, ninth paragraph should read: "Poland, on the other hand, must be able to rely on aid. This aid would not be a substitute for Poland's efforts. It would be to make such an effort possible. The origin of the crisis, as I have reminded you, was the economic problem. Would you like some examples? Poland's gross domestic product--production--fell regularly from year to year. It dropped by 2 percent in 1979 and by 3 percent in 1980. And then the Polish per capita income fell a slightly larger proportion. We are in France [word indistinct] the TV viewers who are concerned about maintaining purchasing power; and it is known that in the last 2 years Polish purchasing power fell regularly. The second indication of Poland's difficulties is its foreign indebtedness. Poland has considerable debts--debts which are going to get even bigger in the coming years, because there is no possibility for Poland's foreign balance to be reestablished before 2 or 3 years. And at the present time, for example, Poland is going to have a probable trade deficit for 1980 in the order of, let us say, $1 billion. But at the same time, it will have to pay a foreign debt, in this same year, of $7.5 billion, resulting from its accumulated debts. [Word indistinct] as well as the deficit which it could try to make disappear. It has considerable financial burdens. Therefore, a big effort is needed for the Polish people to reestablish their proper situation. And the political and psychological difficulty is that it is an impatient population--and one can understand it. Impatient to live better, to improve its situation. And yet the prospects for the next months and perhaps the next years are difficult prospects. Poland must be able to count on foreign aid to support its own efforts, which must be a national effort for recovery. Then, if you want, I will sum it up in three words with regard to Poland: sympathy, noninterference, aid."

Page K 4, end of eleventh paragraph insert: "I said to you just now, we have to bear in mind the geographic and strategic particulars. I think that to ignore these facts... We could go and look at the map together. Poland is at present between the Soviet Union--with which it has a very long border--Czechoslovakia and East Germany. Therefore, it is inside the Soviet bloc. And the communications of the Soviet bloc pass through Poland. Therefore, whoever ignores these geographic and strategic particulars does not have a chance. It is not acceptable for the Soviet Union.

"[Question] And for the Polish people? Do they tend to forget it?

"[Answer] That is another... [Questioner interrupts]

"[Question] Is it perhaps a dangerous phenomenon?

"[Answer] That is another...we do not have to discuss, if you like, the internal debates of Polish opinion. On the other hand, the economic reforms--such as they can be envisaged in Poland--must, in my opinion, be acceptable to the Soviet Union. Because, in any case, apart from the acceptance of these reforms there is only a return to a situation in which Poland will be incapable of assuring its economic development and its subsistence. Well, what is the extent of these reforms? It is up to the Polish people to [word indistinct].

"[Question] Economic and trade union [word indistinct]?

"[Answer] Economic and trade union. Up till now, there have been trade union reforms. That is to say, the dissatisfaction of Polish workers could be expressed. And [word indistinct] that is what one sees. [Word indistinct] in Poland [word indistinct] dissatisfaction is organized, but the economy is not reformed. And, to answer the workers' dissatisfaction, there has to be a reorganization of the economy. That is what the various Polish authorities are working on at the present time. And I think it has to be hoped that such work as that may succeed.

"[Question] Excuse me, did you have the impression--since you were received by the pope (?who is very knowledgeable) and who, as everyone knows, is Polish--did you have the opinion that he shares your analysis?

"[Answer] I would not like to quote...it would be improper...the details of a conversation which had no witnesses. But I can tell you that the attitude toward Poland, as I indicated just now, is to [word indistinct] let Poland live. Poland has to be allowed to resolve its problems. And naturally, Poland has to resolve its problems by taking account of the objective facts of its situation. I think this point of view was largely shared by my interlocutor.

"[Question] [Words indistinct] if the kind of patience which the Soviet leaders [word indistinct] toward the appearance of a double power in Poland, if this patience is motivated by the courageous resolve which the Poles always have shown in the past or by the support which those in the West could give them. In other words, does the West, France in particular, have the means to support the Poles in their will for national independence, [words indistinct] reforms?

"[Answer] I think that (?in this regard) the Soviets bear in mind a certain number of objective factors. That is to say, the consequences to which a different attitude would lead numerous consequences on which the Soviet leaders are completely informed."

Page K 4, end of penultimate paragraph insert: "I am convinced that the frankness of this discussion played a role. (?I do not say) what role, but a role in the Soviet (?restraint). [questioner interrupts] Just a moment, Mr Elkabbach. When one talks about restraint, I would like the truth to be known a little better. One (?may) think that restraint is ours alone and that it is basically an attitude of weakness and obligation."

Page K 6, end of third paragraph, insert: "But it is one of the subjects which should certainly be debated in the coming months. I am, as a matter of fact, not an advocate of the big summit approach. This approach has been tried. I think that in the modern world it is not the most effective because, first of all, it provokes, inevitably, a considerable deployment of the information media. So, by the nature of things, it takes place in public. Then, it gives rise to great hopes in public opinion. That is to say, people expect big decisions. And it can well be that certain decisions must remain confidential. Or simple, it is a question of coordinating (?lines) of action. That is why I do not think that the big summit approach is preferable a priori. Therefore, the methods of consultation have to be developed and the framework for these consultations must be sought. Nevertheless, I have said that one type of summit which should certainly continue, and which we have reason to desire, since it is of French origin, is the Rambouillet-type of summit. That is to say, the economic summits of the seven, of which the next is scheduled for July in Canada.

"[Question] In that way, it is really conducting international politics by the seven.

"[Answer] No, that is why in my opinion these summits of the seven are not summits in which one can discuss topical political problems which presuppose a decision. They are an examination of the world situation. When there are decisions to be reached--there may be decisions to be made--then a mechanism for consultations has to be defined.

"[Question] Well, precisely, in order to [word indistinct] relations, the functioning of cooperation, and [changes thought] European relations, isn't there precisely a specifically European effort to be made. For example, in West Germany not long ago there was an important politician who said that it was perhaps time to make a new appeal to tighten political cooperation and joint security. Is there from this point of view [changes thought]. It was, in fact, a [word indistinct] of Chancellor Schmidt, Mr Genscher, chairman of the liberal party.

"[Answer] You remember that people often said this, since the announcement itself, that there was to be a European union in 1980. It was an announcement made in 1972, renewed in 1973. And a German proposal was [word indistinct], that of a treaty of the European union. It is not even a German proposal. It was a speech made by Foreign Minister Genscher, to his party, the liberal party, and as far as I know the German Government has still not debated it. There is no formal proposal. And I think that in any case it is an idea that has to be examined. Nevertheless, I would like to make you aware of this fact: If there is to be a common European policy, it must not be the policy that takes its cue from the weakest position or from the (?slowest) movements. There are 10 of us from now on and in political matters perhaps [words indistinct] unanimity. One does not see how a state that does not want to could be forced to take a position on international policy. Now, the inconvenience of this system is that Europe is still in danger of speaking with a very weak voice, the weakest. That is why, in my opinion, a practical view of this affair is needed. First of all, I am convinced, after seeing the four big countries of Europe--the FRG, Great Britain, Italy and France--I am convinced that there is a will to intervene usefully in major international affairs. Is this will shared at the present time by all of our partners? Do they have the same desire to act? I am not sure of some of them. So I think that we must improve political cooperation. It is necessary that those who have the will for this political cooperation develop it even more, but one must maintain a sufficiently supple structure so that the voice of Europe will not necessarily be the most timid voice of Europe.

"[Question] Are you speaking of a (?directorate), Mr President?

"[Answer] No, it is not a (directorate) since, in practice, it is the will of the states, if the states want to participate in an active policy. And from what I saw recently, they wish to and want to. And this they have shown, incidentally, (?and that) they participate in this policy [word indistinct] for national reasons, I do not wish. They do not have to make the others speak [word indistinct] with a too timid or too feeble voice.

"[Question] It would be a (?force) of political will a la carte, [?each state acting according to its own will].

"[Answer] Yes. And here it is justified since it is not covered by the treaty. The discussions about Europe a la carte, it is what one may call [words indistinct] a fortunate expression. These are discussions which pose problems since the treaty of the European Community makes no distinction between the states [words indistinct] to exclude or to put certain states into the second rank. [Word indistinct] economic-political cooperation is not covered by the treaty. So one is free to carry it out with those who want to carry it out."

Page K 10, end of last paragraph insert new paragraph: "[Question] These are criticisms which one hears fairly frequently?

"[Answer] One hears a lot of criticism, first of all because people want to mix internal politics with international politics and African politics, that is, with French interests in Africa. The first affirmation, I will tell you immediately, is quite [words indistinct] for us."

Page K 11, first paragraph, end of penultimate sentence insert: "Incidentally, this not only occurs in Central Africa, but equally in other regions of Africa where France does not exercise its influence. It is not up to us to choose them. What is often difficult is to know whether we should maintain links with them while in fact they are regimes open to criticism, because there are security problems involved or, on the contrary, if we should ignore such security problems. For years central African countries had a long common border with Chad. I remind you that since 1969 Chad has been in a state of political instability. If Chad and Central Africa had fallen into disorder, or had come under other influences, the situation in Africa would be far more serious."

Page K 11, fourth paragraph should read: "[Answer] (? I would like a standard to be guaranteed) [words indistinct]. We deal with different countries and different heads of state, taking their attitudes into consideration. Has Colonel al-Qadhahafi been to Paris? While I am in office? Have you seen him?

"[Question] [words indistinct] Naturally not topical.

"[Answer] It is certainly not topical.

"[Question] And is it an attitude that is shared by the other European countries?

"[Answer] It is up to them to say, but at the present time there is no prospect for a reception that [words indistinct].

"[Question] Well, when one asks [words indistinct] this kind of question, which does not correspond simply to [words indistinct] but when one hears it said that with these interlocutors, who are not always but sometimes, questionable, and in the case of people like Bokassa, much more than questionable, naturally, when one says: Yes, but there are not only relations between head of state and head of state, but also there are personal relations [Giscard interrupts]

"[Answer] Well, this program has a certain standard: We are not going to go into considerations (?of that sort). [word indistinct] no personal relations whatever, no [word indistinct] whatever."

Page K 12, Seventh paragraph, insert between "[Answer]" and first sentence: "Well, Mr Duhamel, why [words indistinct]. We are running out of time. The viewers may still want to watch a film, to follow the debate."

Page K 12, ninth paragraph, first sentence, should read: "[Answer] First of all, [words indistinct] that it has to be said what [words indistinct] no definition in my view in a reserved area. I have never opposed the holding of debates on foreign policy in parliament. Last (?week), incidentally, there was a hearing in the Foreign Affairs Committee with the minister of foreign affairs, specifically on the problem of Chad. And, in fact, he gave me a report [word indistinct] on what was said within the committee and, finally, the policy which was followed didnot raise anycriticisms aimed at modifying it." Pick up second sentence.

Page K 12, tenth paragraph should read: "[Question] Mr President, there is another question which [words indistinct] which we do not (fail to) ask, even if it is outside international relations. When will you say whether you will be a candidate in the presidential elections?"

Page K 12, last paragraph, before last sentence insert: "Previously I think this period of notice was from 20 to 50 days. That is another law. And that was an indication of what was a normal period of notice for informing the French people."

Page K 13, end of first paragraph insert new paragraphs: "[Question] Do you say this because you are an optimist or do you have a counciliatory and reasonable attitude toward history which others do not have?

"[Answer] No, I think [word indistinct] I am aware of the responsibilities. It would be a [word indistinct] not to speak about peace. Will you allow me to finish with that? Well, when I was a child, or an adolescent, I went round the neighboring countries a little bit--then one went to countries like Switzerland or the Scandinavian countries--and I saw that France was behind the times.

"[Word indistinct] our equipment was behind the times, our towns were less healthy than those of certain countries where one could see that the ways of work and life were inferior to those of others, to those of certain other countries. And then I asked myself, I said to myself: Why? And then it was clear. It is that we were comparing ourselves with countries which knew peace while we knew war. Switzerland and the Scandinavian countries knew peace and Canada knew peace. We knew wars and invasions. And I said to myself that for France's progress it is essential to keep France at peace, that it is essential. And that if one wants France to make progress it is necesssary to be at peace. I told you just now that for me peace does not mean complaisance, does not mean resignation. It means peace in security and in dignity. But it is true that I am ready to make, and I will make, a large number of endeavors so that France might know a long period of peace.

"[Announcer] Mr President, I thank you. The program continues on channel 2 and as you said just now, with a movie. Goodnight."

SOCIAL DEMOCRAT SAYS CSSR TRAINING TERRORISTS

LD282120 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 28 Jan 81

[Excerpt] Polemics on terrorism and its international links are at the center of attention of the political parties, especially in connection with the parliamentary debate which is to take place next Tuesday. Here is a report from Montecitorio by Innocenzo Cruciani:

While waiting for the debate to be held in the Chamber of Deputies next Tuesday on the thorny theme of the international links of terrorism, this evening we had an indication from the Social Democrats and it will certainly cause a lot of discussion. The deputy secretary of the Social Democratic Party, Pulleti, writes in tomorrow's UMANITA: We are in a position to state that Czechoslovakia has been given the task of extending military training and sustaining the subversive elements who have been operating in our country since 1968. The Social Democratic exponent considers it absurd that the Italian Communist Party is ignoring these terrorist training camps which are, apparently, in the Czechoslovak localities of Dubodiel and Vysoke Tatry. Pulleti adds: At last we shall hear more about the villas in (Rosbeva) Street and No 28 Korejska Street in Prague, as well as about the Bratislava and Lidice camps.

PARTIES REACT TO HAIG REMARKS ON TERRORISM

[Text] Rome, January 30 (ANSA)--American Secretary of State Alexander Haig's allegations Wednesday that the Soviet trains and equips international subversion have stepped on to the Italian scene as a handle for heating up the polemics over an interview recently granted by head-of-state Sandro Pertini to French television.

In the interview, released during an official visit here by French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, Pertini voiced the conviction that Italy's political terrorists have international ramifications, though a statement from his office later denied that he meant to identify any particular country as being involved.

Picking up Haig's and, indirectly, Pertini's remarks, spokesman for small parties like the Social Democrats, the right-of-center Liberals, and the neofascists of the Italian Social Movement have all levelled their charges against the Soviet Union and its allies.

The Italian Communist Party, too, demanded explanations while its major rival, the Christian Democrats and the small Republican Party both called for a calmer atmosphere.

The present government is a coalition of the Christian Democrats allied with the Socialists, who have also pointed an unmistakable finger towards Eastern Europe, the Social Democrats, and the Republicans.

Interviewed for this morning's edition of the wide-circulation Rome daily, IL MESSAGGERO, Social Democrat Party Pietro Longo demanded an "energetic protest with the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia" for their alleged ties with Italian terrorists.

According to Longo, terrorism forms part of a "design for destabilization" of the West, and Italy above all, in order to "affirm the hegemony and supremacy of communism on all continents".

The Liberal Party's floor-leader in the lower house, Aldo Bozzi, cited Haig's press conference as "pertinent" to the "existence of terrorist centers involved in destabilizing democratic regimes". He urged the government to reveal all it knows and to draw the due consequences.

Neofascist leader Giorgio Almirante argued that Haig had given Italian public opinion the "reply which, unfortunately, so far, the Italian Government, and even the president of the republic, have not had the courage to give".

Interviewed for this morning's edition of the leftist daily, PAESE SERA, Communist Party verteran Pietro Ingrao said the government's conduct had not been justifiable and argued that it should have offered a clarification "at once," without waiting for the Soviet protests over Pertini's apparent accusations.

The Republicans pointed to the exaggerations that are emerging in the ongoing polemic and urged both majority and opposition to observe a "sense of national responsibility".

Christian Democrat spokesman also tried to keep things within bounds [word indistinct] for a "concrete and joint battle" to defeat terrorism, without "closing our eyes" either to eventual non-Italian complicities or the "indigenous" terrain available for subversion.

Apparently scotching the charges against the Eastern bloc, the Czechoslovak Embassy here described Social Democrat allegations that Italian terrorists had been trained on Czechoslovak soil as "totally without foundation".

The statement also protested against the "defamations of the socialist system," the "inventions," and "false accusations" still being made 35 years after the end of World War II.

The Italian Government as such does not seem ready to enter the fray and is concentrating its attention on more concrete aspects of the emergency--the reconstruction of the earthquake zones in southern Italy, the three-year economic plan, and energy.

In this connection, Italian Communist Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer yesterday called on his party to make its "greatest effort in the south" since World War II.

On Socialist-Communist relations, Ingrao, formerly speaker of the lower house, warned Socialists that embittering relations would not help them bring [?a Socialist into the premiership] as they hope.

PCI'S BERLINGUER RECEIVES BRAZILIAN DELEGATION

LD291053 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 23 Jan 81 p 19

[Unattributed report: "Berlinguer Meets With Da Silva"]

[Text] Rome--[PCI Secretary General] Enrico Beringuer has received the Brazilian Labor Party. [PTB] delegation that is visting Italy. PTB Chairman Igancio da Silva, or "Lula," Secretary Iaco Bittar and Directorate member Francisco Wefferts reported on the present situation in their country, where obstacles are emerging to the establisment of a regime of real freedom. The PTC delegation stressed the need for Italy to exert greater efforts to correctly inform people of the real situation in Brazil and to support and develop a real process of democratization.

Enrico Berlinguer expressed the hope that the Brazilian people will succeed in completing the democratization process in the great Latin American country, with the establishment of full autonomy for the trade union organization and of freedoms for all parties and for all other social groups. Assuring the Brazilian comrades that the Italian Communists wish to intensify their relations with all their country's democratic forces on the basis of mutual respect, Enrico Berlinguer also pointed out that PCI observers will ask permission to attend the February trial of "Lula" and other leaders of last year's Sao Paolo metalworkers' strike.

BERLINGUER ADDRESSES PCI ANNIVERSARY RALLY

LD291029 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 26 Jan 81 pp 1-3

["Text" of PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer 25 January speech in Rome: "To Change Italy and To Govern"--first paragraph is L'UNITA introduction]

[Excerpts] The PCI celebrated the 60th anniversary of its foundation at a rally held at Rome's Palasport stadium. Here is the text of the speech delivered there by Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer:

When we point to the fundamental stages in our history, we are certainly not trying to paint a picture of a smooth and uninterrupted process. We all know that this has not been the case and that though our conduct has been bound to a basic continuity it has nevertheless experienced mistakes, delays, turning points, resistance to innovation and even vigorous internal political battles.

One particularly laborious process was the one which has led us for some time to assert and to pursue an internationalist line based on the party's full autonomy and on the quest for free and more extended relations with all the world's progressive forces.

How is all this to be explained? We emerged--and we certainly do not forget this--on the wave of the October Revolution, which for the first time smashed capitalism's world domination, brought about the first creation of a state by the working class and surmounted, through Lenin, social democratic determinism, which saw socialism as the completion of an automatic evolution of capitalism. Furthermore, during fascism and the war--and this is historically understandable--our party, like the other communist parties, maintained with the Soviet Union what was defined as an "iron bond." This gave great strength and confidence to those combating fascism, but it also caused us to pay the price of expressing blanket approval both of what it was possible to know about what was happening in the Soviet Union and of the explanations given for it.

After the war, Togliatti immediately stated clearly that Italy should not do as Russia had done and at the organization conference in Florence early in 1947 he announced that it was by then necessary to follow different paths to socialism and of socialist building, and that in Italy the struggle to transcend capitalism should take place within guaranteed freedoms and observance of the democratic rules.

It is a fact that since 1956 our autonomy of judgement and international conduct has become progresively established to such an extent and is now so evident and so fully acknowledged throughout the world that it is really ridiculous for some of our impertinent Italian critics to persist in demanding from us who knows what further proofs before granting us testimonials for which we feel no need.

The PCI is now presenting itself as candidate to become the driving force behind, and major guarantor of, a new kind of government that will rally the best energies of Italian democracy. We believe that in 60 years of practical struggles and of developing our political and ideological stances we have gained sufficient qualifications to legitimize this candidacy in the eyes of Italy and the entire world.

We have already listed and condemned the unprecedented instances of violations of the law and of bargaining with terrorists, either concealed or effectively endorsed by the government behind an official stance of hypocritical steadfastness.

To justify this capitulation it has been said that in view of the pressure from the PSI and the conflicts that emerged within the majority it was necessary to mediate to save the government! When the security of the institutions is at stake, petty compromises are inadmissible.

The truth is that a deep wound, that will be difficult to heal, has been inflicted on the body of our republic, that the Italian people's democratic and civic awareness has been humilated. Therefore, not only has the country been exposed to an emboldened terrorism which threatens further attacks and blackmails, but a breach has been opened up, thus encouraging adventurist attempts of all kinds, including even another fascism.

In the past few days, mention has again been made of the existence of terrorist centers allegedly dependent on foreign states.

For years we have been demanding that the bases and plausibility of this thesis be investigated in all directions. The fact remains that hitherto, as has been stated by the interparliamentary committee that has heard repeated reports from ministers and secret service chiefs, no conclusive evidence has been gathered.

It seems to us that in such a delicate issue there is an obligation to be clear and precise. If data indicating action or involvement by foreign states in support of Italian terrorism becomes available, we say that all the conclusions from it must be drawn on the political and diplomatic planes, since obviously, if this does prove to be the case, a policy of capitulation would seem even more absurd. If, however, such data do not exist, we consider it inadvisable to make statements that might harm Italy's international relations.

What is shameful and unjustifiable from every aspect is the manipulation for domestic ends of hypotheses that are still unsubstantiated and the unleashing of an out-and-out campaign based on them, like the one being fostered by the PSI and Italian Social Democratic Party leaders, as well as by organs and representatives of the reactionary right--a campaign, moreover, directed against the PCI, and this is incredible.

One is prompted to wonder whether this absurd campaign against the PCI is simply a distraction to divert attention from the capitulations that took place during the D'Urso kidnapping or whether it is aimed at creating a 50's type anticommunist climate. I believe that this is part of it. But if this is so, we are witnessing an attempt to shift the entire Italian situation to the right and to make our country's foreign policy adopt stances very distant from those of the FRG, for instance. Therefore, we urge the party right away to issue a vigorous response to this campaign, with the awareness, among other things, that it lacks any grounds with even a semblance of honesty. But since such a campaign against us conflicts with the aspirations to and hopes of a political development in the direction of democracy and regeneration, we believe that all real democrats must reflect on it.

I would like to ask the PSI comrades a special question. What is the PSI's present political blueprint? We cannot believe that the PSI comrades, who for years have talked about an alternative, could agree to remain a force essentially subordinate to the DC, within its power system, or that they will join the vanguard of the forces waging an anticommunist campaign that will inevitably lead to a swing to the right.

Some people believe that to set things in order our party must lose the characteristics that have made it an individual communist party, an entirely original political group on the Western scene and within the world workers' movement. But we wonder and we ask: Would this be a good thing for Italy? If we did so we would become a mere shadow of ourselves; and what use would such a shadow be to the working class, the workers, the young people, women and the nation?

Do we want to heed those who are urging us to discard our heritage, that we have so laboriously but vigorously built?

On the contrary, our duty is to increase our wealth and to advance.

To advance implies to increase the commitment of each one of us to develop our policy and to regenerate our working methods, our forms of representation and struggle, while always aiming to expand and strengthen our ties with the working masses and the people.

This demands among other things an extension of democratic life within the party. Many examples both in Italy and abroad, even among communist parties, warn us of the damage which the formation of currents does to the effectiveness of the party's struggle, to its unity and even to its truly democratic functioning. But other examples (including Poland) warn us of the dangers and risks of a drying-up of relations with the masses and of the party's democratic life.

MIXED REACTION TO ADOLFO SUAREZ' RESIGNATION

[Text] Developments in Spain over the past few hours have had immediate repercussions in Portugal. The president of the republic has expressed regret that Adolfo Suarex has resigned but has indicated his confidence in Spain's ability to overcome the present crisis.

Joaquim Letria, spokesman for Belem Palace, pointed out last night the friendly and cordial relations which President Ramalho Eanes maintained over the years with the resigning Spanish prime minister. Ramalho Eanes did not comment, however, on the political significance of Suarez' resignation, as this is, in his view, an internal matter which concerns Spain alone, Joaquim Letria added.

At party level, the news from Madrid has particularly upset the Democratic Alliance [AD] in view of the excellent relations between it and the Democratic Center Union [UCD]. Several AD leaders approached by us last night did not conceal the fact that they are watching with concern and expectancy the latest developments in neighboring Spain. In a statement to Spanish national radio, Rui Oliveira, secretary general of the Social Democratic Center Party, said: We are perplexed, sad and concerned. Concerned because we feel that there is a grave political crisis in Spain. But Oliveira, who was to have attended the UCD congress in Palma, added that thanks to Adolfo Suzrez' excellent work, democracy in Spain has been consolidated and is not at risk, and expressed the hope that the present problems will be quickly overcome.

Questioned about possible repercussions of the Spanish crisis in the Democratic Alliance, Rui Oliveira stressed that despite the close relations between the Spanish and Portuguese governments and between the AD and the UCD, the situation in the neighboring country did not affect in any way the present Portuguese parliamentary majority, apart from the deeply felt sadness which it evoked.

PRIME MINISTER SUAREZ ANNOUNCES RESIGNATION

Official Communique Issued

LD291838 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1804 GMT 29 Jan 81

[Text] At 1845, hardly more than 15 minutes ago, the secretary of state for information, [Rosa Posada] handed to newsmen an official communique which reads as follows:

Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez Gonzalez, at the government meeting held at 1700 under his chairmanship at the Moncloa Palace, submitted his irrevocable resignation.

With the resignation of Adolfo Suarez the way is opened to the constitutional procedure indicated in articles 101 and 99 of the constitution. In the case of resignation of the prime minister, the constitution provides for a mechanism involving royal consultation with representatives designated by political groups represented in parliament. Following such consultation, the monarch will propose to the Cortes Generales [parliament] via the president of the Congress of Deputies, a candidate for prime minister, so that he may be granted the prescribed vote of confidence. The outgoing government remains in office until the new government takes office.

Suarez Makes Statement

[Statement by Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez following the 29 January announcement of his resignation from office--recorded]

[Text] Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. There are times in the lives of all men when they assume a special sense of responsibility. I believe I have assumed that responsibility honorably for the nearly 5 years in which I have been prime minister. However, the responsibility which I feel now is, I believe, infinitely greater.

Today I have the responsibility of explaining to you, with the trust and legitimacy with which you invested me as the constitutional prime minister, the reasons why I am submitting irrevocably my resignation as prime minister and my decision to leave the Presidency of the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD].

It is not an easy decision, but there are crossroads both in our personal lives and in the history of nations at which one must ask oneself calmly and objectively if one is being of more service to the community by staying in one's post or resigning.

I have become convinced that today, and in the present circumstances, my departure is of greater benefit to Spain than my continuation as the prime minister.

I am going, therefore, without anybody having asked it of me, disregarding the requests and pressures on me to remain in my post. I go with the conviction that this conduct, however difficult to understand it may appear at first sight, is the conduct which I believe my fatherland is demanding of me at this time.

I am not going because I am tired. I am not going because I have suffered a setback greater than I can cope with. I am not going because of fear of the future. I am going because words no longer seem sufficient and it is necessary to demonstrate with actions what we are and what we want. Nothing is farther from reality than the image of me that has been propagated, of a person clinging to his job.

Every politician must have a vocation for power and the will for continuity and permanence within a framework of principles. But a politician who also aspires to serve the state must know at what moment the price which the people will have to pay for his remaining and continuing is greater than the price always implicit in a change of the person who bears the greatest executive responsibilities in the political life of the nation.

I believe I know that moment. I am convinced that such is the situation in which we now find ourselves. Therefore, my decision is as firm as it is well pondered.

The almost 5 years I have been prime minister have taken a lot out of me. No other person throughout the last 150 years has governed democratically for such a long time. What I have given of myself has served to put together a system of freedoms, a new model of social coexistence and a new model of state. I believe, therefore, that it has been worthwhile. But as frequently happens in history, to carry on with a job in hand requires a change of persons. And I do not want the democratic system of coexistence to become just one more interlude in the history of Spain.

I want my decision to be an act of strict loyalty; of loyalty towards Spain, the free life of which must be the indispensable foundation for overcoming a history filled with traumas and frustrations; of loyalty toward the idea of a political center structured in the form of a cross-class, reformist and progressive party and which has pledged its efforts to the task of eradicating all the injustices which still survive in our country; of loyalty to the crown, to whose cause I have dedicated all my efforts because it is my view that it is only around the crown that the reconciliation of Spaniards and a homeland for all is possible; and of loyalty, if you will permit me, toward what I myself have done.

But, this profound feeling of loyalty now also demands that actions take place which, like that which I am taking, will act as a moral purgative and help to reestablish credibility in individuals and institutions.

Perhaps the ways and means which are often employed to judge people are not the most adequate for a calm coexistence. At no time have I complained of criticism. I have always accepted it calmly, but I think that I now have the moral strength to ask that, in the future, there be no recourse to a pointless all-out rejection or to vitriolic personal attacks, because I think that this prejudices the normal and stable functioning of the democratic institutions.

The public and profound criticism of the actions of government is a necessity, if not an obligation, in a democratic system of government based upon public opinion. But the unreasonably systematic attack, the permanent rejection of individuals and of any kind of solution which is trying to tackle the problems of the country, are not, in my opinion, a legitimate weapon because they can disorientate the very public opinion upon which the democratic system of coexistence itself is based.

I would like to convey to you, ladies and gentlemen, my feeling that there continue to exist many reasons for maintaining one's faith and trusting in ourselves as Spaniards. I say this with the fervent faith and trust in ourselves as Spaniards. I say this with the fervent desire of one who wishes to conserve the strength necessary to fortify in all your hearts the idea of the unity of Spain, the will to strengthen the democratic institutions and the need to accord greater respect to persons and to the legitimacy of public authority.

For my own part, I promise you that as a deputy and as a member of my party I shall continue to give body and soul to the defense and the spreading ever more widely of the ethical undertaking and the moral rearmament which Spanish society needs. We can all serve this end through our work and through confidence in the fact that if we all wish it then nobody will be able to divert us from the goals which as a free and developed nation we have set for ourselves.

It is possible to do without a particular person. But we cannot do without the effort which we have to make, all together, in order to build a Spain which belongs to all and is for all. Therefore, I can permit myself no complaints or gestures of bitterness. We must sustain ourselves with hope in the conviction that, though circumstances will remain difficult for some time, nevertheless there is the certainty that if we do not lose heart we shall continue forward.

I think that something very important has to change in our attitudes and behavior, and with my resignation I want to contribute to making this change truly possible and immediate. We must do everything necessary to restore trust, to put a stop to discontent and disenchantment. To do this is necessary to call upon the nation for a great effort. It is necessary for the Spanish people to assemble around the ideas, the institutions and the people who have been democratically promoted to the management of public affairs.

The necessary means exist to solve principal problems of Spain today. In the UCD there are men who are capable of continuing the tasks of government with efficiency, professionalism and a sense of state. And in order to tackle this change with the utmost calmness I hope that you will support them and renew your trust in them so that they will have the time necessary to finish the task embarked upon.

For Spain and for each and every one of you and your families I desire a future of peace and well-being. This has been the only motivation behind my political activities and it will continue to be the fundamental reason for my life.

I offer my thanks for your sacrifices, for your collaboration and for the repeated proofs of trust which you have shown in me. I should like to respond to these things with total devotion to my work and with dedication, selflessness and generosity of spirit. I promise you that wherever I may be I shall continue to share your aspirations. I shall be always at your side and I shall try to the utmost of my ability to adhere to this course and to maintain this same working spirit.

Many thanks to you all for everything.

[Text] We have a news flash: Leopoldo Calvo Sotelo will be the name which the UCD will submit to his majesty the king as the UCD's candidate for prime minister, according to an agreement reached by the UCD Executive Committee meeting at Moncloa Palace. This report from EFE is unconfirmed.

According to EFE, the agreement was reached a few minutes ago. No vote was taken, and the agreement was reached after consideration of the alternatives.

Leopoldo Calvo Sotelo was proposed at the beginning of the meeting as candidate for the position held heretofore by Adolfo Suarez, the prime minister and chairman of the party.

Military Role Denied

LD292140 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2112 GMT 29 Jan 81

[Text] Lieutenant General (Monzon), chief of the Ministry of Defense Information Office, has officially denied rumors which have been maliciously circulated to the effect that pressure from the military played a part in the resignation of Adolfo Suarez as prime minister. This is completely untrue, he said. There is not the slightest truth in it.

PCE Leader Comments

LD292210 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 29 Jan 81

[Interview with Santiago Carrillo, secretary general of the Spanish Communist Party, by unidentified radio correspondent, at the party's headquarters following the resignation of Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez--live]

[Text] [Question] Did Mr Suarez telephone you about his resignation as prime minister or did you learn of it from the media?

[Answer] Both actually. Mr Suarez was generous enough to telephone me to tell me about the reasons for his resignation, for which I thanked him, and I also learned of it from the media.

[Question] Mr Carrillo, what is your opinion about the prime minister's resignation?

[Answer] I think that this resignation is overdue, and I think that it was inevitable and should have taken place earlier. The problem is not whether Suarez personally is discredited--he is discredited--the problem is that the UCD is discredited and a policy is discredited--a monochrome, rightwing policy in the service of the social and economic interests of the right, which Suarez has conducted in this country, and he conducted this policy with the government of the UCD. Consequently, the change cannot be restricted to the exit of Suarez from the post of prime minister. The change will have to be a fundamental one in governmental policy and in the makeup of the government, because only a government with a wide parliamentary base, possessing widespread social support in the country and in which the left is represented, only this kind of government can recover the confidence which Spaniards have lost in the UCD and, to some extent, even in the democratic institutions themselves.

[Question] Mr Carrillo, do you think there should be early elections?

[Answer] No. I think it would be foolish to hold early elections. I do not think this is the solution at the present time. The solution lies with the parliament we have and with the political forces we have, which must form another government: a government of progress, which should be something quite different to that which has governed up to now. But, till now, the UCD has governed and it will carry on in government because it has a majority of seats. If the UCD continues to govern as it has done to date then I do not see any possibility for hope or confidence in this country.

[Question] Mr Carrillo, have you had any talks with any other political groups after hearing of the resignation?

[Answer] I spoke on the telephone with Alfonso Guerra [Spanish Socialist Workers' Party] and we exchanged news and agreed that over the next few days we will keep in touch to follow events.

PSOE Demands Explanation

LD292358 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 29 Jan 81

[Text] The federal Executive Committee of the main opposition party, the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE], met this evening and issued a communique which says that the functioning of the democratic institutions and the constitutional mechanisms guarantee political stability in the country.

The PSOE calls for a satisfactory explanation of the [prime minister's] resignation to be made to parliament and to the people of the country, since the official explanation does not provide any reasons beyond that of internal confrontations within the UCD and the rightwing of Spanish politics.

The PSOE also expresses its intention to oppose any tendency for the crisis created by Prime Minister Suarez's resignation to bring about a swing in government policy towards more reactionary positions either in the economic and social field or in the matter of individual and collective freedoms.

Gonzalez Comments

LD300044 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 29 Jan 81

[Text] Felipe Gonzalez, PSOE secretary general and leader of the largest opposition party, found out about Prime Minister Suarez's resignation in Paris on his way home from Strasbourg where he had taken part in the sessions of the Council of Europe. On his arrival at Madrid's Barajas Airport, less than 2 hours ago, he expressed his respect for the prime minister's decision to resign and also referred to the fact that this resignation is a logical consequence of the deterioration in the political situation.

[Begin Gonzalez recording] I think that in a democracy we have to try to play down events. The resignation of a prime minister is a normal political occurrence in any kind of democracy when he realizes or understands that he is not capable of carrying out the task of government or when he understands that there is a sufficiently grave crisis within the section of the chamber which supports him for him not to be able to continue to govern calmly. I therefore think that it is appropriate not to dramatize the resignation but to view it with the utmost calm. [end recording]

THATCHER URGES CLOSER U.S.-EUROPEAN COORDINATION

[By Andy Webb, PA political staff]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher called tonight for closer coordination between Europe and America on foreign policy following the confused response by the allies to the Russian invasion of Afghanistan.

She said that the NATO alliance must be strengthened, and reassured President Reagan that Britain's close ties with the EEC did not threaten links with America.

She told the Pilgrims' dinner at the Savoy Hotel in London that both the U.S. and Europe had to ensure that arrangements across the Atlantic for coordinatiing policy and decisions were kept "in perfect working order."

"They did not work well when Afghanistan was invaded, and we must heed that lesson--especially at a time when we are continuing to watch events in and around Poland with anxiety."

Mrs Thatcher was speaking a month before she goes to America as the first European leader to visit the new President.

She said the Atlantic alliance must remain purposeful and resolute.

"Of course we remain ready to respond to evidence of a real Soviet interest in genuine detente. At present I see none.

"Meanwhile we must maintain our strength. President Reagan and his administration have understood the challenge and the need for leadership.

"They are responding. We in Europe must also show that we understand the challenge and the need to meet it."

Mrs. Thatcher said Europe must offer a greater recognition of the extent to which the U.S. maintained our freedom, and we had to ensure we were doing all we could to contribute to our own defence.

Britain's membership of the EEC could not, and would not, lessen the friendship forged with the U.S.

"To assert that there is any conflict between the two is to misunderstand America's links with Europe.

"A stronger, more self-confident Europe pursuing more coherent policies will produce a greater area of stability for democracy."

Mrs Thatcher added: "I have always considered myself to be a Pilgrim. I have visited America many times.

"And above all my own political convictions are founded in that love of freedom, but rejection of tyranny and oppression, which inspired the Pilgrim fathers and those who followed them to America."

USSR AGREES TO RESUMPTION OF TRADE TALKS WITH UK

[Nigel Wade dispatch: "Trade Talks"]

[Text] Moscow--The Soviet Union has accepted Britain's offer to resume discussions of the bilateral commission on economic and trade matters in London in May. The focus will be on openings for British firms in Russia's development of oil and gas.

There was no meeting of the ministerial-level commission last year, following Russia's invasion of Afghanistan.

MOZAMBIQUE'S CHISSANO MEETS CARRINGTON, THATCHER

LD281225 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 28 Jan 81 p 6

[David Adamson report: "Sanctions Against South Africa 'Not Ruled Out'"]

[Text] Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, did not exclude the possibility that, in certain circumstances, Britain might support sanctions against South Africa.

The issue came up on two consecutive days of talks with Mr Joaquim Chissano, Mozambique's foreign minister. It was discussed again yesterday when the minister from Maputo met Mrs Thatcher.

The Foreign Office talks appear to have been mainly concerned with South-West Africa (Namibia) in the wake of the collapse of the Geneva conference earlier this month.

Britain, like other Western nations involved in attempts at mediation, is waiting to see what position is adopted by the Reagan administration.

In the meantime, it is clear that there has been a slight but significant change in the British attitude to sanctions against South Africa if Pretoria continues to thwart implementation of the United Nations' plan for Namibia.

It continues to be the view that sanctions are counter-productive and harmful to British interests, but they are no longer considered absolutely unacceptable.

The cautious formulation that has been devised is that it is impossible to forecast what position Britain will adopt if the issue comes before the Security Council.

That indicates that Britain would not be prepared to act on its own in using its veto to defeat a sanctions measure.

The matter is one of major significance to the British economy. South Africa is an important trading partner and British investments there are valued at between 5,000 million and 6,000 million pounds.

KIPRIANOU GREETS ALGERIAN PRESIDENT ON STOPOVER

NC291543 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 29 Jan 81

[Text] Algerian President Chadli Bendjedid made a brief stopover at Larnana airport on his way from At-Ta'if in Saudi Arabic, where he attended the Islamic Conference summit Meeting. The president was accompanied by Algerian Foreign Minister Ben Yahia.

Welcoming Bendjedid, President Kiprianou expressed the Cypriot people's gratitude for Algeria's attitude on the national issue of Cyprus and added that this attitude was well known, as was Cyprus' attitude toward the Arab cause. The president said that Algeria, being a member of the nonaligned contact team, played a leading role in making various decisions at the United Nations in favor of Cyprus. President Kiprianou also lauded trade relations between Cyprus and Algeria and political relations within the nonaligned framework, adding: For our part, we will do everything possible to further develop these relations.

In a statement, the Algerian president stressed that Algeria's position on the Cypriot problem had always been clear. He reiterated Algeria's support for a fair solution of the problem and for the Cypriot people's unity. President Bendjedid extolled Algerian-Cypriot relations, expressing the hope that they would be further strenghtened and that he would exchange visits of longer duration in the future.

GOVERNMENT DENIES AIRLINK WITH LEBANESE ENCLAVE

NC300828 Nicosia THE CYPRUS WEEKLY in English 30 Jan-5 Feb 81 p 1

[Text] The Cyprus Government has denied agreeing to the establishemtn of an air-link between Larpaca and the southern Lebanese enclave controlled by the Israeli-backed renegade army major, Sa'd Haddad.

Reliable sources in Nicosia said the government is to issue an official announcement today stating that Cyprus will not recognise any other airport in Lebanon except the state-controlled one at Beirut.

Major Haddad issued a statement earlier in the week saying he has built an airport in the area controlled by his Christian militiamen next to the Israeli border, and that this would be used for linking his enclave with Larnaca.

The sources said Cyprus refuses to recognise any unofficial airport, just as it expects other states to refuse to recognise the Tymbou airport operation in contravention of international air transport regulations in the Turkish-occupied part of Cyprus.

PAPERS ATTACK DEVELOPMENTS IN U.S. BASES TALKS

AVRIANI Editorial

NC291632 Athens AVRIANI in Greek 29 Jan 81 p 1

[Editorial: "Off With the Masks"]

[Text] The paid press that follows the government's instructions and deceives the people is saying that Rallis is going to do some hard bargaining with the Americans about the bases. This is mere play-acting. The government will oppose the agreement on the bases as much as it opposed our unconditional return to NATO.

The Rallis government has no backbone for standing up to America. Foreign policy to New Democracy means pilgrimage. The entire affair of discussions about the bases is just one more way of shining McCloskey's boots. If Rallis is really bargaining, let him tell the Greek people what we are asking from the Americans and what they are giving us. But what can he say? New Democracy never asks for anything from the foreigners; it only gives them precious bits of our national dignity.

But to whom does national dignity belong that Rallis makes a gift of it so easily? To his quisling father, the one who sold it to the German conquerors? So let Rallis and his company put aside their tricks. Let him stop his bragging about nonexistent bargaining and listen to the voice of the people. Off with the masks.

RIZOSPASTIS Article

[Text] The Government, after the U.S.' categorical refusal to inform it of the contents of the secret protocols in the U.S.-Turkish "defense" agreement, is now limiting its negotiating targets to extracting U.S. "guarantees" in the form of mere "oral assurances" that the bases in Turkey will not be used against our country. Both delegations met yesterday for the second time and went ahead with an examination of specific aspects of the draft of the new agreement. In any case, the ground has been prepared for a quick completion of the talks--and to a degree that justifies the assessment of authoritative sources that the bases "no longer form an issue!"

Verified reports say in this connection that, after the Americans refused, the government even abandoned its demand to be briefed on the contents of the secret protocols in the U.S.-Turkish agreement. Its objectives are limited to extracting an "oral assurance" from the United States that the "balance of power" in the Aegean will not be disturbed, as well as "guarantees" that the U.S. bases in Turkey are not aimed against Greece. However, it is doubtful whether even these very few demands of the government will be met. In any case, the very object of the demands for which it is negotiating is practical recognition that: The system of U.S. bases in both countries--Greece and Turkey--not only does not serve their true national interests but constitutes a "forceful" source of tension and unrest, with Washington in its well-known role of umpire...

It is equally characteristic that, despite official declarations from government figures concerning the alleged "defensive" nature of the U.S. military installations, it is now being admitted that: Their presence is aimed at spying on Soviet territory. It is precisely for this reason that the official Greek side "understands" fully that the establishment of so-called "national control" over the bases is both unfeasible and superfluous... Yet it insists on its well-known demagogic literature seeking to create confusion and disorient at least a section of Greek opinion.

PRIME MINISTER ULUSU DESCRIBES ISLAMIC SUMMIT

[Statement by Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu on his return from the Islamic Conference summit held in At-Ta'if to Ankara's Esenboga Airport on 29 January 1981--recorded]

[Text] The fact that the third Islamic Conference summit was held at a time when negative developments in the world--and particularly in our region--threaten peace, security and stability and cause concern, has intensified to a great degree the interest evoked by this meeting. The presence of more than 1,000 foreign correspondents in At-Ta'if is another example of this interest.

On the other hand, the fact that the summit was held at the turn of the 15th century of the Hegira and was held in Mecca is very significant and has been an occasion for the expression of common moral values by countries participating in the meeting which belong to one and the same religion. It is in this spirit that the Mecca declaration which stipulates loyalty to certain important principles, which stresses unity and solidarity among Islamic countries and which has been written in the form of an appeal to the whole world has been prepared.

Along with the Palestinian problem and the Jerusalem issue, the declaration states that the security of the Gulf area is the concern of the Gulf countries and expresses concern over Afghanistan.

An issue which preoccupied the summit from its first day was to provide for the participation of Iran in the meeting and to prepare the grounds for conciliation between Iran and Iraq.

Promoting economic cooperation among the member countries of the Conference in a bid to raise it to a higher level was an important subject discussed at the meetings in At-Ta'if. The economic action plan--in whose preparation Turkey played a part--adopted at a meeting held in Ankara last year on the issue of economic cooperation among Islamic countries was received with approval. The implementation of this plan will provde great benefits for the exploitation in the possible way of resources existing among Islamic countries, and will serve the interest of member countries in the field of collective self-sufficiency. We are pleased with the fact that political solidarity among the Islamic countries is being progressively extended to the economic field as well. We consider this development imperative for the continuity and productivity of common efforts among Islamic countries.

Important resolutions were also made during the summit for increasing solidarity among the Islamic countries in the cultural field. These resolutions include increasing the Islamic solidarity fund and waqf fund, supporting the opening of Islamic centers and universities in certain African countries, enlarging the Islamic science and technology fund, founding an Islamic education, science and culture organization and exerting efforts for the continuation of the Islamic sports games.

Turkey desires the solution of differences and the prevalance of common ties, common values and aims as well as the establishment of strong cooperation among Islamic countries based on mutual interests, so that the Conference will not be confined to its member countries but will be transormed into an orgaization--whose existence and effectiveness on the international scene will be strongly felt--which in turn will make an important contribution to the cause of world peace and stability.

TCP GENERAL SECRETARY BILEN ON NATIONAL PROBLEMS

TA291329 (Clandestine) Voice of the Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 29 Jan 81

[Speech by the Turkish Communist Party Central Committee general secretary, Comrade Bilen, on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of the assassination of the 15 founding members of the party, date and place not given--recorded]

[Excerpts] Comrades, 5 months ago the Turkish working class for the first time celebrated on a national scale a (?turning point) that is the symbol of a brand new era in its history. The occasion was the 60th anniversary of the establishment of the Turkish Communist Party [TCP], our party. Now, 5 months later, we are commemorating the death anniversary of the founding members of the TCP, Mustafa Suphi and his colleagues, under a military dictatorship. The fact that all party organizations are engaged in a struggle against imperialism and domestic reaction demonstrates a very significant point. The reactionary bourgeoisie, which brutally destroyed the founding cadres of the party, has failed to attain its goal. The TCP is alive and struggling. It is impossible to destroy the TCP even under a military dictatorship, because it is impossible to eliminate the proletariat. The party of Mustafa Suphi and his colleagues has been created by the proletariat and is equipped with Marxist-Leninist weapons.

Let us recall the mass demonstrations attended by hundreds of thousands of workers and toilers in the last years and let us recall one of the slogans chanted in these demonstrations: "The 15 founding members started it, and hundreds of thousands are keeping it alive."

Comrades, the revolutionary principles that were the foundation of the program of the party founded by Suphi and his colleagues are still valid and alive. These principles light the struggle path of the working class. The TCP is the frontline of this struggle. No doubt, the world balance of powers and the economic, political and social conditions in our country have undergone basic changes since the foundation of the party. Our people will rescue themselves from dependence on imperialism, the claws of the monopolies and the deep crises through a progressive democratic regime leading to socialism. It is impossible to solve the grave problems facing Turkey without putting an end to dependence on imperialism, withdrawing from NATO, abolishing bilateral agreements, purging our soil of the imperialist bases, eliminating the sovereignty of monopolies, implementing a democratic land reform, securing the democratic and social rights of the working class and the toilers, and solving the national Kurdish problem on the basis of the princple of autonomy. The policy of conflict pursued by the most aggressive sector of imperialism against the socialist countries (?links) problems of peace and detente with the current requests of our people. Our region is one of tension. U.S. imperialism is sending military reinforcements to the region and is trying to expand its military bases of aggression in the region. It is trying to form military blocs with the participation of reactionary regimes. Under the circumstances the question of either peace or war carries a [word indistinct] importance for our people.

What is the foreign policy pursued by the junta? Through statements made and steps taken the junta government has expressed willingness to continue relations with the Soviet Union and the socialist countries. Regarding various international problems, the junta government seems to have adopted a stand [words indistinct] from that adopted by the most aggressive imperialist forces. However, on the whole, the junta is pursuing a pro-American and pro-NATO foreign policy. This policy fully contradicts our national interests and endangers our national security.

The foreign and domestic policy of the junta are interlinked. Prior to 12 September, the fascist NAP and terrorist organization had directed their bloody attacks against the large democratic forces and the TCP. These attacks were, at the time, taking place before the eyes of the government and the martial law commanders. The people and the large toiling masses were resisting this situation. The junta seized power at such a moment. Since then, various administrators of the fascist NAP have been arrested. However, the junta is directing its attacks more and more against the working class and the progressive forces. Fascist NAP supporters are maintaining their positions within the state mechanism. The martial law commanders of many provinces are releasing fascist murderers. On the other hand, trade union administrators and militants are being arrested. They are being tortured and some are even being killed.

The junta is trying to portray a so-called impartial image that is above the class structure. The junta is, on the one hand, deferring to countries that wish to make Turkey their market and, on the other, is implementing--through the force of bayonets--the 24 January 1980 program and the new [word indistinct] plans of the IMF, which has long considered Turkey its market. Turgut Ozal, the staunch defender of imperialist circles and the collaborationist monopolist bourgoisie, is shaping the economy. The burden of the economic crisis is being placed on the shoulders of the toiling masses through new tax laws, price hikes, the freezing of wages, the ban on strikes and the elimination of all union activities.

The generals have come to power claiming that they will restore democracy, but they have abolished all democratic freedoms. They are talking about establishing a constituent assembly. However, this will not be a democratic constituent assembly freely elected by the people. The junta is talking about a new constitution. However, the junta does not want a really democratic constitution. It is attacking those articles of the 1961 constitution that have some democratic content. It is purging various cadres that support the reactionary (?JP). Soldiers loyal to the junta are being appointed to replace those purged. The junta is violating the democratic rights of tens of thousands of patriotic civil servants. The generals state that they will not leave the administration to the bourgeois parties and the politicians, who have brought the country to the brink of destruction. However, they are crushing the real supporters of democracy and their organizations.

The junta claims to be Ataturkist. It says that the only ideology of the present regime is Ataturkism and states that there will never be a place for another ideology. It would be wrong to consider the general's claim of Ataturkism as the Ataturkism of the reactionary forces or to consider it mere demagogy. Their Ataturkism is a kind of Ataturkism that is dependent on NATO and imperialism, which has been altered to fit the present inconsistencies and crises of capitalism and which has been left devoid of its anti-imperialist content.

Comrades, the conclusion to be drawn from all these signs is that the basic lines of the junta's policies are pro-imperialist and promonopolist.

However, some of the steps of the junta has taken do not totally reflect the interests of the most aggressive sectors of imperialism or of the most reactionary circles of the collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie. This is why these circles are trying to pull the regime toward their own aims, to drag it further to the right by means of elements closely attached to them within the army and the junta. The conflicts within the (?army) are already reflected in the junta's policies.

However, these conflicts cannot yield, on their own, results that will benefit the working class, the people or democracy. The inner conflicts of the ruling classes do yield opportunities that can be used in the anti-imperialist and democratic struggle of the working class and the people. In this situation it is the duty of the party to organize the masses and the millions of workers, and to direct them toward the struggle.

The bourgeois press is exaggerating the temporary reactions of the masses against the antiterrorist measures. However, the dissatisfaction in the villages and cities has started to turn into action in places. Workers are staging strikes within factories for their economic and social rights. The villagers of Atalan staged a march. The people have disclosed the names of the fascists and the torturers in (?Eregli). Solidarity campaigns are being organized with prisoners and their families. Youths protested the fascist NAP and the junta's oppression on the anniversary of the Kahramanmaras massacre. There are reactions to the campaign of collecting by force donations for armament. Certain patriots, both inside and outside the army, are supporting the junta's [words indistinct]. In this situation, it is necessary to direct the youth to a (?consistent) democratic struggle and to an alliance with the working class, to (?isolate) the most reactionary, militarist and fascist circles within the army and the junta as well as their political supporters outside the army.

The actions of the terrorist and adventurist groups do great damage to the working class' struggle now as they did prior to the 12 September coup. The adventurist policies once again have failed bitterly.

It is necessary to draw the necessary lessons from these facts. This is urgent because young people affiliated with such groups are being barbarously eliminated since these groups are no longer of any use to the ruling classes. The democratic forces must not remain silent in the face of this. The communists will do whatever is necessary to save the honest and young revolutionaries from the bloody quagmire they entered. To unite the widest democratic forces it is necessary, as a first step, to establish unity [as heard]. It is essential to start from the gains made before 12 September and to draw the necessary lessons from the mutual mistakes. Had the leftist forces, the TCP, the Turkish Labor Party, the Turkish Socialist Workers Party, the Kurdish democratic and revolutionary forces been able to establish a united of struggle and action, they could have brought about a democratic alternative that could have prevented the military coup.

Now it is necessary to put aside the [word indistinct], dry and scholastic arguments over the character of the junta. It is necessary to start on action on the basis of the masses' concrete demands [words indistinct].

Comrades, there are urgent problems facing our people today. The economic crisis and the ruling circles' proimperialist and promonopolist policies are dragging the country toward national collapse. U.S. imperialism and NATO's ruling classes have intensified their pressure on Turkey in order to use it as a tool in their own adventurist and aggressive policies. All the democratic forces are faced with the danger that the military dictatorship can become permanent and that the supporters of fascism can become stronger.

To stop this course of events, to adopt an independent and [word indistinct] foreign policy, to move toward democracy, to create a powerful popular movement with struggles waged for the concrete demands of the people, to unite the anti-imperialist and democratic forces in one front--these are the current duties.

The junta regime can be ended only through the struggle of the people, of all the democratic forces. In the struggles for current demands, the TCP must explain and show to the masses that democracy cannot be established and that none of our people's problems can be solved as long as the junta is in power.

Comrades, our party cadres are working and struggling under extraordinarily difficult and complicated conditions. In the dungeons and under torture, the Communists are examples of revolutionary heroism. They are examples and sources of support for all the other progressive forces. Our party organizations are overcoming the organizational obstacles created by the military coup. They are adapting themselves to the new conditons. They are organizing the rising reactions of the masses. They are in the foremost ranks of the strikes and resistance actions. The TCP is standing erect and strong. Our cadres and the toiling masses have not lost the gains of their struggles and difficult experiences.

There is another point: The stronger our ties with the masses, the better can we protect our party organizations against attacks. Therefore, Communists must strengthen their ties with the masses. The factories must always be our party's fortresses.

SCHMIDT WELCOMES CONSULTATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

LD011418 Hamburg DPA in German 1336 GMT 1 Feb 81

[Text] Bonn, 1 Feb (DPA)--According to Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, the Federal Government intends to intensify significantly consultations with the new American Government in the coming months. The chancellor said at the annual reception of the Association of German Industry in Cologne that it is quite obvious that the new American Government under President Ronald Reagan is keen on close consultation and cooperation with the governments of its European allies. The Federal Government is glad of this and will make use of the offer.

In his address, given on Friday evening and published by the Federal Press Office on Sunday, Schmidt emphasized that it will be necessary to correct again and again a few wrong concepts entertained by America, such as volume, significance and motivation of the German eastern trade. Also a number of other national German interests will have to be explained repeatedly to each new American Government.

Schmidt said further that everybody ought to rejoice over the vitality with which the American nation presently is getting up and striving ahead. He, Schmidt, is among those who always trusted in the American nation's vitality and who always emphasized just how much the Atlantic alliance heeds American leadership, even if that was uncomfortable for the Americans themselves.

Concerning the economic situation, the chancellor said that he believes conditions for a new upswing in the Federal Republic are more favorable than during the recession in 1974/75. Once again, the chancellor rejected new general economic programs. The economic difficulties presently encountered in Europe are due to structural problems which have to be solved rather than economic ones. Regarding structures, the Federal Republic is in a happier position than some other European industrial states "since we are further ahead as regards modernization."

SCHMIDT ADDRESSES BUNDESTAG BUDGET DEBATE

DW300941 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0801 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Speech by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, addressing the Bundestag Budget debate in Bonn--live]

[Excerpts] Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, in view of such a mass debate where 100 issues are being touched on, I do not intend to talk extensively, but at the end of the debate, I want to make some complementing remarks on the answers of speakers of the Free Domocratic faction, the Social Democratic faction and the ministers of the Federal Government to questions and criticism of the opposition.

First a few foreign political remarks. The Bundestag has expressed its happiness over the Tehran hostage problem being solved. It means for all of us that we have gotten rid of one of the foreign political problems which has worried us for the last 15 months. But one must not lose signt of the fact that many other dangerous conflicts continue to threaten the peace of the world. That applies to the lasting war in the Gulf of Persia or the Arab Gulf, as one also calls it, the war between Iran and Iraq. It pertains to Afghanistan where the Soviet military intervention and the fighting continue. It pertains again, this time at another point, to Africa with the military occupation of Chad, which makes many others feel seriously threatened. It pertains to the fact that the Middle East conflict still continues. And it pertains particularly to our neighborhood inasfar as the Polish experiment as before contains very high risks. The success of the Polish experiment lies no doubt in the interest of the Poles, particularly the workers in Poland. I think that the success of the Polish experiment will serve the interests of all people in what they call the socialist camp of the communist states of East Europe. I add, however, that the success, the peaceful success of the Polish experiment lies in the interest of all people in Europe. [applause]

Without wanting to extend this summary too much, I must say that we will not at all face a calm international situation in 1981, on the contrary. Some countries have been particularly highlighted in this debate, among them Saudi Arabia. I want to say a word about this friendly state. First of all, however, I want to stress that we have good relations--we need them--good political and economic relations with other states of the region of the world. I name Israel, I name Egypt, I name Jordan and I could name others. We are involved in the Middle East initiative of the European Community. We are involved in exploratory talks with the mentioned states and other states of the region. We are involved with initiative, in the European-Arab dialogue because we have a great interest in a lasting and just peace in that region. I say it very clearly that we have a distinct interest with regard to our political and economic interests.

But now a word about Saudi Arabia because I want to contribute to preventing this country from being completely, without any fault, involved in publicistic and domestic political quarrel here in the Federal Republic of Germany. [applause, interjection]

I do not want to become polemical at the moment, but I want to point out to you, Deputy Kohl, that bishops of both churches, for example, have made public statements in a way that it seems desirable for me to make it clear to everybody, speaking here on behalf of the government, that in the past years and decades a most important political and economic partnership has developed with Saudi Arabia.

Saudi Arabia is a stabilization factor of first-rate importance on the Arab peninsula, in the region as well as in the overall context of the Middle East conflict. One can very well see that this stability is also exposed to dangers. One must know that Saudi Arabia is the most important oil supplier of the whole world. In 1980, it supplied one quarter of the crude oil we obtained. One ought to know that 40 percent of it will be supplied in the near future to the Federal Republic on the basis of direct contracts with the Federal Government. One knows that the moderate price policy of Saudi Arabia, which has a moderating effect, is of particular advantage for us because of its great share in our oil supply.

One must know that with the investment of the surplus achieved there, the investment of so-called petrodollars, Saudi Arabia makes a great contribution to the financing of the foreign trade balance deficits of the whole world, including ours. In other words, this country with relatively few people is becoming the greatest creditor of Europe and of the developing world.

And it so happens, in a favorable way, that great interest prevails there in comprehensive economic and political cooperation with us Europeans in general and with us Germans in particular. In the view of the Saudis, this cooperation should not just have a commercial basis. They rather are thinking in political categories as well and that includes categories of security policy.

Great Britain and France have traditional relations with that country and also have reacted in a positive way to some security-policy expectations. Now their eyes rest upon us as well. But by the same token, within the framework of contemplations among the Western alliance partners concerning the stabilization of the region of the Persian Gulf after the invasion of Afghanistan, we have long seen, or been made to see, the point where we have to or had to ponder the question--decided in the meantime--whether we would dispatch soldiers and warships to the Persian Gulf. We have made a decision on the matter, this decision having been negative. We cannot do that.

Is the result of it the answer that we cannot do anything at all? Does the question not arise anyway that we could and should make our contribution in some other way toward the stability of that region? Naturally, a potential contribution on our part toward the stability in the region of the Arab and Persian Gulf can be made only within the framework of a joint Western concept. But if we talk about it with our Western allies and with our friends in the Middle East, the latter also will include in the topic of the talks the elements of deliveries of military equipment.

In this context, it is absolutely clear that the outstanding problem then will be the interests of Israel. I understand perfectly well that some people already have been alarmed and others even enraged in Israel by the initial mention of the possibility of such future developments in some newspapers of the world--that did not start here in Bonn or in the Federal Republic. Various motives, memories and motives, are blending here which need not to be broached here in particular as all of us have this in our feelings, not to say in our hearts.

What might become necessary is a deepening, trustful diplomatic dialogue with our friends, with our partners, in that part of the world, including Israel, including Egypt. This will be necessary and in doing it, we must not and will not be put under time pressure. So far, there has not been any pressure in that direction nor any application, as you are aware.

This leads each one of us to the question about the principles for the export of arms and equipment which have been valid for over a decade, or rather roughly 1 decade. I was one of those who, in the late sixties and the early seventies, very much and successfully urged a highly restrictive phrasing of the so-called principles. The restrictions, the restraint, the damping of all possible activities in exports brought about by these principles go far beyond the text of the laws that have long been in effect. The degree of restriction is much greater and it must remain so also in the future. Nevertheless, it seems to me that it is necessary--and I shall cite a few examples--to review the experiences which have been gathered in the past 20 years in this field, approximately since the beginning of the sixties since earlier any such exports were out of the question in our case because we simply did not have anything to export. Possibly the principles must be complemented, improved or newly defined. The Federal Government in this respect intends to cooperate closely with the Bundestag or its organs and it is alright if it takes some time.

But even now, I may be allowed to say that I would like to ask everybody to conduct the public debate on this and all concomitant topics in a way which will prevent our relations with other states from being harmed. [applause, commotion] and at the moment, I particularly mean this: Please no harm to the relationship with Israel, please no harm to the relationship with Saudi Arabia or with any other state.

Some suggestions concerning experiences gathered in the meantime and needing to be examined: I will make them do without any particular system as I do not have at the moment any general survey of the field since the Federal Republic, after all, is just beginning to initiate this inventory. One of the points possibly needing to be newly reviewed, for example, is this: There cannot be any concept of tension that will be established for times eternal; the concept, yes, but not its content. The world is changing quite rapidly. Obviously, many people feel quite strongly that Chile, for example, expresses, contains or causes tensions in a different way than they are meant by the concept of tension as defined by the principles. In a different way, this means that that concept of tension does not fit here. This is one of the experiences we come up against.

Secondly, in the course of the past decade, in the seventies, international cooperation has developed on a large scale with France but also jointly with Italy and England and, perhaps and hopefully in the near future also with the United States of America to a greater extent, in the development and, later, also in the production and procurement of airplanes or armored vehicles, or ships, pieces of equipment, arms, vehicles for our armed forces. It is for manifold reasons that the Federal Republic of Germany shares in such a cooperation within NATO framework. But then it becomes difficult. What I have in mind is an airplane like the Alpha jet, to cite but one example, or earlier the Starfighter 104-G. But then it becomes difficult indeed to try and prescribe our principles to the other partners having a share with us in a joint construction project, very difficult indeed. We have gathered quite a few experiences with such difficulties in the meantime. And it is necessary to take a systematic look at them for a change. And this kind of experience will have to be taken into account in phrasing new criteria.

Then it will not be up to us alone to make the decision. That is to say, an increasing extent, the decision on things we produce in this field will cease to be our's alone.

A third point which definitely will remain unchanged and which motivated me personally when I advocated these retrictive principles in the late sixties and late in my capacity as defense minister is this: We do not wish any arms-exports policy for reasons of employment. [applause] Arms production must not become an instrument of our economic development policy. We do not wish capacities to emerge in our country--this we did not wish at the time just as we are not allowed to desire this for the future--which later, and we see this in some neighbor states where large capacities exist, say, in the aircraft industry, in the industry of warship production, turn the pressure of inadequate utilization or nonutilization of such capacities into a nightmare for parliament, the government or the body adopting budget legislation.

Hence, this must remain unchanged. And yet, we must realize that this does not cover the whole truth. The matter today is much more complicated than it was before. If, for example, the German shipyards are asked about the manner in which they procured large-scale orders for tankers and container vessels and so forth during the period of an international shipbuilding slump, then we will come across something which unfortunately also applies to other branches of the exporting industry, namely, that in the international competition for the procurement of orders from foreign countries various deals are often linked under the motto: We are prepared to place this or that big order with you, under the proviso that you provide this or that delivery in addition. If you do not, we will desist from placing the big order with you. The Bundestag might perhaps have to institute discussions or even hearings on the subject so as to recognize the significance this has gained in the meantime. Protectively, I will not mention any names of countries in that connection. We must also keep in mind that in the case of some states which want something from us in that particular field, we are not only dependent on close cooperation and have a keen interest in such cooperation, but also note a great interest on their part.

All this notwithstanding, we must not overlook the fact that our defense system is geographically and conclusively defined by the North Atlantic Treaty--and General Haig confirmed this once again in the hearings before the U.S. Senate 2 weeks ago prior to his appointment as secretary of state. Yet one thing has become clear: If we know that our oil comes from the Persian Gulf, far beyond the NATO areas, [we know] that our security interests on the whole have thereby not been conclusively defined geographically. [commotion]

This results in a condition of tension. I would never advocate an expansion of the geographical area of the North Atlantic Treaty, much less than the Americans would want to do that. Yet conditions of tensions emerge from this that need to be investigated in context with this topic and which cannot be answered with headlines. Our security does encompass the supply of energy or other raw materials. Expressing it differently, I might say that we would be careless were we on principle against contributing toward the promotion of balance and thus creating bases for mitigating tensions in such sensitive regions as the one I just mentioned, the Persian Gulf, regions on which we depend for our oil and raw material supplies. All this needs to be examined with care. It means a great deal of weighing the interests of others, weighing controversial interests of our own state, or own employment, our own economy and, ladies and gentlemen, it always contains a whole bundle of moral weighing necessities because various moral aspects cannot at all be made compatible at first glance.

Ladies and gentlemen, we have no cause whatsoever to conduct this discussion with a bad conscience, for if anywhere in the world a state has based its security on collective defense, if anywhere in the world a state has based its security on an alliance, on arms limitation, on detente, then this was, is, and remains the Federal Republic of Germany. [applause]

If anywhere members of our alliance, the Western alliance, during the past few years provided concrete impulses toward active peace policy, then we are one of them, and we will be one of them . And if anywhere one of the greater industrial states of the world on purpose did not partially base its industrial development on arms industry, then it is the Federal Republic of Germany. And this will have to remain so.

It is, therefore, an impertinence to suggest that our state or this government is dependent on so-called arms trusts, to talk about an arms forge and all such rot. [applause] In this country, less than 1 percent of all earners are working at jobs connected in any way with what is referred to as the arms economy in the world. And the share of the Federal Republic of Germany in the arms exports of the entire world is minimal, that of the United States or of the Soviet Union being more than 33 percent each, both accounting for 1/3 of the world's arms exports, adding up to much more than 66 percent, nearly 70 percent, for the United States and the Soviet Union. And then follow others, and only then do we come into the picture with 3 or 4 percent, and this is an order of magnitude which anybody can verify.

We have no reason at all to hold this debate with a bad conscience. On the contrary, we have good reason to hold this debate with pride because of the pleasant restraint we have shown, restraint that has served the world. [applause]

I see that considerable thinking will have to be done in this respect in the months to come. I assume that particularly the Foreign Policy Committee will deal with these issues. I do not want to introduce pros and cons of new ideas today, but I want to state that the Federal Government is not materially prejudiced in these matters. The Federal Government does not intend to make a material decision in the near future. That is in agreement with the so far valid principles, Mr Kohl. Third, the Federal Government intends together with the Bundestag and other bodies to initiate methods for discussing, clarifying and evaluating the experience.

Let me touch on another foreign political complex. I mentioned briefly the statements of the new U.S. secretary of state, who is a good old acquaintance of some of us. I would like to point out some remarks which have not been always clearly expressed by the European press, remarks made by Alexander Haig.

I mention one of them. He was explicitly against a geographical extension of NATO's treaty area, the area of the North Atlantic Pact. I would like to give my impression that he considers it most important not to leave the impression of having his foreign policy all ready and formulated. He left several questions open. And he has pointed out over and over again that the new President--he said it to Mr Genscher and me personally 3 months ago--that he wants to consult his alliance partners.

That is very important. It means that the Washington government will be open to influence coming from its European allies, including our influence. Haig mentioned simultaneously a phase of the Soviet Union's imperial foreign policy, saying that it is a central task of the United States to contain Soviet action in the Third World. At the same time, he supported arms limitation several times. He said: I believe that equal and controllable arms limitation will contribute to security. He added the important idea that he considers progress only possible if the Soviet leadership will realize that if contractual limitations should fail, the United States will be determined to arm itself. Regarding the critical question about the standard of American armament, no stipulations have been made by the secretary, such as in the sense of superiority.

I will discuss this issue later on once more. He says about the SALT process, as did President Reagan in a talk 3 months ago, that the government will continue this process, that it will continue its efforts to mitigate the risk of nuclear war through negotiations, that it attributes high priority to these negotiations. At the insistence of Senator Chuck Percy, who is well known to us, he said that he intends to handle this task in the first days of the new administration so that talks could start soon.

He clearly sticks with the double decision of late 1979, which is particularly important for us Europeans. The new secretary of state very clearly realizes the significance of the arms control policy part of the second part of the double decision, as do the senators with whom he debated it. He said in this connection that talks with the Russians about limiting medium-range arms in Europe began in October 1980, but that consultations in the alliance were not carefully enough handled. I do not want to adopt criticism, but I want to welcome that this indicates the will for consultations with the European allies, which he particularly stressed at that point.

Haig said most explicitly that the Europeans expect a declaration of intent from the Reagan administration to continue arms control in Europe and that this is an important element in implementing the decisions of the alliance.

I want to point out that Haig gave a very courageous speech against the trend existing in Senate, stressing the military achievements of the European allies and naming most clearly the Federal Republic of Germany and our Bundeswehr. That was some positive stressing of our achievements. I want to thank him for that. We have not always heard such comment from that capital on us and our efforts. [applause]

The known 3 percent argumentation was brushed aside, as by his colleague Weinberger. The necessity of an overall Western concept was simultaneously stressed. This is a matter we have demanded for years, particularly in connection with the Afghanistan invasion. We have pressed for it. We have good reason to welcome this series of statements made at the beginning of the new administration. We have good reason to welcome the stressing of consultations and the taking into consideration of the experience and interests of the alliance partners. There is no reason at all to show some unfriendliness vis-a-vis the new American administration, unfriendliness I have read in some of the European press. [applause]

On our part, we will immediately initiate the consultations on all levels. Defense Minister, colleague Apel, will do it on his level, Federal Minister Genscher on his. He will go to Washington in early March. It is clear that Haig's ideas are not identical from the very beginning with the current ideas of the United States. Nobody can expect that in view of the mood for a fundamental change [aufbruchstimmung] over there. There certainly are some things to be discussed.

We certainly will stress the aspect of cooperation with the East European states, including cooperation in the field of arms limitation, and we will insist on the criterion of balance.

We will not participate in the stipulation of other philosophies. What is referred to as second to none in the American vernacular would not meet with any objection on my part. Yet the expression superior to anyone else would elicit considerable objections on my part. I believe that the chances for a labor-sharing overall concept of Western policy with which we can weather the challenges of the eighties are good, better today perhaps than they have been for quite some time.

I would like to add something of my own to the topic of the dual decision. This dual decision of the alliance is a militarily indispensable component part of Western strategy and politically it is a test of the alliance's solidarity. Anyone calling this dual decision or either of its two parts in question in the present world situation also calls the alliance in question. [applause]

What remains, also for all 1980 and to this day, is the fact that on the Soviet side it is possible to produce annually about 50 medium-range missiles not targeted on the United States for lack of range but targeted on Europe, the Mediterranean, the Middle East, Southeast Asia, or what have you, but primarily on Europe: 50 a year, each one with three warheads, that adds up to 150 warheads of which each can be individually targeted and possibly reloaded. We do not yet know this exactly, but they can be produced.

These are changes not only in the military power ratio but also in the political power ratio to which the West must react. [applause] These are potential instruments of political pressure to which the West must react. [applause] In this connection Minister-President Strauss yesterday or the day before made an utterance which I cannot but criticize. Mr Strauss said that strategical disarmament and negotiations on this issue solely rest with U.S. competence and we Germans should not intrude. I cannot agree with this, for God's sake. It is our hide, too which is being risked here. [applause]

I must draw attention to the fact that the dual decision of late 1979 so far has been the first and only American commitment to arms limitation negotiations in the alliance which, first, expressly envisages European security interests and which, secondly, comprises arms control on arms in a geographical area which is directly relevant to Europe and, by the way, also to the Federal Republic of Germany. This commitment, this obligation of the United States of America must be kept up. German influence on this field, European influence on this field must be preserved and must not be surrendered by such statements as: All this is U.S. competence alone and we Europeans, or we Germans, as Mr Strauss said, should not intrude.

It goes without saying that so-called medium-range weapons are strategic weapons; normally I call them Eurostrategic weapons. They have an immense strategic significance as they can strategically annihilate us. Naturally these are strategic weapons, and the dialogue on them is part of the talks between East and West on strategic weapons. And it may well be, not just from the definition of them but also from the objective interconnection, that when the great SALT talks on the intercontinental missiles now must be delayed for half a year or a bit longer, it is a blessing for the world if the Geneva talks on the Eurostrategic weapons are continued, the entire SALT dialogue being vitalized as a result. The interconnection is insoluble. [applause]

In this field, by the way, I would like to join Federal Minister Genscher and Federal Minister Apel. I believe it was Mr Genscher who pointed out the day before yesterday that a burden-sharing contribution by the Europeans is the prerequisite for our interests to wield equal weight and equal rights in the alliance. I consider this a basic idea which is necessary, correct, and in the German and European interest. Thus our most important goal is the early continuation of the talks in Geneva on Eurostrategic weapons with the serious endeavor to achieve concrete results.

If the Soviet Union, on the other hand, feels that in some states of Europe this dual decision would be in jeopardy, it may be that it loses the incentive for serious negotiations on mutual limitation in Geneva. During the first round, and this is not surprising, it built up a maximum position. This is part of the business; no need to get excited over that. We will directly start consultations on the subject with the new U.S. administration.

By the way, and apropos balance, what we aspire to is, of course, a negotiated balance, ladies and gentlemen; a balance which would be based on the actual deportment of the world powers is in a precarious situation because it can possibly be maintained only through continuous additional armament. I am stressing this because I also intend to say something about the idea of unilateral disarmament which again plays a role at present in many parts of Europe including our country; or for that matter, unilateral cuts in defense budgets which is but another advance form of unilateral disarmament.

As for your interjection, my colleague, I want to say that the theoretical concept of unilateral arms limitation or even unilateral disarmament is taken seriously as a theoretical concept by all people in the world who must be taken seriously, and that it requires a serious analysis. It cannot be simply wiped off the table.

I have been dealing with this concept several times in the course of 20 years. I can imagine situations where this concept would make sense for states in certain geostrategic situations. Regarding our position, after the 1956 invasion of Hungary, in our immediate vicinity, the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia, in the immediate vicinity, or the Afghanistan invasion last year--as regards us, I have always come to the conclusion that for us here in central Europe one-sided disarmament cannot be taken into consideration theoretically or practically because it would create great additional danger for us. [applause]

Whenever I do some new pondering, I return to the principle of a balance. A balance of military forces and those bringing influence to bear on Europe from without. This alone is not a sufficient condition for the stabilization of peace, but it is a condition without which, peace cannot be stabilized. Balance, approximate balance alone is not sufficient. A dynamic balance increasing to always greater heights would be obviously fatal because it could not be maintained in the long run. Balance on a lower level, as Mr Genscher said the day before yesterday, on an agreed lower level, that is what we must aim for.

In addition to the balance, there must be a peaceful attitude; the will for rapprochement, the will to talk to each other and also to listen. In addition, there must be the will to understand and to respect the interests of the other. In other words: the will to compromise.

I read with great interest how our former colleague, Professor Biedenkopf, commented extensively on foreign policy topics.

The Soviet Union aims--I do not want to say naturally--it obviously aims at creating dependence around itself and in other parts of the world, dependence on the Soviet leadership, dependence in the political, military and ideological fields. For us, the Federal Republic of Germany located in the immediate vicinity of this world power, domestic political and economic stability, social stability, ability to form an alliance and membership in an alliance are the most important elements of that prerequisite, namely the prerequisite to be able to act independently vis-a-vis the Soviet Union. [applause]

I will touch on a third topic now. Colleague Genscher and others have discussed the GDR. I want to say just one sentence about it today because soon there will be a debate on the state of the nation, on which occasion the Federal Government will not keep it a secret that it will stick with the term one German nation. [applause]

But the sentence, or the two sentences, I want to say today are the following. We believe that the public discussion on state citizenship problems have shown no new aspects suggesting an examination of our position. There cannot be any doubts that the Federal Government will stick with the German citizenship as outlined in the basic law. It does not do this only because of legal constitutional responsibility, but also because of political and moral responsibility. [applause] We will certainly deal with this again when the state of the nation will be discussed here.

Several spokesmen rightly discussed Berlin. I share Willy Brandt's satisfaction that the Social Democrats and the Free Democrats lately appeared to be fully able to act in Berlin. [laughter, applause] At any rate, more able to act than many others who are still making long plans to surrender their mandates here, but who have not done that so far. [applause]

I particularly welcome and include the declaration of intent made by our colleague Weizsaecker here in the house 2 days ago. I welcome all that because it corresponds to the significance Berlin has for our Republic, the significance Berlin has for peace in Europe and because the welfare of the people in Berlin necessitates such an engagement. [applause]

I think the house will expect and at any rate accept it that I will thank the former colleague, Dr Vogel who was a Federal minister for more than 6 years, Federal minister of justice, in the name of the Federal Government for his outstanding work and his loyalty to the colleagues. [applause] The whole house will agree with me when I express our thanks to our colleagues in this house who surrender their mandate here to go to work in Berlin. [applause]

I am proceeding to another point. Yesterday, and during the debate on finances, a great deal was said on topics of the finance economy and the national economy. It is important to me to prevent some simple, basic states of facts from being ignored over all this tug of war. There is the simple basic fact that in 1980 OPEC scored a surplus of more then $100 billion vis-a-vis the rest of the world. This means that 120 states of the world scored a deficit of that magnitude in comparison to OPEC, a balance of payments deficit, to be exact. This is a fundamental fact of 1980 which must not be ignored and which will not essentially change in 1981. A surplus of $100 billion, mind you, a magnitude that defies all imagination, scored by the OPEC countries. The consequences of these balance of payments deficits of the other countries spell catastrophe for the developing countries and difficulties in trade, sales, and balance of payments for the industrial countries, difficulties which all of us get to feel.

All of us, developing states and industrial states alike, have a need to use as little as oil as possible. Depending on the individual situation, it is necessary for us to substitute oil with other energies, namely, natural gas, coal, and nuclear power. All of us need to use less energy per production unit or less energy per national product unit. This will entail great changes and great investments. Innovation in industry is necessary. It can take effect only if it leads to investment. Any desperate protection of obsolete production is wrong. It would be fatal in this situation if the states would seclude themselves from each other so as to keep some obsolete productions alive for another couple of years through some protectionist measures.

It is clear that all this affects prices in the world. I have here the newspaper reports on the latest price developments. In our country, during January and in comparison with 1980, the fuel prices alone increased by 17 percent, coal by 15 percent, gas by 35 percent. You know that the purchase prices for crude oil have roughly doubled. All this is bound to entail effects. These are component parts of the national income which flow away to the outside and which no longer are available here for distribution. An as far as the interjection on taxes in concerned my answer is this: I believe that in addition to the fantastic oil-austerity results which we have scored to date, pressure must be brought to bear to achieve even less consumption of fuel oil and gasoline. This is absolutely necessary. [applause]

Since we are indeed advocates of the market economy, ladies and gentlemen, you certainly ought to give the market-economic instrument of the taxes preference over gasoline and diesel fuel rationing. [applause]

It is necessary to keep in mind as a fundamental fact of these eighties that the Federal Republic of Germany, too, is affected by these great surpluses of the oil countries, for example, Saudi Arabia. It is also affected by this great balance of payments deficit. Naturally we can finance our overall trade deficit for many years to come. Many states of the world which are much weaker than we are, all states, finance their overall trade deficit. We can also finance it in a different way than the others do, if we wanted to, by means of currency reserves. This would be for much longer than all others in the world, dear friends, except perhaps the oil states. The currency reserves of this country are unmatched in the world. [commotion, applause]

The main point I have in mind is this: as much as it is sensible at the moment for deficits to emerge also in our industrial countries including Japan and not just in the developing countries which would then have to cope with a far more difficult fate, it is not sensible to remain in this state of affairs. In other words, to the same extent as we have options for financing such deficits for a number of years, we must be aware that there are but two methods of winding up, of ending, these deficits. First by importing less oil and second by enhancing the competitive capability of our own industrial exports. [applause]

These two basic findings on what we need is what I wish to emphasize here. The enterprises, the trade unions, and the employees must recognize this, and the consequences are anything but pleasant.

I want to point out one thing in this connection. Less oil is being produced in the world every year and oil is becoming more and more expensive. Yesterday I read in the paper that the German Democratic Republic is not in a position any more to pay in the future for the same quantity of oil it imported so far, and therefore, the GDR will build nuclear powerplants. In the course of the next 10 years they want to derive one-quarter or one-fifth of their energy from nuclear powerplants. You all know that at present the Poles are not in a position to fulfill their coal supply commitments. You know that the Soviet Union is not in a position to fulfill its natural gas supply commitments. There is a shortage of energy in the world.

All that must be taken into consideration. It plays today a much greater role than at the beginning of the entire energy debate. I think as before that one cannot simply ignore it. The fact is that nuclear powerplants and waste disposals have an important democratic aspect. In handling public disputes about powerplants, the ability of a democratic society must stand the test to solve its conflicts peacefully, with the means of the basic law and not with violence. [applause]

Peaceful use of nuclear energy, even in a limited form as demanded by the government, cannot be enforced without agreement of broad public opinion. The speed of developing nuclear energy cannot only be developed by technical possibilities. Democratic decision processes must be the standard, including court decision processes, although they sometimes take quite some time. Nobody can relieve the politicians of their responsibility. Engineers, scientists and businesses are included in the moral responsibility to make the basis of decisions more clear. On this occasion the Federal Government wants to thank the Bundestag Inquiry Commission. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, only the one who takes worries and needs seriously can gain confidence, and nothing will work here without confidence. [applause]

SPD OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON FUTURE SALT NEGOTIATIONS

LD011554 Hamburg DPA in German 1424 GMT 1 Feb 81

[Text] Bonn, 1 Feb (DPA)--The "strong words" of new American President Ronald Reagan against the Soviet Union, in the opinion of SPD federal business manager Egon Bahr, will not make any easier the American desire to improve the SALT II agreement on strategic arms limitation in new negotiations with Moscow. However, remembering similarly strong words by the former American President Richard Nixon at the start of his term of office, not too much should be made of this, Bahr wrote in an article for the SPD organ VORWAERTS published by the SPD on Sunday.

Bahr once again spoke out against demands made within his own party that the two NATO decisions of December last year on the deployment of new medium-range missiles and a simultaneous negotiating offer to the East, in view of the changes which have taken place in the meantime, have to be discussed anew. Admittedly, since the time that the SPD party congress had given its support to these resolutions, the only change which has taken place is that--against expectations--SALT II has not been ratified. But, in view of the overriding interest of keeping under control the development of strategic arms by the two superpowers, everything ought to be avoided which would disturb the SALT process. "This includes our adherence to the two decisions."

GENSCHER PLANS TRIPS TO U.S., USSR, POLAND

LD301608 Hamburg DPA in German 1549 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Text] Bonn, 30 Jan (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher is to visit Washington from 9 to 11 March at the invitation of his U.S. counterpart Alexander Haig. This date was announced by the Bonn Foreign Office on Friday. It is Genscher's first meeting with Haig since the latter became secretary of state. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, it was learned, intends to visit new U.S. President Ronald Reagan in April.

It was learned in Bonn that Genscher also plans to visit Moscow and Warsaw in March.

POLAND'S WALESA EXPRESSES WISH TO VISIT FRG

LD302152 Hamburg DPA in German 2129 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Text] Hamburg, 30 Jan (DPA)--Polish trade union leader Lech Walesa has expressed the desire to visit the Federal Republic for talks with the trade unions. Walesa said this in a letter to Heinz Oskar Vetter, chairman of the German Trade Union Federation [DGB]. Vetter said on NDR-television (North-German radio) this evening that he received Walesa's letter today.

The DGB invited the chairman of the Solidarity trade union to the Federal Republic early this year, but because of differences with the government in Warsaw which were accompanied by strikes, Walesa had to postpone the visit. In the middle of January, Vetter expressed the hope to be able to discuss the situation of the Polish workers and the consequences to be drawn from it "with this outstanding man."

QUAI D'ORSAY CONFIRMS SUPPLY OF PLANES TO IRAQ

LD011018 Paris Domestic Service in French 1000 GMT 1 Feb 81

[Text] The Quai d'Orsay has just confirmed this morning that the French Mirage F-1 planes have indeed been delivered to Iraq. The stopover of these planes at Larnaca airport, Nicosia, was mentioned yesterday.

The Quai d'Orsay explains that this delivery comes as an implementation of contracts concluded in 1977 and adds that the French Government already has let it be known that the obligations resulting from these accords are being carried out in accordance with the commitments undertaken.

It is not yet known whether these planes can be immediately operational in the conflict between Iran and Iraq.

Denies Further Deliveries

NC012210 Paris AFP in English 2200 GMT 1 Feb 81

[Excerpt] Paris, 1 Feb (AFP)--The French Foreign Ministry tonight denied reports from Cyprus that more Mirage fighter planes would be delivered to Iraq soon.

The contract with Iraq does not call for further deliveries in the next few weeks, officials said.

REPORT ON TANKS, HELICOPTERS UNDER ORDER FROM IRAQ

LD011432 Paris Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 1 Feb 81

[Text] No official reaction was reported yet in Tehran after the French Government confirmed that the first Mirage F-1 planes ordered by Iraq from France 4 years ago were delivered yesterday. All in all, Iraq ordered 60 Mirage F-1 fighter planes from France. Furthermore, the French Government must deliver 150 AMX-30 and AMX-10 tanks and 60 Puma and Gazelle helicopters to Iraq.

Before the outbreak of the Iranian-Iraqi conflict, France already had supplied Iraq with 400 armored vehicles and, for the time being, this equipment is reportedly not being used against Iran. According to specialists, the Iraqis reportedly are using heavy equipment of Soviet origin. Iraq, which is, on the other hand, the second largest oil supplier to France, is also interested in the new Mirage-2000 and in the acquisition of warships.

PREMIER BARRE DISCUSSES MIDDLE EAST POLICY

LD301643 London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 30 Jan 81 pp 34, 35

[Aadnan Nasrawin interview with French Premier Raymond Barre in Paris "last Tuesday"]

[Excerpts] AL-HAWADITH: Mr Premier, certain quarters accuse France of pursuing an Arab policy deriving solely from commercial objectives and interests. What is your comment on this and what is France's attitude toward peace efforts in the Middle East?

Raymond Barre: France continuously has been faced with such accusations emanating from several quarters. I believe it is better for us not to try to reply to them because it is easy to allege that the policy of a certain state stems from economic interests. It is better for those who make such allegations to put their own houses in order first before accusing us of actions which they themselves are not averse to perpetrating.

Regarding your question about France's attitude toward the developments of the situation in the Middle East, I tell you that since 1967, that is, since the day General de Gaulle warned the Israeli foreign minister at that time that the war in the Middle East between the Arab countries and Israel would have serious consequences--since that day, Paris has been pursuing a clear and unchanging attitude. The French stand calls for a comprehensive solution to be found that will achieve a peaceful setttlement based on guaranteeing secure recognized borders and that would contribute to the solution of a very tragic problem, the problem of the Palestinians. France's policy on this subject has always been clear and I do not think we intend to make any change in our attitude. On the contrary, France will exert all its efforts in international circles to achieve this peaceful, comprehensive and just settlement on the basis of the principles which President Giscard d'Estaing declared during his recent tour of Arab countries and which proceed from the same firm principles which France follows in its international dealings.

AL-HAWADITH: Mr Premier: What is your attitude toward the Iraqi-Iranian war and will the continuation of this war affect the French economy in view of the fact that Iraq and Iran are major oil exporters to France? On the other hand, is there any change in your policy on nuclear dealings with Iraq following the recent return of French technicians?

Raymond Barre: First, regardless of any other economic consideration, France hopes that peace will be restored between Iraq and Iran with whom France has had close relations since ancient times. We sincerely hope that a settlement will be reached for this Iraqi-Iranian conflict. For our part, we support all the efforts being made to this end, particularly those by the nonaligned states and the Islamic states.

Regarding our oil supplies, we thankfully and gratefully note the stand of certain Arab oil-exporting countries that have conpensated us for the shortfall in the quantities of oil shipped to us from Iraq and Iran following the outbreak of the Iraq-Iran war. We consider this a friendly step which we regard as a confirmation of the relations of trust existing between France and the Arab countries.

Regarding the last part of your question on nuclear cooperation between France and Iraq, I believe that it is natural that when bombs are falling in places where French technicians are at work within the framework of nuclear cooperation between Iraq and France, the technicians should be evacuated and brought back home. We are anxious for cooperation with Iraq but not at the cost of our citizens' lives. I do not think that the head of any government in the world would fail to take the same action we have taken. This, of course, was in total agreement with the Iraqi Government which, for its part too, was anxious not to expose its citizens to the bombs that were falling in the area in which they were working with French technicians.

I must point out here that French-Iraqi cooperation in the nuclear field was carried out within the framework of respect for international agreements. Iraq accepted that the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna should monitor this cooperation which is taking place solely for the exclusively peaceful use of the atom. The campaign of which we have been the target regarding this subject, and for which I do not know who is responsible, will not make us think that in cooperating with Iraq in the peaceful use of nuclear energy we have committed an error.

AL-HAWADITH: Mr Premier: What is France's attitude today toward the situation in Lebanon?

Raymond Barre: France's stand today is as it always has been. It stems from the feelings of traditional friendship that link France and Lebanon. Through all our stands and actions, we seek to help this dear country to regain its national independence, security and peace. France will spare no effort in the future to help Lebanon achieve these objectives for the attainment of which we hope all Lebanese will cooperate in a friendly spirit.

MALI'S TRAORE COMMENTS ON CHAD, FRENCH RELATIONS

AB301754 Paris AFP in French 1606 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Text] Paris, 30 Jan (AFP)--In Paris on Thursday, Malian President Moussa Traore reaffirmed his country's adherence to the Lagos accords on Chad and condemned all forms of foreign intervention.

After a dinner followed by a round of talks with Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing, General Traore said they discussed issues of common interest and French-Malian cooperation in particular.

Replying to a question on developments in Chad, he stated that both Libya and the GUNT [Transitional National Union Government] signed the Lagos accords which formally forbid any intervention by a neighboring country.

He also said that the school disturbances in Mali ended last July. Questioned on an alleged coup attempt in Mali last December, he declared that there has been no coup attempt. There has been an assassination attempt on the life of the president of the republic.

With regard to the incidents in Vitry during which the local municipal authorities forcibly expelled 300 Malians from an immigrant home a few weeks ago, General Traore stated that the French Government had responded strongly and granted assistance to Malian workers to make it possible for them to find a solution to their problems.

While the Malian president is visiting the Elysee, the 21st session of the French-Malian joint session is in progress in Paris. During the session, which began on Thursday and will end on Monday, France is expected to grant priority assistance for the reorientation of the Malian economy. Such reorientation might particularly include Mali's return to the West African Monetary Union.

LE CONTINENT Interview

AB020837 Paris AFP in English 0827 GMT 2 Feb 81

[Text] Paris, 2 Feb (AFP)--President Moussa Traore of Mali confirmed in an interview published here today that there had been a New Year's Eve plot to assassinate him. The Malian leader refused to qualify it as an attempt to overthrow the government, however.

He told LE CONTINENT, a daily newspaper focussing on Africa, that all the circumstances will come out at the trial of these foolish people who mounted the plot.

In mid-January, reliable sources in Dakar, Senegal, and travellers arriving there from Bamako said that about 15 police officers had been arrested in the Malian capital when a coup plot was discovered hours before it was to be set in motion. The travellers said the idea was to assassinate all Mali's military leaders, including General Traore. About 60 police and civilian officials were said to have been questioned after the arrests.

On another subject, Gen Traore said that he would apply clemency measures in the cases of some students expelled during the school strikes that have plagued Mali since November, 1979.

The Malian leader was interviewed at the end of an official visit to France last Thursday and Friday.

NIGERIAN FOREIGN MINISTER AUDU CONCLUDES VISIT

AB302118 Paris AFP in French 1807 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Text] Paris, 30 Jan (AFP)--Nigeria is not in conflict with Libya, Mr Ishaya Audu, Nigerian foreign minister, emphasized on Friday at the end of his 5-day official visit to France. However, speaking in a short press conference before his departure, he added that President Goukouni Queddei's call for the Libyans was contrary to the Lagos accord of August 1979 which set up the Transitional National Union Government [GUNT] of Chad.

The accord stipulates that Chad's neighbors shall undertake not to interfere in the internal affairs of Chad and that the neutral forces entrusted with peace-keeping there shall consist of troops from one or several countries not having a common border with Chad.

In this regard, Mr Audu recalled, Nigeria therefore has no right, by virtue of the accord, to participate in the sending of an inter-African force, which before being sent, should be approved by the Nigerian National Assembly. But if the OAU decides to call on Nigeria, it will examine that request, he said. Nigeria will not refuse, he added, specifying that the pan-African organization has ratified the Lagos accord.

Concerning the mandate of the GUNT, which was set for 18 months by the Lagos accord signed on 21 August 1979, Mr Audu said it took effect on the date of the actual installation of the government, that is, early November 1979. Therefore, the mandate expires at the end of April 1981. This date was also given by some twelve heads of state meeting in Lome in January 1981 as the deadline for the organization of elections in Chad under the auspices of the OAU.

The Nigerian minister again stressed the transitional nature of the GUNT, which, he recalled, according to the Lagos accord should comprise all the factions in order to be really legitimate. Audu also said that to his knowledge, France is not going to intervene in Chad and that French troops came at the request of the Central African authorities.

On French Nigerian relations, Mr Audu, who earlier held talks with President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and his French counterpart, Jean-Francois Poncet, described them as reasonably good. This trip has helped to dispel misunderstanding between the two countries, he said.

Mr Audu, who visited the Saint Laurent-des-Eaux nuclear center and the Dassault Aeronautic Company's installations, stressed that his country is interested in cooperating with France in these sectors, adding however, that nothing precise was discussed.

L'HUMANITE DISCUSSES GISCARD TELEVISION INTERVIEW

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "Hankering After the Gunboat"]

[Text] What is notable about the television interview which Mr Giscard d'Estaing granted to several journalists last night? First, it took place among friends. Once more, the president chose his interlocutors from among his supporters, excluding opposition journalists. As a result, he ran no risk at all, just dismissing out of hand even the most unassertive attempt to ask an indiscreet question. And, obviously, no one insisted.

It is further remembered that he showed peak skill in avoiding any real problems and prudently presented his policy in a light which was all the more restful for being diffuse. Three months before the presidential election, even though he refused to state whether he will be a candidate, it was reasonable to expect that he would plead his cause rather than indulge in self-criticism. Hence, the desire to rub out shadows and adorn his diplomatic action with flowers of success. This led him to overdo things.

What is the real situation? Has Mr Giscard d'Estaing's diplomacy been marked, as he would like to make us believe, with a desire to ensure France's independence, search for disarmament and respect for people's right to self-determination?

On the contrary, what seems to characterize it in our view is the fact that he has followed loyally in the wake of the American flagship, even though he naturally remained discreet on the subject since he was pleased to devote one-half of his interview to the situations in Afghanistan and Poland. Even though there are certain people in France who are prepared to go even further in their anti-Sovietism (perhaps by giving marching orders?), it cannot be contested that the president behaves as a loyal member of the Atlantic alliance with respect to all strategic problems. Not only has he participated with his allies in NATO maneuvers and in the deployment of warships in the Persian Gulf, but he recently earned NATO Secretary General Luns' congratulations for his contribution to a renewal of the arms race, especially for his favorable attitude to the deployment of new American missiles in Europe.

Even though Mr Giscard d'Estaing officially has said that he supports detente, it must not be forgotten that he set his media on a noisy and continuous campaign against the Soviet Union and the socialist countries. To mention just one example: For more than 6 months, radio and television have daily been announcing a Moscow military intervention in Poland as imminent. From this viewpoint, Mr Giscard d'Estaing seems to have elevated the art of doubletalk to a superior level.

What about peoples' right to determine their own future? He condemns the Soviet intervention in Kabul, carried out at the Afghan Government's request--and in keeping with a mutual aid treaty--to counter a rebellion backed by foreign countries. On the other hand, he takes pride in the fact that the French Government intervened, although for less honorable reasons, in Gabon, the West Sahara, Zaire, Djibouti, Central Africa and Chad. His morality is obviously variable and intervention strikes him as intolerable when it is a question of supporting a revolutionary government and legitimate if it means saving the property of the empire.

In the same way, he maintains diplomatic relations with the military junta in Bolivia, which is bathing the country in blood, on the pretext that he recognizes states and not governments, but he refuses to establish diplomatic relations with Kampuchea's new leaders and continues to support Pol Pot's gang.

Giscard d'Estaing did not go so far as to admit it, but the truth is that he is acting as a gendarme of Africa and that the reason he does not go even further is not so much that his plans are moderate as that the means at his disposal are relatively small. These are no longer the days of the gunboat.

It is obvious that he is doing all he can to oppose the rise of national liberation movements. This is borne out by his intrigues to place Mrs Claustre's abductor Hissein Habre back in harness in Chad, using Central Africa as a base, and by his refusal to support the south-west Africa people's organization, Namibia's national liberation movement, against the racist South African Government whose troops are illegally occupying the country. He pays lipservice to the condemnation of "apartheid." He does not forget that the big French firms are doing good business in that country.

Yesterday evening, Giscard d'Estaing chose to portray himself as a man who treads the middle path paved with good intentions. However, behind the carefully worded remarks lies the reality of a policy which, in Europe, the Near East and Africa, is defending big capitalism's interests even though it is forced to take account of a balance of forces which is no longer the same as in the days of colonial empires.

MARCHAIS ADDRESSES PCF RALLY IN LEVALLOIS

[Report on speech by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais at PCF rally in Levallois on 27 January: "Creating the Right Conditions for Defeating Giscard d'Estaing"]

[Excerpts] "We must put an end to this arrogant and hypocritical government with its disastrous policy. That is my objective. I will do all I can to attain it. It must be clear to all that when the workers' interests and the country's future are at stake, there can be no compromise in the battle against exploitative capital, against its government and against the man who leads that government. I will not compromise with Giscard d'Estaing, any more than with any other of capital's politicians, since he is now public enemy number one for the working class and for democracy and progress in France.

"After what I have just said, you may hear on the radio and television tomorrow that I have taken a new step in the escalation against Giscard d'Estaing. This is because, you see, it seems that attacking Giscard d'Estaing is something new for me! There has even been talk of a 'turning point' in my campaign! Well, friends and comrades, just think that this 'new' attack on Giscard d'Estaing which I have just made is not new. I have just read word for word an extract from the statement which I made on 12 October last year--3.5 months ago--when I was chosen as candidate for this election by my party. It is more than 3 months now that I, together with the 700,000 Communists who are selflessly throwing themselves into this battle, have been tirelessly calling for a rallying of forces to sweep away Giscard d'Estaing and his policy. People are now suddenly discovering, or rather deliberately inventing, a 'turning point' in Georges Marchais' campaign. It is worth noting that there are very different interpretations of the causes of the so-called 'turning point.' Some people say: 'It is Moscow!' Those are the robot politicians. There is never anything unpredictable about them. You press the button marked 'Communist' and they answer 'Moscow.' However, there are also the imaginative politicians. They are more subtle. They learnedly explain that according to them, I previously was not attacking Giscard d'Estaing since I wanted to lend support to him. But now I am obviously attacking Giscard d'Estaing for the reason, this time, that I want to lend him even more support.... Similarly, they regard my reiteration of our will to assume all responsibilities, including government responsibilities, as indisputable proof that I do not really want there to be any Communist ministers.... In short, for these people, whatever the Communists say or do is and will always be fiendish. None of that can be taken seriously and it is not important.

"In any case, as far as I am concerned I repeat that things are clear: What I and my party want is to create the right conditions for defeating the man who wears the National Council of French Employers' colors--Giscard d'Estaing, to prevent his policy from being continued or stepped up, whatever forms it takes and whoever implements it, to pave the way for the change which the workers expect and to achieve union to impose that change--the union of all the people's forces, the leftwing union for change. That is the meaning of my fight in this presidential election battle. Nobody should have any illusions about my determination. I am more determined than ever--and all that is now happening confirms our intention--to make every effort to rid France of the disastrous policy which is plunging our country into crisis and of the man who is implementing it--Giscard d'Estaing.

"Allowing the PCF to be weakened would not only leave the way clear for establishing a new coalition between the right and the PS in order to continue and step up capital's policy, but also would undermine the workers' means of defense and place the exploited in an inferior position in their step-by-step struggle against the government and the employers. Conversely, supporting this party and rallying the forces of change as broadly as possible round its candidate will prevent capital from effecting the antisocial and antinational clampdown which it wants, will create the best conditions for defeating Giscard d'Estaing and his policy and will give change every possible chance. As I said during our central committee meeting the other week, it is decidedly right to say that what will above all focus attention in the 26 April ballot, the thing which is above all at stake, is the amount of support rallied for the Communist candidate."

OFFICIALS SPEAK AT FOREIGN TRADE CONFERENCE

[Text] Rome, 31 Jan (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo called for improved Italian trading cooperation with the oil exporters, the developing countries, and Eastern Europe in winding up a conference on Italy's foreign trade here today. Closing the two-day parley, Colombo said, in particular, that there must be "more incisive cooperation than in the past" with the oil producers. With the developing countries, efforts must be made to solve the "financial problems" gravely accentuated by the current international economic crisis, Colombo added. He also noted that strengthening trade cooperation with Eastern Europe would be a contribution to the resumption of East-West detente. But he said that all these moves would require centralizing the Rome government's foreign trade decisions and making the foreign offices of the Foreign Trade Institute (ICE) more efficient.

Foreign Trade Minister Enrico Manca added that this rationalization of Italian interventions on foreign markets would be a question of "a gradual reform of the available instruments" without "unjustified timidity or any presumption." Manca also summed up some of the proposals designed to ensure an efficient reorganization of Italian foreign trade:

A three-year export plan.
Strengthening the Foreign Trade Ministry and ICE.
The development of financial and insurance concessions.

But, according to some sources present at the conference, his most important proposal was to set up a public sector finance body to develop joint ventures and mixed credits with emerging countries.

Industry Minister Filippo Maria Pandolfi told the conference that his ministry's "priority of priorities" remains energy supplies. But he also spoke out for the need for easier and more ample export credits for small and medium-sized Italian firms.

Other speakers included Giorgio Venvenuto of the UIL Labor Federation and Italian Communist Party economics expert Eugenio Peggio. The first urged that the Foreign Trade Ministry should become an "operational and propulsive center for trade-exchange policy." The second urged a response from the Rome government on Italian terrorism's alleged foreign ramifications, arguing that this could have a "decisive weight in international economic relations too."

OFFICIALS COMMENT ON LIRA-DOLLAR RELATIONSHIP

[Text] Rome, 31 Jan (ANSA)--The upward climb of the dollar on Italian money markets was the topic of a meeting here Friday between Treasury Minister Nino Andreatta and Bank of Italy Governor Carlo Azeglio Ciampi. No official statement followed the meeting but it was learned that the treasury minister has not changed his position opposed to taking into consideration a devaluation of the lira against the other currencies in the European monetary system (EMS).

Meanwhile, Foreign Trade Minister Enrico Manca said that he is personally opposed to a devaluation of the lira "in addition to (the devaluation) already under way, which would aggravate trade problems. Manca added that he is in favor of wider margins for monetary authorities to make flexible adjustments of the exchange rate within the lira's defense limits.

Italian Premier Arnaldo Forlani also spoke of Italy's trade problems and the hefty trade deficit in his opening speech to the national conference on foreign trade, which began here Friday. "We have a vital interest in keeping good economic and trade relations with many countries, independently of the diversity of their political systems," he said.

Forlani also warned against protectionist tendencies which crop up once in a while. "We belive that it is in our interest to avoid protectionist closures," even if it is necessary to be vigilant over the dangers which could stem from overly aggressive trade policies. A real stimulus to Italian exports depends on bringing supply in line with new market trends, Forlani concluded.

AVANTI REPORTS ON PSI DIRECTORATE MEETING

LD301551 [Editorial Report] Rome AVANTI in Italian on 24 January carries on pages 1-3 an unattributed report on proceedings at the 23 January PSI Directorate meeting in Rome. In his opening report, PSI Secretary Bettino Craxi pointed to "approval of the government's overall conduct" in dealing with the recent kidnapping of Judge D'Urso by Red Brigades terrorists, as recently expressed by the party in its vote of confidence. The report centered on relief aid to the quake-stricken south, prompter implementation of energy reforms, new legislation to govern strikes in the public services and a revision of the powers of parliamentary committees of inquiry. In conclusion, Craxi discussed the present Italian political situation, urging that the government coalition pursue "a political dialectic that will enable the political forces to best express in a constructive manner their own identity and of course their own differences of principle and assessment," and proposed that the party congress be held in April in Palermo.

In the debate on his report, Socialist veteran Riccardo Lombardi reportedly expressed agreement with the PSI's conduct during the D'Urso affair, but complained that "it was not made subject to approval by the Directorate." Fabrizio Cicchitto warned against "accepting the outlook of [DC leftwinger] Galloni, according to whom the two hegemonic poles of Italian politics are the DC and the PCI, while all the PSI can do is form an unequal alliance with one or other of them." To counter this, he continued, "the PSI must introduce into its government conduct a rigorous challenge to the negative aspects of the DC power system and with an eye to the future must more thoroughly examine the issue of an alternative," which, he added, "obviously demands a clear dialogue with the PCI, which is currently fluctuating from extremism to a return to the historical compromise, to a real quest for leftwing unity."

Paris Dell'unto and Silvano Labriola also reportedly warned the party of the danger of being squeezed out by the Christian Democrats and Communists, while Antonio Landolfi urged it "to develop its initiative in relations with the Socialist and secular area and its points of convergence with the Radical area," so as "to consolidate the non-communist leftwing area." Nevol Querci criticized "the completely individualized method which prevailed in the party's initiative during the recent terrorist events, thus effectively ruling out any collegial decisionmaking, primarily at the Directorate level." Querci claimed that "among other things, this gave rise to contradictory stances that prompted disorientation in the PSI grassroots and among its voters." He also reportedly condemned the government's attitude to the terrorists as "lacking any sign of steadfastness," claiming that it created "a disgusting and dangerous empiricism, which eventually nurtured repressive and even reactionary tendencies." Last, Luigi Covatti asserted that "the PSI must not efface itself in the defense of this government, but must reopen political dialogue on the future of our political system."

POLITICIANS COMMENT ON CURRENT GOVERNMENT CRISIS

PSOE Secretary General

LD302158 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1400 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Interview broadcast by Spanish television with the secretary general of the Socialist Workers Party [PSOE], Felipe Gonzalez, date of interview and television transmission not given--recorded]

[Text] [Gonzalez] I can begin by saying that it seems obvious that he [Calvo Sotelo, candidate proposed for prime minister by the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD]] is not the candidate which the PSOE can or should support. It is not the candidate of the PSOE who should have to clarify the situation which, I think, was never sufficiently explained to the public. The fact is that the prime ministerial candidate is proposed by the head of state, the king, after consultations with the political parties in the Congress of Deputies. It is therefore premature to start talking about a person who, in short, is no more than an alternative--another person to replace the prime minister.

I think that the subject has to be viewed much more seriously and calmly. The country is going through a grave social, economic and political situation. It would be irresponsible to rush to a solution of this crisis. What is needed is more than a debate about people who are (?prominent) at this point in the public eye. We need discussion of a program with which this situation can be tackled. We need discussion of how democracy is going to be stabilized, of how progress is going to be made in the democratic process, in short, of how to establish a serious will to govern the country, do away with violence and unemployment and fight against Spain's grave problems.

[Question] And what, then, would be the position, the vote of your party, in a future vote of investiture, specifically on Calvo Sotelo if this were the case?

[Answer] Well, I think that this is deduced in part from what I have just said. The PSOE has already said on many occasions that the essential functioning of democracy depends on respect for the electoral process. We do not believe that it would be inappropriate for there to be electoral expectations, etc. Moreover, we think that the popular will has to be respected, namely, that the parties which win the greatest number of votes are those most obliged to assume the responsibility of governing the country.

What is happening is that we are going through a grave crisis. The party which up to now has succeeded to government is a party which, in my opinion, is in a crisis and in a situation of near inability to offer a stable situation.

In this situation--a perfectly natural situation in democratic countries when there is an internal crisis in [words indistinct] the governing party, the major opposition party--we should be in readiness to find and offer the country the solution about which I spoke earlier, a solution which will stabilize the democratic process and advance it, which will tackle above all the problems of the country rather than study the change of personalities, which is what I think is happening at the moment in the UCD itself.

In this historical situation I want our people to know that we are ready to assume the responsibilities which we might have to assume; and I also want them to know that hope has to be maintained, that within democracy these changes are always healthy and that it is important to maintain a spirit open to the construction of a strong democracy, a stable democracy, one which is capable of doing away with injustice and social disorder.

PCE Secretary General Carrillo

[Interview with Santiago Carrillo, secretary general of the Spanish Communist Party [PCE], at the Zarzuela Palace on his 30 January audience with King Juan Carlos--live]

[Text] [Carrillo] I conveyed to his majesty the opinion of the PCE and of the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia, [PSUC], the opinion of its parliamentary group, and I said the way in which the crisis came about does not appear normal to us, because Prime Minister Suarez was not defeated in the Congress of Deputies. Yesterday he gave an explanation of his resignation in which he does not say who defeated him, and the nation--I am not talking now of politicians in the know--the nation, as a result of this absence of any explanation as to who defeated him, could have the impression that there were other influences and other pressures which determined the crisis, and this appears not to have been the case. Now we have a situation in which the UCD, after provoking Suarez's resignation and before discussing what the situation of the country is, what program and what policy is required to get the country out of this situation, immediately after the resignation of Suarez proposed a new candidate for the position of prime minister. This gives the impression that the crisis is not being resolved in parliament together with the parliamentary forces, but that it was provoked by the UCD which wants to resolve it on its own.

This does not give a favorable impression of the democratic institutions. I think this has all been conducted very badly. As for the solution which we think is the only one which could give hope to the country at the present time, this solution is a government of progress, a government which will seriously and efficiently tackle three fundamental issues: The crisis of unemployment; the organization of a state of autonomies; and the struggle against terrorism.

This government, in order to gain the confidence of the country, would have to include participation by the left. In a very friendly and very frank conversation with the king, I conveyed to him these opinions of the PCE and the PSUC on the situation.

[Question] And how did the king take the subject of a pact?

[Answer] Well, you don't mention these things. [laughter]

[Question] How would this government (?be formed)? On what basis?

[Answer] On the basis, I think, of a UCD-PSOE coalition government.

[Question] You have already spoken with the PSOE. Does it agree?

[Answer] I have spoken with the PSOE, but I could not seriously say the PSOE agrees with this. Neither could I say it is opposed to it.

[Question] How do you evaluate the recent statement by the PSOE, by its secretary general, that the PSOE must have contacts with and must make pacts with other parties in order to really create a stable majority government at the present time, which is [words indistinct] very difficult as a result of the crisis (?caused by) the UCD? How would you respond to their consultations? What would you say?

[Answer] I think that, at the present time, the participation of the PSOE in a government is necessary, and so any consultations which may be necessary are valid. I do not see any concrete possibility of a government headed by the PSOE without holding an election and I think early elections would be catastrophic, would be very negative. But if what you are saying means that the PSOE is thinking at the moment of taking a part in the solution of the serious crisis which the country is indeed going through, then I think this is a positive sign.

PCE Opposition

LD302226 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Excerpt] [Announcer] PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo, has 23 deputies. What would be the position of the party regarding the investiture vote?

[Begin Carrillo recording] As it can be assumed that Calvo Sotelo, who has already been designated by the UCD will try to form a UCD, single-tendency [monocolor] government, or a UCD government tending even further to the right, I think it is safe to say my party will probably vote against the investiture of Calvo Sotelo. [end recording]

UCD MEMBERS EXPLAIN NONPARTICIPATION VOTE

LD302231 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Text] In connection with the UCD Executive Committee meeting which was abandoned by seven members of the committee belonging to the so-called critical sector, we can now read you a communique which these seven members of the critical sector issued this evening. In this communique they explain the criteria which motivated them yesterday during the meeting. We read it verbatim:

1. Given the special nature of each political situation which UCD goes through, the candidate who is approved must be the candidate of everyone and not of one small sector of the party.

2. For Leopoldo Calvo Sotelo, whose personal and political qualities were never at issue, to become effectively a candidate of everyone, there would have to have been a minimum period of time during which Mr Calvo Sotelo himself could express his real intentions, proposals and basic policy lines for overcoming, as the situation demands, the serious problem in the party, and indicate the direction he would take as the head of the country's government.

3. Since there is no time period laid down in the Spanish Constitution for filling the vacancy in the prime minister's office, and since there exists a functioning government fully constituted, the repeated urging of a peremptory decision, paying no heed to the call for dialogue and reflection upon the complex problems which confront our party and our country, appeared absolutely unjustified to the undersigned.

The communique then says:

When 0400 this morning passed without Calvo Sotelo making known his intentions and proposals, several members of the Executive Committee insisted a number of times that the only important thing was to proceed to a vote. In these circumstances, and after making a number of appeals pointing to the responsibility and importance of the decision which had to be made, the undersigned declared that they were not able to take part in this vote. The undersigned are fully aware that by adopting this position we have responded to the imperatives of our political conscience and followed the norms of democracy.

DAILY TELEGRAPH: HAIG SHOWS 'FIRMNESS, CAUTION'

LD301255 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 30 Jan 81 p 16

[Editorial: "The Haig Takes Over"]

[Text] Gen Haig's performance at this first press conference since being appointed secretary of state showed both firmness and caution. He is an old hand at press conferences, from experience gained during his years at NATO. Nevertheless, the State Department of the United States is a different proposition from NATO. It is all the more different since the secretary of state will be more important in the Reagan administration than has been the case recently. Gen Haig will have the key role in formulating and directing American foreign policy under Mr Reagan. He said on Wednesday night that the President had assured him personally that he would be his "chief administrator" for that policy. "I intend that the President's mandate to me will be carried out, and I am confident that it will be." It is clear from yesterday's exchanges in Washington that Moscow has got the message.

Gen Haig's caution showed at several points in his press conference when he declined, politely but with great concision, to go into matters on which policy was still in the making. His firmness emerged when he discussed such matters as Soviet policies, including the use of Cuban proxies and the spread of terrorism. On Russia, he said they had been witnessing an unprecedented "risk-taking mode" on the part of the Soviet Union. This was a subject of "the utmost concern" to the administration. An additional subject linked to it was "the conduct of Soviet activity in terms of training, funding and equipping...international terrorism." International terrorism, said Gen Haig, would take the place of human rights in their concern, "because it is the ultimate abuse of human rights." This re-positioning of "human rights" from the grossly over-elevated level given it by President Carter can only be welcomed.

Gen Haig had kind words to say about the European allies and their contribution to NATO. He was politely but non-commitally welcoming to President Giscard's woolly and time-serving proposals for an international conference on Afghanistan. Nevertheless, for all his politeness, it is clear that Gen Haig is going to be a very hard-headed secretary of state.

GOVERNMENT TO TALK WITH USSR ON CULTURAL AGREEMENT

[John Miller report: "Freeze on Russia To Be Eased"]

[Text] Britain has agreed to hold talks with the Soviet Union on renewing their long-standing cultural agreement despite the Soviet Army's continued presence in Afghanistan. A Foreign Office and British council team will go to Moscow in March.

The Foreign Office decision to re-negotiate the agreement was taken in close collaboration with No 10 Downing Street and in no way reflected any shift in the government's attitude to the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan.

In January last year, Whitehall "got tough" with the Kremlin over the invasion and effectively imposed cultural sanctions against the Soviet Union.

I understand that Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, was still anxious to maintain the machinery of the cultural agreement because he believed it provided the only framework for "getting Britain across" to the Russians.

The new agreement was not expected to be substantially different from previous ones and is likely to concentrate on routine exchanges of students and research workers.

MIRAGE FIGHTERS FOR IRAQ REFUEL AT LANARCA AIRPORT

Four Planes Stop Over

NC311321 Paris AFP in English 1314 GMT 31 Jan 81

[Text] Nicosia, 31 Jan (AFP)--Four Mirage fighter bombers touched down at Larnaca airport in southeastern Cyprus today for refuelling before heading on to Baghdad, reliable sources said. Tight security was in force at the airport and journalists and camera men were kept away during the short stopover.

The four unmarked planes were flown in here by French pilots and left with Iraqi crews. The Iraqis arrived here three days ago amid much mystery aboard a Jordanian military plane carrying Alia airline colours, the sources added. Observers here believed the planes represented the first delivery of a sale to Iraq, and other Mirages were expected here during the day. The Cypriot government has remained silent about the delivery despite questions about the arrival of the Jordanian plane at Larnaca. A spokesman would only say that the Alia plane was making a refuelling stop.

More Mirages May Arrive

[Text] Nicosia, 1 Feb (AFP)--A further delivery of French Mirage fighter planes to Iraq may be carried out soon, according to information provided today by an informed source at Larnaca airport southeast of here. Four Mirage F-1's were turned over to Iraqi pilots at the airport yesterday.

An employee of Larnaca airport said that the French pilot commanding the flight of four planes that arrived here from France yesterday told him that a total of 30 planes would pass through Cyprus on the way to Iraq. The airport has been sealed off and journalists are not permitted to approach the facility.

Five More Mirages Delivered

[Text] The second batch of Mirage fighter planes to be delivered by France to Iraq were handed over to Iraqi pilots yesterday through the mediation of the Greek Cypriot administration. Five more Mirage planes landed at Larnaca airport yesterday and were handed over to Iraqi pilots. The planes were flown by Iraqi pilots to Iraq immediately after refueling. It is also reported that the Mirage planes took off for Larnaca airport from a military airport in Greece.

France delivered--through the mediation of the Greek Cypriot administration--four Mirage fighter planes to Iraq in Larnaca the day before yesterday. Iraq ordered from France 60 Mirage fighter planes between 1977 and 1979. Meanwhile, the French Government confirmed reports that it delivered Mirage planes to Iraq. The French Foreign Ministry issued a statement saying that the planes were delivered in accordance with an agreement signed with Iraq in 1977.

DENKTAS RETURNS FROM AT-TA'IF CONFERENCE

TA312024 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1930 GMT 31 Jan 81

[Text] President Rauf Denktas, who attended the third Islamic Conference summit in Saudi Arabia, returned to Cyprus this evening. In a statement at Ercan [Tymbou] state airport on his return, Denktas said the conference had been very beneficial and that he returned to the island satisfied. He said: [sentence indistinct]. We requested that the Cyprus question not be discussed at this meeting. The Cyprus issue was postponed to the next meeting. However, extending economic aid to the Turkish Cypriot community was among the decisions made [word indistinct] the Arab League. Thus [words indistinct] an important part of the summit conference.

Noting that during the summit conference he had found the opportunity to meet with the leaders of the Islamic world and to brief them on the Cyprus problem and the talks, Denktas said he also met with PLO leader 'Arafat.

Denktas said: As a powerful and faithful leader he sent his greetings and [word indistinct] to the Turkish Cypriots. Noting that the Arab League and the Muslim World League adopted a firm and insistent stand concerning the Jerusalem and the Palestinian issues, Denktas noted that the enthusiasm and concern over these issues were gradually increasing. He added: They are determined to save Jerusalem and to secure the rights of the Palestinians through every possible measure including the (?oil) weapon. They want the support and aid of every Islamic country to achieve their end. Naturally, we, as a community familiar with the pain of being displaced, of being left without a home and country, stand by our Palestinian brothers with all our heart. We hope that the Greek Cypriots in the south, who are sending messages of friendship to the Arab world, and their leaders will adopt a realistic stand concerning the Palestinian issue and will sever relations with Israel. SPOKESMAN DENIES AIRLINK WITH LEBANESE ENCLAVE

[Text] The republic's government spokesman, referring to press reports that the Lebanese Phalangist leader Sa'd Haddad has stated that he will build an airport in the area under his control, for flights to Cyprus, stated the following:

The Cyrpus Government has not been approached in connection with flights to Larnaca airport from the illegal airport which the Phalangist leader intends to build. He added: However, if such an application is made, it will be rejected without discussion because the Cyprus Government solely recognizes the Lebanese Government and the airports and harbors under the control of the Lebanese stateland, not any separatist status which has been created in order to promote partitionist plans at the expense of a friendly country.

I DHIMOKRATIKI: U.S. SPY STATIONS MUST BE ENDED

NC020721 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 2 Feb 81 p 3

[From the "Democratic" column: "It Must Be Answered"]

[Excerpts] So, it has been officially confirmed that U.S. officials went to the occupied north through the illegal Tymbou airport--with the "permission" of the "authorities" of the so-called "Federal Turkish Cypriot State"--in order to inspect the installations at the U.S. station at Yerolakkos. This is neither the first nor the only case of the violation of Cypriot sovereignty by the United States.

This U.S. move must not remain unanswered: It must be faced with the greatest decisiveness in the interest of safeguarding our sovereignty and existence as a state. The government has already made a demarche to the U.S. ambassador in Nicosia. It is imperative that this demarche be followed by other actions--much more decisive--in other directions. And, of course, they should be practical actions within the geographical area of Cyprus. Without delay and without hesitation the government must put an end to the presence of U.S. spy situation on the territory of Cyprus as well as to any other facilities of the Americans. And beyond this, by undertaking a decisive struggle in this connection, it must demand the termination of the U.S. military presence at the British bases, a presence which constitutes a violation of the treaty of establishment.

GOVERNMENT DENIES LINKING AIRPORT, VAROSHA ISSUES

NC311228 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 31 Jan 81

[Text] The Foreign Ministry has issued a statement denying as inaccurate a report that Foreign Minister Rolandhis originated the idea to link the reopening of Nicosia international airport with the resettlement of Famagusta. The statement added: During the [December 1980] New York consulations, the UN secretary general explored the issue and Rolandhis undertook to convey what had been exchanged to the government.

TA NEA Discusses Initiatives

NC011056 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 1 Feb 81 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] Reference to the question of Nicosia airport was made in February 1980 at the initiative of the foreign minister himself, at which time his tendency to link it with the Famagusta issue became evident. This reference was made when Foreign Minister Rolandhis was taking various initiatives--the president had a health crisis then--such as the so-called special mission he carried out in New York.

According to present revelations by reliable sources, in February 1980, following his contacts with U.S. officials and UN Secretary General Waldheim, Rolandhis made a proposal to Waldheim which the latter submitted to the Turkish side in a manner showing that it originated from the United Nations. The proposal provided that: The government of Cyprus would pay to the Turkish side the amount of 50 million pounds in exchange for the return of Famagusta and then discuss the reopening of Nicosia airport.

According to these reliable sources, Rolandhis' proposal, as it had been adopted and submitted to Waldheim, was rejected by the Turkish side which described it as insulting. Consequently, the same sources added, following the foreign minister's inspiration in February 1980, it should not be regarded as astonishing now that initiatives are undertaken by the UN secretary general and other quarters to link the airport question with the Famagusta issue, because these initiatives are a natural continuation of Mr Rolandhis' "special mission."

MITSOTAKIS COMMENTS ON U.S. BASES NEGOTIATIONS

NC311615 Athens NEWS in English 31 Jan 81 p 4

[Text] Both the Greek and American sides are anxious to reach an agreement on the negotiations on the future status of U.S. military bases in Greece, Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis yesterday told political reporters.

He said the talks are being conducted with the correct procedure, but there are still problems to be solved. He predicted the present obstacles would not prove insurmountable and that an agreement would finally be reached.

The presence of U.S. military bases in Greece, Mitsotakis said, is connected to Greece's own defense as well as to U.S. military aid to the country.

The foreign minister said Greece had asked to be briefed on the contents of some technical arrangements included in the Turkey-U.S. defense treaty signed last year, which had been classified secret and not made public at that time. These arrangements concern operation of U.S. bases in Turkey, and Greece wants to be informed on those parts that could bear relevance to the present Greek-U.S. talks. Mitsotakis said the agreement between Greece and the United States "would be a comprehensive one" and that, as soon as it was signed, the government would inform the Greek people about it and would introduce the treaty to Parliament for ratification.

MITSOTAKIS EXPLAINS REFUGEE VISA INSTRUCTIONS

NC311625 Athens NEWS in English 31 Jan 81 p 9

[Text] Foreign Minister Mitsotakis yesterday confirmed he had sent instructions to Greece's ambassadors to Eastern European countries to issue visas to Greek political refugees living there for visits to Greece, but explained the instructions concerned only temporary visit permits, and were to be granted in urgent occasions and for humanitarian reasons. He said these visas which would be in general, only for a short stay, would be granted by the ambassadors, on their judgment and on their exclusive responsibility. Policy on the issue of permanent repatriation of political refugees would remain the same, Mitsotakis said, with applications being examined on an individual basis by the National Security Service (YPEA), but added individual cases would be examined "in a spirit of understanding."

The minister predicted the matter would be arranged, to a large degree, within a year. He also said the Greek Government fully supports the refugees' demand for transfer of pension and social security rights from the countries of present residence to Greece upon repatriation. He emphasized, however, that satisfaction of this demand did not rest with the Greek Government.

AVEROF ANSWERS PAPANDREOU ON NUCLEAR ARMS POLICY

[Correspondent's report]

NC31183 Athens APOYEVMATINI in Greek 31 Jan 81 p 16

[Excerpts] Ioannina, 31 Jan--In an interview carried by today's local paper PROINOS LOGOS, Defense Minister Averof says the following:

He answers PASOK Chairman Papandreou on the question of atomic weapons in Greece. He maintains that the elections should be held either in February or March. He discloses why he was not elected New Democracy leader.

Specifically, on the question of nuclear bases in Greece, Mr Averof says: "Today Papandreou accuses us that with the system of dual keys we have stockpiled U.S. atomic bombs. But he knows that since with this system we and the Americans are in possession of separate keys, these small bombs, which we are supposed to possess, cannot be used except with our approval. That is, they would be used following joint accord and solely if, in case of general conflagration, our country would be in danger."

Further on, Mr Averof points out that one one hand Mr Papandreou wants us to make or to buy atomic bombs despite Greek adversities and international laws, and on the other he considers it as terrible to have stored such ammunition--provided we have done so--without any difficulty, without having spent funds, with full certainty that they will be used solely with our own approval. I am aware of the answer. In the second case we would be the target of nuclear attack. The first case solely refers to the event of war against Turkey. But does Mr Papandreou consider the Greeks so naive? Because in the first case--in addition to international violations--the following would happen: In case of world conflct, since we would possess nuclear arms to defend ourselves, it would be equally probable that one would attempt to destroy them with nuclear attacks. In the second case, if we say we shall supply ourselves with nuclear arms--in view of war with Turkey--this would be tantacunt to urging Turkey to also supply itself with such arms and even be the first to use them.

Asked whether or not the fact that he was not elected New Democracy leader was an act of injustice, Mr Averof said: No, it was not. The election of the leader took place in accordance with the procedure stipulated by the party's charter, and respect for democracy is not solely the implementation of democratic principles but also the implementation of established procedures. Therefore, there is nothing blameworthy.

About the holding of elections, Mr Averof said that "for various reasons we should have accepted the challenge that the PASOK makes from time to time, for purely propaganda reasons, and should have proclaimed elections for February or March. But now, again for various reasons--this is not the proper time to speak about them--I believe, as the majority of the responsible cadres do, that the full 4-year term in office should be used up. Therefore, if nothing unexpected happens to upset this, elections should be held either in October or November."

MINISTERS COUNCIL RATIFIES U.S. DEFENSE AGREEMENT

TA011731 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 1540 GMT 1 Feb 81

[Text] Ankara, 1 Feb, (AA)--The bilateral agreement, within the framework of NATO, on defense and economic cooperation between Turkey and the United States and two appendixes were ratified by the Council of Ministers and published in the Official Gazette today.

The agreement, which notes that the fields of economy and defense are closely related and accepts that a strong defense depends on a strong economy, stipulates that "the U.S. Government exert every possible effort to provide the financial and technical assistance--which has mutually been agreed upon--for Turkey's development efforts."

According to the agreement, the U.S. Government will assist the Turkish Government in mutually agreed efforts aimed at developing the local production, maintenance, repair and modernization of defense material and equipment.

In return, Turkey will allow the U.S. Government to participate in joint defense measures at certain Turkish Armed Forces installations. [Passage indistinct] will be allowed to have a military liaison office.

[Text] Istanbul, 29 Jan (AA)--President Rauf Denktas of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus who attended the third Islamic summit conference in At-Ta'if arrived in Istanbul today for a two-day stopover on his way back home.

In an airport statement, Denktas stressed the significance of summit resolutions on Al Quds [Jerusalem] and Palestine issues attesting to Islamic unity. The conference preferred not to discuss the Cyprus issue in line with a Turkish Cypriot proposal, President Denktas said, adding that the summit gave him the chance to meet, for the first time, PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat. "Our talks were useful" he added.

THE NETHERLANDS

GOVERNMENT REOPENS DEBATE ON TAIWAN SUBMARINE DEAL

OW300213 Hong Kong AFP in English 0149 GMT 30 Jan 31

[Text] The Hague, Jan 30 (AFP)--Dutch Prime Minister Andreas van Agt has no legal authority to cancel the license granted to a Dutch shipyard for the export of two submarines to Taiwan, despite China's regrettable attitude toward the agreement, he told the parliament last night.

The proposed export of the two vessels to Taiwan provoked Chinese threats of economic reprisals against the Netherlands and a downgrading of diplomatic relations between the two countries.

Parliament, which on December 18 approved by a narrow majority (76 to 74 votes) the government's decision to grant the export license to the shipyard, opened a new debate on the issue yesterday. The vote is expected to take place Tuesday.

The issue seems divided along much the same political lines as one month ago. The leftist opposition wants the government to change its decision, while the liberal wing of the government coalition has reaffirmed approval of the delivery despite possible effects on Sino-Dutch relations.

The coalition's largest party, the Christian Democrats some of whom voted against the government decision in December, still are divided on the issue. The group's spokesman, rather than taking a strong position on the submarine sale, has emphasized the apparent lack of coordination between (liberal) Foreign Affairs Minister Chris van der Klaauw, who is against the sale, and other members of the cabinet.

When yesterday's debate opened, Mr van Agt made it clear that the government would not guarantee financing of the two submarines, raising the question for the first time. It had been assumed that financing was covered without Dutch credit.

The government had previously announced that it would not grant visas to Taiwanese military crews to come to the Netherlands to take possession of the two vessels.

The two decisions apparently are intended to minimize the government's involvement in the affair and to give the situation a purely commercial aspect, thereby hopefully appeasing China.

OPEC MINISTERS ADOPT DEVELOPMENT AID PROGRAM

AU021435 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 2 Feb 81 p 7

[Text] The OPEC finance ministers conference in Vienna has ended with the adoption of a comprehensive development aid program for the Third World. Within the framework of the $4 billion OPEC special fund, the Third World this year is to be granted low-interest loans totaling $500 million, and loans totaling $700 million in 1982. The International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) will get $450 million from OPEC. Moreover, the OPEC countries want to contribute $100 million to a raw material price stabilization fund set up by the United Nations. The OPEC ministers did not make any decision on a financial contribution to the FAO's emergency aid program.

Moscow will again be represented by commission member Georgiy Arbatov, Brezhnev's advisor on relations with Washington.

WIENER ZEITUNG ON MBFR'S CHANGES OF SUCCESS

AU291351 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 29 Jan 81 p 3

[Text] With the background of the change of government in the United States and the continuing tensions surrounding Poland, the 19 delegates from East and West will meet today at the Vienna Hofburg Palace after a 6-week winter break to resume the negotiations on forces reduction in central Europe.

The chances for this 23d round of the conference, which has been underway since October 1973, to bring at least a partial agreement must be judged rather skeptically in view of still unresolved basic issues.

The most essential controversial issue, in the West's view, is the problem of the data comparison that is to establish the exact balance of forces of the two pact systems in central Europe. NATO continues to doubt the official Eastern figures, which indicate an approximate parity of forces in the reduction area, and on the strength of its own records maintains that the Warsaw Pact has a numerical superiority of approximately 150,000 men. The Western demand to clear up these discrepancies has for years been one of the standard topics of the Vienna conference.

Prior to entering into definite agreements, NATO moreover wants to clarify the question of the form of accompanying measures that are to ensure the correct implementation and compliance with the agreements. The East in turn presented in the last round new, modified ideas about the envisaged two-step plan for the reduction of armed forces in central Europe. According to this proposal, 20,000 Soviet soldiers and 13,000 U.S. soldiers are to be withdrawn from central Europe in a first phase, with the unilateral 20,000 men withdrawal of the Soviets from the GDR to be recognized as an advance concession. At the same time, the other national contingents are to be "frozen" at their present strength and to be reduced by a certain percentage in a second phase.

COOLS TO QUIT PS CHAIRMANSHIP, SPITAELS TO SUCCEED

LD021613 Brussels LE SOIR in French 28 Jan 81 p 2

[Jacques van Solinge report: "Andre Cools To Quit Socialist Party [PS] Chairmanship; Guy Spitaels is Candidate"]

[Excerpts] Andre Cools will not seek renewal of his mandate as PS chairman at the Namur congress, 22 February. He informed a PS Executive Committee delegation of his decision at the very moment when political journalists were choosing him by a very comfortable majority as "politician of the year" for 1980. At Mr Cools' request, Guy Spitaels, vice prime minister and minister of communications, has agreed to put forward his candidacy for the PS chairmanship. Mr Cools justifies his decision on the grounds of the accumulation of physical and nervous strain and fatigue following 10 years of political life at the highest level: vice prime minister from 1969 to 1972 and party chairman without a break since then. In fact there has been no lack of trials and conflicts throughout these 10 years.

On Monday afternoon PS Deputy Chairmen Leon Hurez and Herve Brouhon issued a communique stating that, accompanied by Irene Petry and Fernand Delmotte, they visited Chairman Cools, who was unable for health reasons to take part in the PS Executive Committee's weekly meeting.

"We learned," they say, "that while the PS chairman does not intend to vacate his post before 22 February, he is determined neither to seek nor accept renewal of his mandate as chairman."

"Having noted with regret this irrevocable decision and the contacts which Andre Cools held with Guy Spitaels prior to the latter's departure on a government mission to China, we believe that we should support a candidacy which the current vice prime minister has agreed to put forward with a view to securing the PS leadership. We see in this candidacy a desire to maintain the political options democratically decided on by the PS bodies since the Frameries congress."

PCI'S NAPOLITANO MEETS WITH PCB, SOCIALIST LEADERS

LD301145 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 27 Jan 81 pp 1, 16

[Arturo Barioli dispatch: "Napolitano's Talks With Belgian Communist and Socialist Parties"]

[Text] Brussels--PCI Directorate member Comrade Giorgio Napolitano met yesterday with Belgian Communist Party [PCB] Chairman Luis van Geyt. The conversation was also attended by Comrade Nestor Rotella, secretary of the PCI Federation in Belgium, and, on the PCB's behalf, by Politburo member Jan Debrouwere, National Secretary Susa Nudelhole and Central Committee member Jacques Moin.

The two delegations had a broad exchange of views on the situation in both countries and on both parties' policies, as well as on the international situation, and they noted broad agreement on the majority of the issues broached. In particular the Belgian comrades highlighted the great breadth of the movement headed by Socialist-led trade unions against the restrictive policy being pursued by the government and the acute nature of the economic problems assailing Belgium, including, for instance, the crisis in the Walloon iron and steel industry.

They also broadly illustrated the Belgian political forces' stances on the main international issues, on the Polish situation and on the issue of the NATO missiles to be deploved in Europe. With regard to this latte issue they stressed that in Belgium there is a strong current of opinion in support of subordinating any decision on the missiles' deployment to a real development of East-West negotiations on the subject and to the establishment of a so-called gray area in Europe.

For his part, Comrade Napolitano explained the characteristics of the Italian political situation and reported on the PCI's international initiatives, steadfastly inspired by Eurocommunist stances.

In the afternoon, Comrade Napolitano met at Belgian Socialist Party [PSI] headquarters with a delegation composed of Ernest Glinne, chairman of the Socialist group in the European Parliament, and Emy Spelkens and Etienne Godin of the PS Foreign Section. The meeting took place in a cordial atmosphere and permitted a frank exchange of ideas on the issues at present of greatest concern to the two parties and on their respective stances.

There was discussion of the social tensions caused by the deterioration of the economic situation, of relations with the trade unions and of matters relating to the EEC and the international situation. The PS representatives confirmed their commitment to pressing for negotiations on the missiles that will halt the deployment of Soviet SS-20's and prevent the deployment of Pershing-2 and cruise missiles in the NATO countries. They also explained the stance recently adopted by the PS on El Salvador and Latin America in opposition to the dictatorial regimes backed by the United States and the Christian Democratic Union.

During the meeting, emphasis was placed on the significance of the convergence that has recently emerged in the European Parliament between the Socialist group and the Italian Communists on the issue of the budget and on the Polish situation and it was agreed that more systematic relations between the parties would be useful. The PS Politburo issued a statement to this effect before the meeting with Comrade Napolitano.

PAPERS COMMENT ON REAGAN STATEMENTS, LEADERSHIP

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG

DW021135 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 31 Jan-1 Feb 81 p 4

[Commentary signed Schr.: "Patience With Reagan"]

[Text] The least that can be said about Ronald Reagan's first press conference is that it did not disappoint the expectations of those who consider the President predictable. He used the same language at the White House podium as he did a few months ago on the speaker's rostrum during the election campaign. Hardly anything else could have been expected anyway. The transformation of an election program into a government program is a gradual process which takes at least half a year. The concepts need to be examined for their expediency. During that period, a President is entitled to having his mistakes treated with forbearance, at any rate, in American eyes. It is not so definite whether the Soviets and the Europeans are prepared to muster the same patience.

For the time being, a certain speechlessness seems to prevail in the European capitals and in Moscow. Reagan employed a language unheard for quite some time. The ideological undertones are reminiscent of the fifties. That the Soviet Union seeks to enforce the "world revolution" with all the means at its disposal had ceased to be a topic of international discussion. Worlds seem to separate Reagan from Helmut Schmidt's demand for a "strategic balance." The likewise precalculated difficulties with the European allies in general and with Bonn in particular are bound to come soon. By the same token, the Soviet leaders cannot take Reagan's utterances as an invitation to another dialogue of the superpowers.

By his verbal act of strength, Reagan definitely has not facilitated the dialogue with Moscow, but neither has he completely cut it off. His offer of new arms control talks will be carefully read by the Russians, if they intend to prevent him from increasing America's nuclear arms arsenal to introduce into negotiations the new arms developments with which he has threatened.

DIE WELT Commentator

[Commentary signed M.W.: "Leadership Again"]

[Text] What free world statesman in the past decade has said so clearly that the Soviet Union strives for world revolution and world predominance, that it claims the "right" for itself to lie and to commit every crime and that detente policy has therefore remained a one-way street on which Moscow strives for its aims of violence?

President Reagan said it now. One cannot doubt his decision not to tolerate these activities any longer but to resist them. His will to fight international terrorism, and Soviet complicity, instead of wooing terrorist organizations as liberation movements is credible and striking.

For the pacifists, pussyfooters and pusillanimous in the politics of the Western world, this determination of the new American leadership is irritating and probably also alarming. They face the problem of whether to deny following America or to change their way of thinking.

If Europe does not follow the United States on the new course, it will be exposed to Soviet ambitions. Following, not in the sense of obedience but in the sense of community, does not mean confrontation, but a liberal way of standing one's ground; not the danger of war, but safeguarding peace.

Where the West's tendency to be seduced has been so far inviting Moscow's policy of violence, Reagan is now offering leadership. That is a chance and not a risk.

IRAN DEMANDING DELIVERY OF MISSILE-LAUNCHING SHIPS

[Text] Following France's delivery of four Mirage planes to Iraq, Iran is now demanding the delivery of three missile-launching ships purchased from France by the Tehran government. The missile-launching ships have been blocked in Cherbourg for nearly a year as a result of the economic sanctions adopted by the European countries after the hostages were taken at the American Embassy.

FOREIGN MINISTER HOLDS TALKS WITH PLO OFFICIAL

NC022057 Paris AFP in English 2028 GMT 2 Feb 81

[Text] Paris, 2 Feb (AFP)--Faruq Qaddumi, chief of the Palestine Liberation Organization's (PLO) Political Office, said here today after talks with French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet that he was extremely hopeful that planned French initiatives on the Palestinian problem would be successful.

Mr Qaddumi said that Mr Francois-Poncet told him that "France would continue to work as a friendly country with the aim of helping peace."

The PLO official said that Europe was being asked to "recognize the PLO as the only representative of the Palestinian people and the right of that people to establish an independent country."

Mr Qaddumi said that the French foreign minister told him that he would be having talks on the Palestinian issue soon with the new U.S. administration. However, Mr Qaddumi said that the new American administration "was rejecting all dialogue with the PLO, accusing it of being a terrorist organization."

Mr Qaddumi reported that the talks with Mr Francois-Poncet concerned decisons by the recent Islamic summit meeting at At-Ta'if, Saudi Arabia, to apply pressures against the United States and European nations that support Israel. The PLO aide said that the "oil weapon" would figure among the pressures used in the Islamic program. He added that France was "not on the list" of countries against which such pressures would be applied.

GISCARD SET TO VISIT POLAND AT END OF MARCH

[Text] Valery Giscard d'Estaing will pay an official visit to Poland at the end of March and the beginning of April. LE MONDE WEIGHS SIGNIFICANCE OF ISLAMIC SUMMIT

LD021443 Paris LE MONDE in French 30 Jan 81 p 1

[Editorial: "The Limits of the Islamic Consensus"]

[Text The At-Ta'if Islamic summit was attended by many states with differing interests and could not, therefore, give them all satisfaction. As far as Saudi Arabia, the host country, is concerned, the meeting was undoubtedly very positive. The feat of having more than 20 resolutions adopted by the heads of state, or their representatives, from 38 African, Asian and Near East countries is bound to enhance the reputation of Riyadh's ruling family.

Saudi Arabia's political and, above all, financial influence was a determining factor in the adoption of the resolutions on the Israeli-Arab conflict. These documents challenge Security Council resolution 242 and consecrate recognition of the PLO as "the Palestinian people's sole legitimate representative" empowered to "establish an independent state in Palestine," and, above all, the resolutions list an impressive number of measures and sanctions aimed at forcing the international community to resist the Jewish state's "rampant expansionism."

However, it is the very abundance and gravity of the threats made which arouse skepticism. For instance, it is difficult to imagine Saudi Arabia using its oil as a political weapon and running the risk of a confrontation with the United States--mentioned as a target in the At-Ta'if resolutions--with which it is intimately connected in all spheres. It is also doubtful that the African and Asian countries, far removed from the theater of operations, will supply military aid to the warring Arabs and strictly impose the boycott decreed on firms doing business with Israel. Will Turkey, a member of the Islamic conference, break off its diplomatic and trade relations with the Jewish state?

Furthermore, how can the coordination measures be implemented when the Arab countries themselves seem so irremediably divided? Despite considerable efforts, Saudi diplomacy has failed to reconcile the enemy brothers. The handshake between King Hassan II of Morocco and Algerian President Chadli Bendjedid at the foot of the Ka'bah in Mecca merely aroused a dream which quickly vanished. Syria and Jordan are more inclined to fight each other than to join together against Israel. Iraq, completely absorbed by its conflict with Iran, has named the Damascus regime another enemy to be cut down. President al-Asad, on the one hand, and King Husayn and President Saddam Husayn, on the other, obstinately refused to speak to each other throughout the At-Ta'if summit.

Despite the fact that the PLO's ideas triumphed at the conference, Yasir 'Arafat's organization distrusts all its Arab partners which, usually, only pay lipservice to supporting it. Relations between the Fedayeen organization and Jordan, Syria, Iraq and Saudi Arabia are equivocal, difficult or tense in turn and are openly bad with President Sarkis' Lebanon. The PLO, however, enjoys two considerable advantages: its popularity among the Arab masses and the common interest which all the "fraternal" countries have in "ridding themselves" of the Palestinians by encouraging the creation of their own state on the West Bank and in Gaza. However, the results are not completely negative. In At-Ta'if, the Muslim world demonstrated a desire to develop cooperation based on common feelings, cultural characteristics and economic interests. The world community, therefore, would be wrong to underestimate the importance which this new international gathering could have.

BRAZILIAN PRESIDENT, DELEGATION ARRIVE IN PARIS

LD021449 Paris LE MONDE in French 30 Jan 81 p 6

[Text] Wednesday, 28 January, the first day of [Brazilian] President Joao Figueiredo's 5-day official visit to France, was marked by an initial one-on-one meeting with Giscard d'Estaing on economic and energy problems.

The two presidents demonstrated a "common will" to reduce their energy dependence and to develop cooperation in this sphere, said Jacques Blot, assistant spokesman for the Presidency of the Republic. He specified that coal, hydroelectric power and the biomass (carburol) were the preferential sectors.

In a welcoming speech delivered at Orly Airport, Giscard d'Estaing stressed that Brazil is "a great country" whose name is "synonymous with eagerness, determination and confidence." It is, he added, "one of the world's hopes." For his part, General Figueiredo welcomed the development of relations and cooperation between Brazil and France and expressed the hope that this visit might give them a "new boost." The two presidents on Thursday were to have a second meeting during which they were to discuss international issues, notably the consequences of President Reagan's election, the crisis situation in the world and international economic negotiations, particularly the development of relations between the developed and developing countries.

In addition, General Figueiredo and his planning, finance, mines and energy ministers were to have talks at National Council of French Employers headquarters. The holders of the economic portfolios also will have a meeting with their French counterparts and numerous industrialists and businessmen interested in Brazil's development. In addition, the Brazilian foreign minister will be received by Jean Francois-Poncet.

Major Energy Deals Signed

LD021403 Paris LE MONDE in French 1-2 Feb 81 p 6

[Text] [Brazilian President] General Figueiredo, who ends his visit to France with a visit to the nuclear installations near Orange on Sunday, 1 February, expressed on Friday, 30 January, satisfaction at the concrete results and spirit of his visit. Planning Minister Neto, who was due to visit the FRG on Saturday, 31 January, was equally optimistic. The signing of 10 agreements totaling around F4 billion (some being covered by the F1.8 billion draft financial agreement signed Thursday) certainly illustrates the scope of the revival of French-Brazilian cooperation which has been rather stagnant over the past 10 years.

The communique published Friday specifies that the agreements relate essentially to the energy sphere, transporation and electronics. Regarding prospects, the communique mentions oil prospecting, coal and coal gasification and alternative fuels. The Brazilian press reports a positive "euphoria" in the ranks of the Brazilian delegation which is expected in Lisbon on Monday.

At the Industry Ministry in Paris on Friday, 30 January, French industrialists and representatives from Brazilian companies signed a series of contracts and letters of intent, mainly in the energy sector.

The French Metallurgical Enterprise Company and the Industrial Enterprise Union obtained an order for two semisubmersible platforms for the Petrobras oil company. The contract is worth F500 million. A letter of intent was given on the purchase of two additional platforms. The Empain-Schneider group's France-Dunkerque Company received an order for two chemical bulk carriers for Petrobras. The contract is worth F400 million. This guarantees 6 months' work for the Dunkerque shipyard.

Firm orders thus amount to F900 million. However, several letters of intent were also signed: The Porto-Alegre Electricity Company with Alsthom-Atlantique for a 535-megawatt thermal unit ($150 million), the Integral Gas Company [Societe Gaz Integral] (of the Creusot-Loire group) for the construction of a coal gasfification unit (the French share amounting to $12 million), the French National Coal Board for preliminary studies for the development of the Uri coal mine.

Finally, letters of intent are shortly to be signed--once financing questions have been settled--by the General Electricity Company (CGE] and Alsthom-Atlantique for the supply and installation of equipment for the Nilo-Pecanha and Santa Branca hydroelectric power stations (a $160 million plan in which the French share is $40 million), and the CGE and Alsthom-Atlantique are to enter negotiations by mutual agreement for a hydroelectric power station in Corumba.

If all these letters of intent are followed through, the total value of these contracts will be nearly F4 billion. France and Brazil also signed a draft intergovernmental agreement on technological and industrial cooperation in the coal sector and a letter of intent on the exchange of information on alternative fuels. Finally, negotiations apparently are well advanced in the nuclear sector.

FRANCE-SOIR NOTES REAGAN'S BURIAL OF DETENTE

LD021305 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 1-2 Feb 81 pp 1,5

[Benoit Rayski editorial: "The Late detente..."]

[Text] You probably are familiar with this notice which used to appear in many stores: "Credit is dead: Bad debtors killed it."

This is more or less what Ronald Reagan has just said about detente, which he described as a "one-way street" used by the Soviets to "commit any crime, to lie or to cheat." This was, therefore, a funeral oration which was not accompanied by any kind of sorrow for the departed, buried without flowers or wreaths.

This categorical condemnation without right of appeal contrasts strikingly with the farewell to detente expressed by Valery Giscard d'Estaing during his recent television speech. Indeed, he said he preferred the notion of "stabilization" to the word "detente." This is a concept which certainly requires explanation since it is as yet difficult to see to what borders it would be applied and whether it does or does not take the Soviet Union's recent acquisitions into account.

The violence of Reagan's anti-Soviet attack also contrasted with the President of the Republic's remarks stressing the virtues of "restraint" and a "sense of responsibility" (ideas clearly shared by West German Chancellor Schmidt who, taking account of a geographical position very idfferent from that of France, yesterday rejected any desire for confrontation with the USSR).

Valery Giscard d'Estaing gave abundant proof of restraint in talking about one burning issue: Poland. Indeed, the emphasis with which he recalled that country's geopolitical situation was noted, not only in Paris or Warsaw, but also in Moscow where those remarks were widely quoted. Recalling the fact that Poland is part of, or surrounded by, the communist bloc constitutes a wise and cautious remark when addressed to the Poles: "Do not go too far because you would spark off a Soviet intervention...." However, this exhortation has a serious disadvantage since it is also deciphered in the following way by the Soviet Union: "Poland is with you and we [apparent line drop].

Of course, this is not a simple debate. Should we make loud statements--irresponsible statements, Valery Giscard d'Estaing would say--urging the Polish people to sweep away the communist system, while knowing that nothing would be done to help them the day the Soviet tanks came to crush them.

Should we, on the the other hand, preach calm, caution and even resignation at the risk of encouraging the Soviet Union's claim to a right of inspection, oppression and punishment over a country which is not--it would be unjust and ridiculous to accept that it is--doomed by some too readily accepted fatality to eternal subservience.

This is food for thought, and it has to be admitted that the problem is not easy. However, there may be another approach which would avoid some traps. Instead of constantly telling the Poles: "Don't do anything because we will do nothing foryou." We could address the Soviet Union and it alone, indicating, bluntly if necessary, "Don't lay a finger on Poland because we would react." Yes, but how would we react? Deterrence consists precisely, and in this case too, in not saying how.

We also could remind the Soviet Union--this would at least have the advantage of worrying and curbing it--that we in no way regard its domination over Poland and the other people's democracies as legitimate and established.

Moreover, this idea is outlined in a document drawn up by Richard Allen, Reagan's foreign policy adviser, which says that the Soviet acquisitions in East Europe should not be accepted as "a permanent historical fact."

The history which has seen Tito's Yugoslavia escape from the Soviet grasp (in the middle of the cold war and without any intervention by the USSR), China standing up to Moscow (without the Soviet Union being able to stop it from doing so), and the history which has seen pro-American regimes in Indochina or Iran collapse is not written once and for all in one way or another. For when the earth quakes, and it is quaking in Poland, you have to accept the shock waves.

LIBERIAN ENVOY STRESSES NEED FOR FINANCIAL AID

AB301455 Paris AFP in English 1438 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Excerpts] Paris, 30 Jan (AFP)--Liberia needs financial help and is seeking aid from those who might give some, be it the United States or Libya, the west African states's new ambassador to France, Prince N.A. Browne said here.

Mr Browne, who is the first ambassador to be named since the coup d'etat in Liberia last April, was speaking after presenting his credentials to French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing yesterday.

The new rulers inherited debts of 700 million dollars, Mr Browne said. He added that assassinated President William Tolbert, during his eight years in power, had appropriated 800 million dollars, the ambassador added.

The ambassador said that by the first anniversary of the coup there would be no more political prisoners in Liberian prisons. He put the number of political prisoners held at less than 100.

LAUNCHING OF ARIANE MISSILE SET FOR JUNE

NC020841 Paris AFP in English 2 Feb 81

[Text] Paris, 2 Feb (AFP)--The next launching of the European missile Ariane has been set for late June, it was announced today by the European Space Agency (ESA) and the French National Centre for Space Studies (CNES).

The second launching of the missile last May 23 aborted shortly after blast-off. According to the CNES the failure has now been clearly "identified" as due to unstable combustion in one of the four motors--an official confirmation of earlier speculation.

The fault was localized in the fuel injectors in the missile's first stage, the CNES indicated. The injectors are now being modified to withstand the violent stress of take-off, though it is not known exactly when the work will be completed.

Ariane was scheduled to put two satellites into orbit at the June launching, one of them the European meteorological satellite, Meteostat. Thereafter, a fourth and final trial launching will take place in October, before the missile becomes fully operational on a commercial basis. If all goes well, there will be five launchings next year--roughly one every two months.

PCF'S GREMETZ CRITICIZES GISCARD'S POLICIES

LD280917 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 23 Jan 81 p 9

[Text] Following the meeting of the National Assembly's Foreign Affairs Commission at which Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet made a speech, Maxime Gremetz, secretary of the PCF Central Committee and deputy for La Somme, made this statement:

As could be foreseen, the foreign minister has attempted to justify the pernicious policy of Giscard d'Estaing in Africa, confirming fully that this is determined by the interests of the multinational companies based in France and the desire to use all means to oppose the peoples' liberation movement.

Now that Libya and Chad, in accordance with the Lagos agreements, believe that the project to unite the two countries may not take place before consultations between the two peoples, the Giscard government is using every pretext to impose on the African peoples a reinforced military presence on the continent. He then wishes to create the best possible conditions for the pursuit of unwarranted interference in the affairs of Chad, including military intervention. After there already have been numerous instances of interference on this continent, Giscard wishes to adopt a big stick policy, the attitude of French imperialism is that of Africa's policeman.

This dangerous policy turns its back on genuine cooperation at a time when a new economic order is being established, for which the communists are fighting, and yet it is not only the African peoples' interests but our own interests that are involved.

Regarding Europe, the minister thought it right to reaffirm the government's intention not to give way on the budgetary decision made by the European Parliament, under the authority of Simone Veil, who headed the UDF list at the European elections and was voted for by the RPR, UDF and PS deputies. A fine example of the tripartite consensus! In fact, all this reveals and illustrates once again the extreme duplicity of Giscard's government, which in fact acted to extend the powers of the European Parliament. It was Giscard himself who in 1975 proposed legislation which aimed to increase the budgetary jurisdiction of the European Parliament. It is the French Government which is militating actively for a common foreign policy in the EEC and which has, in addition, yielded to pressure from Britain over the repayment of FR4 billion.

Finally, it is Giscard's government which is collaborating in launching a common policy on arms production.

Because he is now engaged in an election campaign, he is feigning opposition to the European Parliament. He is shouting louder than ever since he intends to give up the fight after the election, just as he already has done in the case of Britain. In effect, he believes in confronting public opinion and he seeks to camouflage his abandonemnt of sovereignty by attempting to appear as the defender of national independence, while the facts show that he is nothing of the sort. The Communist Party will fight such a policy vigorously. Its representatives in the European Parliament are adamantly defending and will continue to defend our national sovereignty and our country's freedom of decision. By doing this, they are defending the interests of France as well as of the workers, with whose support they will continue resolutely along this line.

LE MONDE VIEWS OUTCOME OF GISCARD TRIP TO ROME

[Editorial: "Detente and Differences of Opinion Between Rome and Paris"]

[Text] Cordiality, friendship, solidarity--these, Mr Giscard d'Estaing said at the end of his official working visit to Rome on Friday, 23 January, should be the key words in French-Italian cooperation which is based on "very convergent interests." These warm words and the importance attached by the Elysee to this new French-Italian summit do not stem only from the diplomatic amiability which exists on such occasions but also reflect an intention to allay the fears and irritation which some attitudes had aroused in Rome. Didn't President Pertini himself--well-known, it is true, for his frankness-go so far as to refer to "French arrogance?"

The Italians were, in particular, afraid of seeing the French give too systematic a preference to their relations with Bonn within the European Community, at the expense of French-Italian relations. Above all, there was a feeling that Paris was seeking, in the various international meetings (such as the one attended by the Americans, British, Germans and French in Guadeloupe in January 1979), to exclude its Italian partner from the group of "great powers." That is why Rome is now noting with satisfaction Mr Giscard d'Estaing's assurance that no new limited international conference will be organized before the meeting between the seven most highly industrialized countries in Ottawa next July.

In another sphere in which France has treated Italy in rather a cavalier fashion, the results of Mr Giscard d'Estaing's visit are less conclusive: relations with Tripoli. Owing to Libyan enterprises in Africa, Paris recently expressed the hope that Mr al-Qadhdhafi might not be officially received in Italy (or, moreover, in the FRG). The approach aroused justifiable surprise and it does not seem that the French received the assurances for which they had hoped in this respect or, more generally, an Italian pledge in favor of a hardline policy toward Libya. There are too many historical ties and commercial interests between the two countries for the Rome government to be overanxious to follow the French recommendations.

As for French-Italian cooperation in the struggle against terrorism, Mr Giscard d'Estaing told the press that it was being pursued in the closest possible way between the competent bodies in the two countries, respecting current legislation. This detail suggests that the main Italian grievance against France in this sphere--the restrictions imposed by the French magistrates on the extradition of Italian terrorists--has not given rise to a new interpretation of the extradition agreements.

On European issues, the two sides expressed the wish to see the common agricultural policy make new progress and, according to Prime Minister Forlani, expressed "extremely similar" viewpoints on community problems. This seems to indicate that there was no detailed examination of the budgetary quarrel in which the two capitals have considerably different stances, since Rome approves of the new budget which Paris rejects. However, in this as in other spheres, Mr Giscard d'Estaing's aim was not so much to change the content of French-Italian cooperation as to ease and improve its atmosphere somewhat.

BRAZILIAN PRESIDENT ARRIVES FOR 4-DAY VISIT

LD012112 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 1 Feb 81

[Excerpts] Brazilian President Joao Baptista de Figueiredo has arrived in Lisbon on an official 4-day visit. The president's flight landed at 1647. President Figueiredo is accompanied by his wife and a retinue of over 100. The Brazilian president was met at Lisbon airport by President Ramalho Eanes and wife, Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao and other officials.

Here are the Brazilian president's first words on setting foot in Portugal:

[Begin recording] Still under the emotion of my arrival in this country, I greet the valorous Portuguese people. With my words and my presence I am conveying, on behalf of all Brazilians, a message of profound friendship to this friendly and fraternal people.

To Brazilians this is a festive day, for today we are in Portugal. Brazilians and Portuguese are fraternally united by centuries of a shared existence. By their common [words indistinct] commitment to the cause of progress, freedom and peace.

Through their courage and hard work the people of this country have forged links that firmly unite our two nations across the ocean. These links of history and of fraternal coexistence also provide us with an excellent opportunity and a challenge--the opportunity and challenge of continuing with resolve and renewed creativity along the path of strengthening our relations and of carrying on the struggle for the realization of the aspirations of our peoples.

We need not look for explanations for the feelings that strongly characterize the ties that unite us; they are born and develop naturally and spontaneously, and in a situation of international crisis, when increasing obstacles are being raised to the harmonious coexistence of the peoples, our mutual affection, cordiality and respect become all the more valuable and exemplary.

Within the next few days I will be looking for new fields of common interest and understanding. Furthermore, I will seek to share in the life of the noble Portuguese people, to listen to their voices and to their hearts. This is the spirit that brings me to Portugal.

Long live Portugal! Long live Brazil! [end recording]

President Joao Figueiredo's visit may mark the end of a certain aloofness that has characterized the relations between the two countries since the days of the Marcelo Caetano regime, when Brazil was beginning its economic penetration in Africa, especially in the then Portuguese colonies. Because of this they rejected Marcelo Caetano's aim of setting up a federation with the Portuguese-ruled African territories, and made this rejection clear at the United Nations.

The political situation in Portugal after 25 April 1974 was not to the liking of the Brazilian Government, as evidenced by the fact that the then President Geisel did not come to Portugal when he visited France in 1976. An added difficulty further hindered the improvement of relations: the Brazilian Government does not regard Portugal as having any special role in its relations with our former colonies. Brazil says that it has no need for middlemen, and only now has Brazil decided that conditions exist for turning a new page in relations between the two countries.

During his stay in Portugal, Joao Baptista de Figueiredo will sign several cooperation agreements with the Portuguese authorities, particularly in the economic, industrial and tourist spheres.

Figueiredo will hold talks with Ramalho Eanes and Pinto Balsemao, address the Assembly of the Republic, and will visit the city of Oporto on the last day of his visit. During the latter he will be accompanied by President Ramalho Eanes.

FOREIGN MINISTER VIEWS FOREIGN POLICY ISSUES

LD301448 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Excerpt] Portugal's new Foreign Minister Andre Goncalves Pereira has said that since the country is not yet a member of the European Economic Community, it's stand does not have to coincide with that of the EEC member countries although it is very important to take their stand into account. Nor, for that matter, he said in an interview with Lisbon's daily DIARIO DE NOTICIAS, do we have to take a position which is closer to the United States than any other country.

In his first newspaper interview since taking office, the Portuguese foreign minister, after analyzing high-priority matters in his portfolio, such as EEC membership, relations with the United States, the East Timor issue and cooperation with former African colonies, went on to comment on relations with the Soviet Union in light of developments that took place during the term of office of the preceding administration. He said: Perhaps we had an ideological conflict with communist expansionism but we are not in direct conflict with this or that country. In cases where there are generalized actions which in our view are justified as, for instance, the worldwide reaction against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, Goncalves Pereira pointed out, it is possible that we would go along with Western moves as long as we feel that they are productive.

The foreign minister, who is a specialist in international law, then made some observations on the release of the 52 U.S. hostages before going on to dwell on the outcome of the parliamentary and presidential elections in his country. He said he visualized a world closer to social democracy.

LABOR CONFEDERATION ELECTS NEW SECRETARIAT

LD021524 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0800 GMT 2 Feb 81

[Excerpts] The congress of the General Confederation of Labor [UGT] closed in Lisbon yesterday with the election of its new secretariat. There was a single list of candidates resulting from the consensus between the trade unionists of the Socialist and Social Democratic parties.

Social Democrat Miguel Pacheco and Socialist Jose Manuel Torres Couto were reelected president and secretary general of the UGT, respectively. The latter, in his concluding speech, stressed that the differences of views that had emerged in the course of the congress provided the best proof of the UGT's internal democracy. He added that the government and the employers will have to reckon with the UGT as a conscientious social partner who will not give in a single inch in the defense of the workers' interests.

One of the motions passed by the congress issued a challenge to the General Federation of Portuguese Workers/National Intersindical to accept trade union elections.

PCE DENIES RECEIVING FINANCIAL AID FROM CCP

LD021153 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 28 Jan 81 p 15

[Text] The PCE press office stated in a note issued yesterday that it is not receiving financial aid of any kind from the CCP. It states in the document that, in light of the report published in a national weekly dated 1 February under the heading "The PCE's Chinese Millions," "we deem ourselves obliged to state clearly that its contents do not correspond to the truth."

"We do not know," the PCE continues, "what the 'Madrid journalistic and financial circles' are from which the inaccurate information disseminated is said to be 'confirmed,' but we find ourselves obliged," the note adds, "to warn of the indubitable lack of reliability of the alleged informants in this specific instance."

"The PCE's political and ideological independence corresponds very precisely," the document continues, "to its financial independence, since the PCE's sources of finance are no other than the income from subscriptions, donations from party members and supporters, fundraising festivals and campaigns and a respectable percentage of the incomes of party members with public posts, as well as the official aid provided by the state for the legal political parties."

NEWSPAPERS CRITICIZE INVOLVEMENT IN IRAN-IRAQ WAR

KHARAVYI Article

NC031015 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 3 Feb 81 p 8

[Text] In spite of the French Foreign Ministry's official statement that four military airplanes of the Mirage-I type arrived at Larnaca airport last Saturday and then headed for Iraq, the government spokesman yesterday reiterated last Saturday's official statement that "the Cyprus Government had given permission for the temporary stationing at Larnaca airport of six Jordanian aircraft for refueling purposes." The government spokesman denied that another six "Jordanian" airplanes had lanced at Larnaca airport last Sunday destined for Iraq.

Replying to a question as to whether the responsible authorities of the republic knew that the six airplanes, which had landed at the airport, were not "Jordanian" but French "Mirages," the government spokesman confined himself to saying that in this instance "the usual procedure had been followed," letting it be understood that they were usual landings not connected with the Iraq-Iran war. However, the draconian security measures, which had been taken in the entire vicinity of Larnaca airport with heavily armed forces from the mechanized unit ready for immediate action, lead to the conclusion that the government knew both the type of planes and their true destination.

In any case, the use of Larnaca airport for the despatch of the French military planes to Iraq, which is in a state of war with Iran, has caused strong reaction and great uneasiness in political circles. Cypriot public opinion disapproves of the slightest indirect involvement of Cyprus' in the Iraq-Iran war, because such an involvement not only conflicts with Cypriot nonaligned and pacific policy but could also provoke strong reaction by the friendly Arab countries which support the Cypriot struggle for a peaceful, permanent and equitable solution of the Cyprus problem.

It seems that the Cyprus Government has also realized this danger and, as we have learned, has hastened through Foreign Minister Rolandhis to explain to the Syrian ambassador here the circumstances under which permission was granted for the landing of the French "Mirages" at Larnaca airport. These explanations have already been conveyed to both Syria's foreign minister and to President Hafiz al-Asad. We were given to understand that other Arab and nonaligned countries will also be briefed in this connection.

O AGON Report

NC030901 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 3 Feb 81 p 1

[The "My Opinion" column by the observer: "A Most Unfortunate Act"]

[Text] The Cyprus Government's act of granting facilities to Iraq so that it could take delivery of military planes which that country can surely use in the war it is waging against Iran constitutes a clear deviation from the principles of nonalignment.

We are afraid that this act of the Cypriot authorities will probably cause very unpleasant reactions against Cyprus on Iran's part and perhaps on the part of other people, and will create very unfavorable impressions concerning the foreign policy Cyprus follows.

Cyprus must not only appear or say that it follows a nonaligned policy, it must implement a truly independent policy. But, unfortunately, our stance on the Afghanistan issue in the past and on the issue of the current war between Iran and Iraq shake trust and create doubts both abroad and internally regarding the sincerity with which the Cypriot Government exercises its nonaligned policy.

Consequently, the government's act of permitting the use of Cypriot soil as a transit station for the delivery of military supplies to Iraq has been most unfortunate, to say the least.

Currently, two nonaligned countries, Iraq and Iran, are waging a tough, long and merciless war. This war is a tragedy for both countries. Thousands of people are being killed on the battlefronts and the economic and other destruction caused by the war runs into billions.

We are not examining who began this slaughter, who is the victim and who the victimizer, who the guilty and who the innocent.

Right now, however, Iraq is acting as a conqueror. It is forcibly occupying Iranian soil and will not return it unless its terms are accepted. Many people see it as the aggressor who has occupied and will not depart, more or less as Turkey is doing in Cyprus.

What should Cyprus' stance have been in this mutual slaughter of two countries that belong to the nonaligned camp?

Cyprus should have played the role of the fire extinguisher. Even with its little power, it should have contributed, in cooperation with other nonaligned countries, to the termination of the two countries' hardships. Strict neutrality should have governed our entire stance. Any act that could have tended to create the impression that Cyprus supports one or the other belligerent should have been avoided.

Unfortunately, we did not avoid getting involved. We granted facilities to one of the belligerents. We allowed the landing of French military planes on Cypriot soil which then were taken by the Iraqis, naturally to be channeled to the battlefields.

This position cannot be fair. This policy cannot agree with the principles of the nonaligned world nor can it bring anything positive to Cyprus.

The government shoud not have become involved in any way in the shocking tragedy of the two countries. It should not have played with fire so that we might avoid burning our hands. Unfortunately, it became involved and exposed itself.

Naturally, the viewpoint exists that the government unwittingly found itself involved. It was deceived by some people. This is not a serious excuse. The responsible people should have been all eyes. Nobody will now believe that the government was deceived. After all, it is not serious for a government to claim that it was deceived.

However, regardless of what has happened the truth is: Currently Cyprus appears to be aiding Iraq, even though in an indirect way, and to be offending Iran, and this will not pass unobserved by some people.

GOVERNMENT SIGNS TRADE PROTOCOL WITH CSSR

NC301808 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 30 Jan 81

[Text] Today, Cyprus and CSSR signed a trade protocol at the Commerce Ministry; the protocol will cover trade exchanges between the two countries in 1981. Commerce Minister Kittis signed on behalf of Cyprus and Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade Jakubik signed on behalf of Czechoslovakia.

Addressing the Czechoslovak official, Mr Kittis said that in view of the fact that prospects for international trade are rather unfavorable, trade protocols, such as today's protocol, are valuable. Mr Kittis accepted an invitation from Mr Jakubik to visit Czechoslovakia. Mr Jakubik said the trade protocol is another step toward further improvement of the already good relations between Cyprus and Czechoslovakia.

After the signing of the trade protocol, Finance Minister Avxendiou and Mr Jakubik exchanged letters referring to the better utilization of credit facilities provided by Czechoslovakia to Cyprus in accordance with the provisions of the existing agreement between the two countries. Mr Avxendiou thanked the CSSR for its support and friendship and said that both the trade protocol and the exchange of letters constitute another proof of the friendly ties between the two countries.

MIKHAILIDHIS COMMENTS ON INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

NC311850 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 31 Jan 81

[Text] Speaking at today's meeting of party cadres, New Democratic Front Chairman Mikhailidhis stressed that in order to save the intercommunal dialogue, the government must demand the Turkish side negotiate substantively on the four subjects included in the agenda. The complication of the negotiations, Mikhailidhis added, not only will lead to a deadlock but will also help the Turkish side cover up the true reason progress has not been achieved, which is that it has refused to speak substantively on the territorial and constitutional issues.

Mikhailidhis further stressed that there is no economic embargo against the Turkish Cypriots but a political protection of our rights as a UN member state that is experiencing the consequences of occupation by Turkish troops. The lifting of the political embargo, he added, would mean the upgrading of Denktas' administration with our own consent.

PAPER BLAMES WEST'S 'COLD WAR STANCE' FOR DEADLOCK

NC020940 Nicosia ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 2 Feb 81 p 1

[Editorial: "Positions of the West and Cyprus"]

[Excerpts] The people of Cyprus are conscious of some true facts which are connected with their future as a people and as a state. For example, they are conscious of the fact that Turkish intransigence is impeding a fair, viable and acceptable Cyprus solution. Moreover, they are conscious of the fact that this intransigence is directly or indirectly condoned by the West which has recently shamelessly displayed favor for the aggressor. The people of Cyprus know that if Turkey's Western allies ever decide to point out to Turkey that it is high time it align itself with the international principles and declarations to which the West is faithful and devoted, the Cyprus problem would be resolved overnight.

However, the West does not do so. It appears to be determined to sacrifice principles and values for the sake of cheap expediencies. At the same time it mobilizes its local facilities to make propaganda for solutions which have no connection with the substance of the Cyprus problem or with the principles and values which the West has been boastfully declaring.

It is, of course, a fact that the intercommunal dialogue is in a de facto deadlock. And the people know this just as they know that it is ridiculous to accuse the government of being responsible for the deadlock. The truth is one: The dialogue does not progress because Turkey's allies do not pressure Turkey to proceed toward an honest solution. Moreover, Turkish intransigence is encouraged by the positions of some parties which are devoted to the West and which have been talking about mistakes [committed by the government]. But the sacrificing of the West's principles and values for the sake of cheap expediencies--a phenomenon which has been introduced into our political affairs as well--has been officially expressed since President Reagan's takeover at the White House.

At his first press conference he declared, in a few words, a cold war. This is clear and undeniable evidence that the West places the solution of the Cyprus problem (just as it wishes to) within the framework of cold war relations with the East. This means that the goal is the abolition of the nonalignment of the Cyprus state. However, the shield of Cyprus' independence in the international field is within the camp of the nonaligned countries. Irrespective of how much this camp is being scoffed at by various circles, the nonaligned camp has proved by deeds its determination to defend the independence and the nonalignment of the Cyprus state. And this is so because it is well known that Cyprus' cause is their cause as well, otherwise all the nonaligned states would live under a state of threat.

DENKTAS SAYS TURKS CAN'T RECOGNIZE GOVERNMENT

TA021003 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 2 Feb 81

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said the fact that the leader of the Greek Cypriot community, Kiprianou, continues to portray to the world the illegal Greek Cypriot administration established through the force of arms as the Government of Cyprus proves that the policy envisaged in the Akritas plan has not been abandoned. In a statement today in connection with Kiprianou's recent anti-Turkey and anti-Turkish Cypriot statements, Denktas said the illegal administration established under the so-called title of Government of Cyprus is a bloody fait accompli that will never be endorsed by the Turkish Cypriot community.

Noting that the Greek Cypriot side has been obstructing the formation of a committee to deal with the missing persons issue, Denktas said: We are in a position to prove this. Replying to Kiprianou's remark that all refugees will return to their homes, Denktas said the issue of the return of refugees to their homes is not being discussed at the intercommunal talks and that Kiprianou is deceiving himself as well as the Greek Cypriot community.

I KATHIMERINI: NEGOTIATIONS CONTINUE ON U.S. BASES

NC021008 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 2 Feb 81 pp 1, 3

[Text] U.S. persistence in not accepting the most basic of the Greek positions on the bases is delaying the beginning of substantive negotiations and reducing the Greek-U.S. dialogue to a comparison of differences on either side. This has emerged from the meetings held to date between the two sides, especially as a result of the United States' refusal to commit itself to a guarantee of balance of forces in the area.

Given these facts of Greek-U.S. differences and the lack of indications--at the current stage at least--for a change in the U.S. position, authoritative circles estimate that the substantive talks which concern the Greek side will begin around March. At the same time, they note that the differences which crop up during the negotiations are such that these may need to be settled at a level different from that of the negotiating teams.

The fact that as of tomorrow the meetings, which had been suspended last Thursday, will not be held daily but every other day (Monday, Wednesday, Friday) confirms the slow pace at which the dialogue is progressing as a result of the successive rejections of Greek positions.

More specifically, the differences ascertained during last week's meeting during the examination of the principal agreement's text (Greek) on the bases, were pinpointed at a number of points, the most basic ones aiming at the complete guarantee of Greek interests being the following:

The Greek side insists that the U.S. bases in our country operate within the framework of NATO aims only. In contrast, the U.S. side demands that the operation of the bases not be confined to the limits set by the Atlantic alliance's aims, but that the operation be extended to issues of bilateral cooperation.

This U.S. demand is dictated by the possibility, given to the United States by the provision in the main agreement for "serving bilateral defense issues," of expanding the aims of its bases in proportion with U.S. interests in the broader Mediterranean area.

The United States refuses to commit itself to guarantees that will protect and consolidate--as the Greek side demands--the balance in the Aegean. These guarantees concern both the economic and the U.S. contribution for not upsetting the balance of forces in the area through dynamic means.

The basic U.S. argument for rejecting any commitment is that the executive power cannot commit or force the legislative organ, the Congress, into specific adoption of government proposals.

This U.S. refusal places at stake the 7-10 proportional aid to Greece and Turkey since the U.S. aim is not to include in the main agreement a provision similar to the one in the secret agreement between Bitsios and Kissinger (that was included in the agreement which was initialed in 1977) and which for the first time protected this proportion ($700 million to Greece and $1 billion to Turkey).

The United States refuses to accept a Greek point which aims at more general guarantees in case of a national crisis, internal or external.

Specifically, the Greek side is demanding that in case of some national crisis the possibility of suspension (for a period to be determined by the specific circumstances) of the U.S. bases' activity in our country be included among the means which the government will consider necessary for coping with the crisis.

Another relevant U.S. refusal of a completely justified Greek proposal that is dictated by the operation of the bases within the NATO framework concerns almost the same issue. Our country is demanding that in case some base attempts to expand its activities and departs from its envisaged purpose, consultations should take place between the two governments and, should they not lead to an agreement, the specific activity and operation of the base would be suspended immediately.

It also seems that the United States refuses to accept the complete and clear enumeration of the specific possibilities and activities which the already known bases have or will acquire within the framework of the modernization of their facilities.

Furthermore, according to reports, almost all the letters, which refer to the size of the economic-military aid to our country and their exchanges for the bases' operation have been prepared. However, their delivery may be delayed because the Greek side will hinge their discussions on developments on the issue of U.S. guarantees for a balance in the area.

The Greek side may follow these tactics because it attaches great significance to the issue of balance. It is possible that discussions may pass from the level of the two negotiating teams to personal consultations between secretary general of the Foreign Ministry and head of the Greek team Ambassador St. Roussos and U.S. Ambassador R. McCloskey. In fact, diplomatic circles do not preclude a meeting between the U.S. ambassador and Prime Minister G. Rallis in case discussions between Roussos and McCloskey do not reach some result.

Following the exchange of viewpoints on the main agreement, after tomorrow, Greek-U.S. meetings will discuss the defense cooperation agreement. Its examination is expected to take all of next week, and perhaps the following week, when discussions between Greece and the United States will be on issues that refer to cooperation on the issue of military industry.

NEWS: PAPANDREOU PREDICTS PASOK RISE TO POWER

NC020851 Athens NEWS in English 1 Feb 81 pp 1, 12

[Text] The president of PASOK, Mr Andreas Papandreou, made a speech yesterday at a dinner given by his party's labor union committee, in which he said that Greece had reached one of the most important turning points in its modern history.

"We are approaching a historic meeting, a meeting at the rolling booths--between reactionary powers and the powers of change," he said, "powers which express and make concrete the vision of our betrayed people."

The victory message, continued Mr Papandreou, reaches all corners of Greece, and PASOK's course towards the people is like an avalanche which will lead PASOK to the government and the people into power.

The right is not only the political expression of economic oligarchy, it is at the same time a conduit for foreign control over our land, the guarantor of strategic and economic benefits to the "protecting" power.

In the half century which has passed, said Mr Papandreou, the right has built a one-party state. PASOK indisputably will arrange for a comfortable majority of seats for a self-powered government.

It would be a mistake, however, continued the PASOK president, to believe that that is enough to realize the vision of change to a tangible reality. Because we would be faced directly with the partisan, corrupt, centralized, bureaucratic state structure of the right, PASOK will intervene decisively in these structures which transform the state from a servant and assistant of the people to its oppressor.

"Can foreign and local reactionary powers again hinder the course of the people to power?" asked Mr Papandreou. The answer is negative. This time the people will win and PASOK, the vanguard of the people's movement, will govern.

Those who are nostalgic for the 7-year dictatorship, and especially their newspaper, allowed people to believe that there is, on the horizon, the possibility of intervention by the military, if the right's power is threatened. These allusions or exhortations constitute an insult to the country's armed forces, and the Prosecutor's Office should have already set itself in motion.

However, the 21st April--the foreign-motivated coup of the colonels which trapped the military forces--will not be repeated. Those seven years led to the squandering of public money, to the moral corrosion of the state machine, to the crude oppression of our proud people, to the weakening of military strength, to the betrayal of Cyprus and to the emboldening of Turkey to appropriate half the Aegean.

No foreign power can intervene in Greece because the people and the young military personnel are united in the common fight for national independence, the sovereignty of the people and democratic institutions.

Mr Papandreous said it was certain that PASOK, as tomorrow's government, would inherit chaos and ruins. That was why, he said, he had stressed that PASOK were not miracle-workers. Mature people know that to slow the downward trend of the Greek economy will demand a coordinated national effort. It will demand measures which, as well as overcoming the present crisis, will lay the foundations for the course toward a socialist transformation of our society.

The PASOK president said that PASOK as the government would take immediate steps to cope with inflation, and the unacceptably high balance of trade deficit.

Unemployment, he said, constitutes a serious problem in Greece. The government announces the percentage as about 2.5 percent, whereas in official figures it raises the percentage to 6 percent, and the EEC talks about 15-17 percent. The only way to effectively cope with it is found in the speedy development of the national product--which constitutes one of PASOK's basic aims.

Mr Papandreou spoke of the government's slogan "You are in the EEC" saying that the hour had come for New Democracy to realize what the consequences were on the economy of Greece's accession to the EEC. PASOK's positions on the subject were well known, he said, and did not need repeating. The conditions for Greece's entry were unacceptable, and the transition period would lead to a dangerous deepening of the economic impasse.

The PASOK president also referred to the return to the military structure of NATO, and the bases agreement.

Finally, said Mr Papandreou, the people's movement in Greece--with PASOK as its political vanguard, was assuming gigantic dimensions. It had turned into an avalanche which would sweep away the opposition and lay the foundations for a new era for the people and the country--where the people would open an avenue which led to national independence, sovereignty of the people and social liberation, leading to a Greece which belongs to the Greeks.

PAPERS REPORT ON EUROPEAN COUNCIL DEBATE

[Mehmet Ali Birand report from Strasbourg]

[Text] The General Assembly of the Council of Europe overwhelmingly approved a resolution submitted by the Political Committee which stipulates that Turkey should be given an extension [on the question of its Council membership following the recent military takeover], that developments in Turkey should be closely watched, and that the situation should be reviewed in May.

The debate lasted 2 days and the assembly was addressed by 53 representatives. All the Turkish parliamentarians abstained from voting, and only 4 of those present in the hall voted against the resolution, while 15 others abstained like the Turkish parliamentarians.

Commenting on the resolution, [Turkish delegate] Muammer Aksoy said: "Our present predicament is due to the failure of our politicians." Aksoy maintained that the help of the Turkish Armed Forces is needed if Turkey's return to democracy is to be facilitated and not impeded.

[Turkish delegate] Metin Toker who was the last to address the assembly before the vote, said: "Don't be more Turkish than the Turks themselves," and asked how could people who have not been to Turkey even once pass judgment on Turkey. Metin Toker continued: "We trust our soldiers. They came to power twice before and they said they would go and they went. There is absolutely no indication that they will act differently this time."

Metin Toker then said that the pledge that a constituent assembly would be set up appears to have been belittled, and added: "This constituent assembly will not be formed by appointment. It is going to be of a representative nature."

[Turkish delegate] Turan Gunes addressed the assembly after the voting and expressed his "horror at the ignorance" of some members of the Council regarding the situation in Turkey and wondered how a resolution could be adopted on the basis of information provided by certain establishments and grounds of unknown origin. In his strongly-worded speech, Gunes said: "Don't believe everything they tell you."

[Council official Ludwig] Steiner will soon come to Turkey again to prepare another report. Moreover, president of the Council de Coster and the secretary general will watch the situation in Turkey and report to the general assembly on the developments by May.

HURRIYET Editorial

[Editorial by Oktay Eksil "Neither Through Black nor Through Rose-colored Spectacles"]

[Excerpts] The General Assembly of the Council of Europe has decided to review the situation in Turkey again in May and also to watch the developments in Turkey very closely. But, unfortunately, this resolution gives the impression that the past 4 and 1/2 months have not been properly evaluated and that certain facts have not been taken into consideration. The resolution did envisage that the degree of respect which Turkey shows to the Human Rights Convention will be determined in future evaluations, but the assembly pretended ignorance of what the administration in Turkey has said on this subject and of the investigations it has launched. For example, it has failed to make the slightest reference to these investigations regarding torture allegations.

The General Assembly has, moreover, also failed to acknowledge the "soldier's pledge" made by Head of State Gen Kenan Evren regarding the formation of a constituent assembly, and the resolute promise given by the National Security Council that democracy will be returned to Turkey.

We believe that acting in the way it has, the Council has created the impression that it has dissociated itself from the principle of "impartiality" which we have a right to expect from it.

And yet, we are not pessimistic about the situation. Because Turkey, which identified itself with the idea of becoming Westernized 150 years ago and which has been converted to the 'one-way' system by Ataturk's reforms, will sooner or later convince everyone that it is part of the Western world. And it will do this not only through its institutions but also through its mentality and works.

VOTCP CRITICIZES REAGAN'S FOREIGN POLICY STAND

TA311110 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 31 Jan 81

[Station commentary]

[Summary] "Dear listeners: The new master of the White House, Reagan, held his first news conference as a president." The world public and the people in the United States are waiting for replies to numerous important questions and hoping for a sensible attitude in internal and foreign policy. However, not many people believed that Reagan would say anything new, since, both the internal and foreign policies of the new U.S. administration were announced in previous news conferences by Reagan's closest ministers like Haig.

In the field of foreign policy, "the new White House chief suddenly turned into a lion. Reagan loaded the entire responsibility for all the difficulties in the international arena and the tense situation upon the Soviet Union. The rest was easy for him." It is not hard for a politician, who describes the Soviet Union as the culprit of the arms race, to call for the strengthening of U.S. arms and nuclear power. The U.S. imperialists refuse to withdraw their forces from the Persian Gulf on the pretext that the Soviet Union has influence in Iran and could intervene.

Using the same pretext of the sphere of Soviet influence, the White House and the Pentagon wish to widen NATO's sphere of influence. There is no doubt that Turkey's current junta administration will share the policy of the Reagan administration and even become a tool of this policy. "U.S. imperialist circles do not conceal the duty and place they at[illegible] to Turkey in their foriegn policy goals. They view Turkey as the ideal country to be exploited in their Near East policy."

"Under these circumstances, all the progressive and democratic forces and patriotic persons should intensify their anti-imperialist struggle against the atmosphere of terror and oppression in the country and the dependence on NATO and the United States. The most effective weapon in this field consists of the unity of action of all the forces within existing possibilities."

CHANCELLOR SCHMIDT ADDRESSES INDUSTRY ASSOCIATION

DW031325 BONN PRESS AND INFORMATION OFFICE in German 1 Feb 81

[Speech by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt given at the annual reception of the Association of German Industry, BDI, in Cologne; date not given]

[Excerpts] I believe that the actual problems we will be facing in 1981 will be insecurity with regard to future developments resulting from the state of the world economy, the consequences of the second oil price explosion of the last 15 or 18 months and the restrictive monetary policy of the United States which is only an indirect consequence of the matter. Both the oil price explosion and the high interest rate policy of some other countries, which is quite understandable from their point of view, are difficult matters for us.

I do not want to give you any figures, but I want to point out that today we pay DM50 billion more for our oil than we did 7 years ago although we import 10 percent less oil than before. I do not want to keep it a secret either that Germans' traveling contributes to the deficit of the foreign trade balance. We are world champions in foreign travel, not just per capita, but absolutely. No other nation of the world is spending so much money on foreign travel. But I want to say on behalf of the government that there are many reasons why we do not plan to limit this, one of them being that our country depends on the free flow of goods, services and capital and that it must set a good example for the coexistence of economies and states.

Monetary policy manipulations will not help us to get out of the current foreign trade balance situation, aside from the fact that the international high interest rate policy leaves hardly any space for the Federal Bank to pursue an interest rate policy that would fit our current domestic economic situation. We will get out of it only if we will first consume less oil--even less in the years to come--which means rational use of energy and other kinds of energy. Second, we must, beyond the energy sector, increase the international competitiveness of our products. We must strengthen the relative competitive ability of our plants.

Therefore, it would be wrong to take action with a general economic program at the present time. No basic differences of opinion exist on that point, neither in the Federal Government nor the Bundestag. The economic difficulties we are facing here in Europe at present are caused not so much by business outlook problems as by structural problems which have to be solved. But regarding the structures in Germany, luckily, we are better off than many other European industrial states because we have made more headway in rationalization.

Mr Rodenstock approached me, saying that the state must do something now to create better economic conditions. I want to say one thing in this connection: Tax burdens in Germany oscillated in the past 30 years by 24 percent of the gross national product. That will remain as it is. It does not make sense for every group to make its own demands now.

I would like to make a request of you on my behalf. I want to ask you very urgently to step up investments for economizing energy, to step up investments to find substitutes for oil. I want to point out that the time is not far away when the oil price will not just enforce a substitution but make it economically calculable.

I do not make by prognoses precisely for months or years, but the time is not far away. I am asking you to take this into consideration and not to believe that coal refinement is first of all a matter of state initiative or state financing. One must not believe that it suffices to give speeches to the BDI on market economy business and so on, while leaving the production of synthetic fuel mainly to the initiative and financing of the state, but one must see that there are fields for successful business activities in a not too distant future.

I just want to say one word about energy policy. Out of strategic concern, strategic in the farthest meaning of the word, it seems advisable to us to diversify our energy supply, as you call it, namely to scatter the risks of the German economy's energy supply by involving coal, soft coal, gas, nuclear energy and other kinds of energy which are still in a state of scientific experiments and which may become fully effective only in the next centuries. Scattering risks: We have experienced it. Less than a quarter of a century ago, we had difficulties with the governments of two big countries in the world in connection with nuclear fuel. We experienced an endangered oil supply, not only that oil is becoming more scarce and expensive. Oil supply is sensitive for reasons of endangering peace. We experienced that despite all good will to adhere to treaties which others had concluded with us, they could get into a situation for some reason or other, which would prevent them from supplying the agreed quantities of coal or gas. One must scatter and diversify one's risks.

This is one of the reasons, not the main reason, but I still wanted to mention it. It's a reason why nuclear energy is indispensable. It is an important factor of energy supply, a necessary factor, but not the only one. I am asking the ladies and gentlemen of the industry, who have just applauded most cordially, to take part in the urgently needed enlightenment work vis-a-vis the normal citizen of our country who must be confused by the vast information being offered him in this field.

If the ladies and gentlemen of the electricity supply firms believe that it is none of their business but the damned duty of politicians to see to enlightenment, they are wrong. We are not the experts, you all are!

I would like to deal with the United States again. Mr Genscher and I had an opportunity in the fall--it was not the first time but the first time after his elections--to have a talk with the newly elected President and his aides. We will very much intensify consultations with the new government in the next months. I had a phone conversation with Mr Reagan a few days ago.

It is quite obvious that the new American Government aims for close consultation and cooperation with its European allies. We are happy about it and we will use this offer. We must make use of this offer, we, the Europeans and we, the Germans. We will have to correct again and again some wrong concepts one finds sometimes in America about the volume, significance and motivation of German trade with the East, for example. We also will have to explain some other German national interests repeatedly to every new American Government.

Mr. Rodenstock, you saw in America the return of the hostages. You saw first hand the vitality with which the American nation presently is getting up and striving ahead. I think that we all ought to be happy about it. I belong to those who always have trusted the vitality of the American nation, to those who always have stressed how much our Atlantic alliance needs American leadership, even if that was uncomfortable for the Americans. It is a very uncomfortable role because the Europeans demand to be led by them, while simultaneously demanding that one must not note their leadership. A very difficult role, but there must be leadership anyway.

In foreign and world politics, it will not be an easy year for the American Government either. The end of the hostage drama has relieved us of one trouble, but other great worries continue: the war in the Arab gulf, the war in Afghanistan, the almost traditional Middle East conflict, which is as dangerous as before, tension around Syria, new conflicts in Africa in addition to those we all know, conflicts in the western Sahara, in Namibia, in South Africa, in Central Africa and particularly concern in connection with a country here in Europe, in our immediate vicinity.

Today, I put it like this: I said it would serve the peaceful interests of all Europeans if the Polish experiment worked out fine. In addition, there are the more general difficulties in East-West relations, in relations between the United States and the Soviet Union after the disruption of the process in connection with the SALT II agreement.

We Germans, located directly at this seam, have an existential interest in a military balance here in Europe. Many other nations also have an existential interest in a balance in their region. In speaking of Europe, it must be a negotiated, agreed balance. Without an agreement, it could certainly not be fixed for a longer time. It would develop dynamically like a spiral, similar to prices and wages. I would rather prefer to say wages and prices. Both are equally correct. The balance would not be preserved that way. A difficult world-political year!

We Germans will not and cannot evade our international responsibility, our growing international responsibility. We cannot afford political isolationism or neutralism, which would be the same, and we cannot afford economic protectionism either.

Ladies and gentlemen of the industry, I ask you not merely to fight temptation vis-a-vis protectionist inclinations in public speeches at association meetings, but to really fight them in your own plant. Temptations vis-a-vis protectionism are very great, not only in certain branches and plants, but also in certain trade unions. It isn't true that the Federal Government is being spared unchaste suggestions coming from your circles from time to time.

International coordination of policies as well as economies, of economic policy, is today more important than it was before. The so-called world economic summits turned out to be good institutions of big industrial democracies. But actually, all this does not suffice, including the many organizations such as GATT, IMF and OECD. Actually, all that does not quite suffice with regard to cooperation with oil producing and oil exporting countries, countries today carrying an enormous responsibility of which they are not quite aware. It is still hard for the developing countries to realize their great responsibility. It is not being realized everywhere. One does not do justice to them everywhere. They must be incorporated in international coordination. I hope that the June meeting in Mexico City, to which the Mexican president has invited me, will become a step or a small step in this direction.

The Federal Government carefully will examine all international claims that are made vis-a-vis us. We want to fill out our interests in accordance with our leeway of action. And naturally, our main interest--this pertains to many people, many states and governments--is the preservation of peace, of our security. It has a military dimension. That is clear.

I already mentioned military balance, a condition without which one cannot imagine the preservation of peace in Europe, to this belongs in our current presence, NATO's famous double decision of late 1979 with regard to Eurostrategic missiles, if the balance is to be stabilized.

But security has not only military but particularly political dimensions. To safeguard outward peace, there must be preparedness for political talks, negotiations, and there must be results of negotiations. To bring them about, there must be preparedness to compromise. Security has also an economic dimension. Untroubled world trade belongs to security, active development policy, access of developing countries to markets where they can sell their products, markets in our countries. For our industrial states, the economic dimension of security contains free and unhindered access to oil and other raw materials.

In addition, there are inner dimensions to our security. I do not want to go into that any further. You know it yourselves: Our country is rather well off with regard to social and inner stability. But there must be no shrinking in this matter if our society and our economy are supposed to remain stable. I can reduce that to a common denominator by saying: Difficult times call for more mutual solidarity and not for less.

CDU OFFICIAL DISCUSSES WASHINGTON, DEFENSE POLICY

DW031048 Bonn DIE WELT in German 3 Feb 81 p 5

[Ruediger Moniac interview with CDU foreign policy spokesman Manfred Woerner in Bonn just prior to the latter's departure for the United States]

[Text] WELT: As far as detente policy is concerned, much more is at stake for us Europeans in general and for us Germans in particular than is for the Americans. This is a quotation from Horst Ehmke, deputy chairman of the SPD Bundestag faction. It just recently was printed in DIE WELT. Do you think detente policy can be divided into an American variety on the one hand and a European or even German variety on the other?

Woerner: If a realistic detente policy of the West is to yield sweeping results, it must be of one piece. Many difficulties and failures of Western policy in the past several years are explained by the fact that Europe embarked on different roads from the United States, particularly regarding the relationship with the Soviet Union. Hence, it will be a most important task of the U.S. President, but also of the European heads of government, to reach a coordinated Ostpolitik and detente policy incorporated in an overall concept. It goes without saying that the Federal Republic of Germany has interests of its own. Yet, these interests must be incorporated in such a policy and cannot be considered to constitute a separate element.

WELT: Concerning German interests, what we must keep in mind is the destiny of Berlin and our compatriots in the other German state. Mustn't we, for this very reason, pursue a policy different from that of the United States, or could and should this partial element of German detente policy and Ostpolitik be incorporated into U.S. foreign policy?

Woerner: The protection of Berlin is not the special interest of the Federal Republic of Germany. It is and remains the interest of the whole free West. Good contacts between the Germans in both parts of Germany likewise are not just in the interest of the Federal Republic of Germany. What I mean to say is that I see neither room for nor sense in any separate German Ostpolitik and detente policy.

WELT: Berlin is more than 6,000 km away from Washington. It may be, and probably is, that U.S. politicians, specifically Walter Stoessel, the former ambassador to Bonn, or Alexander Haig, the former NATO supreme commander, are well aware of the German interests in Europe whereas the United States, the American people, are not so familiar with them. Therefore, won't it be very difficult to make it clear to the Americans that they must heed German interest with regard to Berlin and with regard to the German compatriots in the "GDR"?

Woerner: No, because I expect the U.S. leadership, and this is what matters, to be perfectly aware of the value of Berlin and the other part of Germany and, as before, to be prepared to take these special interests of the Germans adequately and appropriately into account in an overall concept.

WELT: What you demand is an overall concept for a coordinated Western foreign policy or a policy of one piece. How can this be attained? Should the West's leading statesmen get together and think of ways to jointly phrase such a policy?

Woerner: I do not think much of spectacular Western summit conferences. They make sense only after the governments in bilateral talks have mapped out specific, essential bases for such an overall concept. The Americans feel that a certain pause for thinking is necessary. It is important that we enter into talks with the Americans as soon as possible so as to introduce our concepts in this overall concept that will be taking shape. Once clarity has been established via bilateral consultations which surely will take place with the French, the British, and the Japanese, a conference of the Western heads of government may take charge of the spectacular windup and the finalizing formulation.

WELT: How much time may the phrasing of such an overall concept take?

Woerner: What matters to me is that this overall concept will be carefully prepared and founded in such a way that it can be accepted and implemented subsequently by all states of the West. The time element is not essential, better somewhat longer discussions and thereafter determined action than the opposite.

WELT: Alexander Haig had a lot of praise for the German defense contribution before he officially was appointed secretary of state. People in Bonn were irritated when criticism came from Carter because the 3 percent had not been attained, whereas Reagan's politicians are now patting Bonn on the back. Will the new U.S. President demand less from the Germans for defense?

Woerner: Anyone having carefully studied Haig's utterances will soon recognize two things. First, they do not mean that the Americans expect lesser defense efforts on the part of the Europeans. The demands will be much more substantial and will not hinge on percentage figures but on concrete defense measures. This means that we will have to grow used to the idea that the new administration expects more rather than less from the Germans. And second, Haig's utterance quite obviously was aimed at clearing the air and preparing the groundwork for hard talks on business.

WELT: What are the concrete demands that you expect to be forthcoming?

Woerner: I expect demands for a relief of the Americans in Europe in three sectors--to begin with, in the so-called host nation support, secondly, through the establishment of more reserve units for the Bundeswehr and thirdly, through a greater contribution in the North Sea, that is, in the naval area.

The financial dilemma into which the Federal Government has maneuvered the Bundeswehr does not leave even one extra penny for all these tasks. Consequently, what I predict is that we will have the most serious of tensions between Bonn and Washington from the very outset because the Germans simply are incapable of meeting even one of the justified wishes of the Americans.

WELT: Leaving the shortage of finances aside, a mere glance at the Bonn coalition camp indeed shows that the chancellor has constantly less following among his own party members and that parts of his own party challenge him. What do you think is the impact of all this on the U.S. administration?

Woerner: As I have learned since, it has a devastating impact. The distrust, not so much for Schmidt as a person, but for his aptitude to prevail as the head of government, is growing in the United States at a rate which we may well call "daily." The latest news reports on the initiative of SPD deputies who come out not only against the finances of the Bundeswehr but also against the counterarming decision have intensified the impression in Washington that the Federal Government constantly is becoming less reliable. Beyond that, the old suspicion is being nursed in the United States again that a strongly neutralist wing exists in the SPD which constantly grows in numerical strength and which plans to dissociate the Federal Republic of Germany from the alliance and from the United States.

This problem, by the way, concerns everybody in this country. For if even the basic consensus about the need for military defense is destroyed in parliament, it hardly will be possible to any longer persuade our people to make some additional effort. The SPD meanwhile is in a state which additionally fans the uncritical pacifism that has been growing in our people and particularly anyway in our younger generation, and which has intensified that pacifism's effect on the politicians' ability to act.

WELT: Pacifism in itself is something honorable. Where does this aspiration, primarily of young people, but not only young, come from, and also the belief that a policy of peaceful coexistence could be easier had in Europe without German arms and without German soldiers? Where are the sources of this misunderstanding?

Woerner: To begin with, safeguarding peace is a priority objective especially to us of the CDU/CSU. Since their founding, all parties of the German Bundestag have made every effort to ensure peace in Europe and worldwide. It is, above all, the merit of the alliance and of our defense efforts that we have so far succeeded. This is what makes us responsibility moralists [verantwortungsethiker] different from the ideological moralists [gesinnungsethiker] who demand unilateral disarmament without any regard for the power structure of this world or for the consequences of their course of action. What I see here constantly more clearly is a parallel to the naive pacifism in England and France of the thirties which quite directly contributed to the outbreak of World War II.

Let me now get to your question. There are many sources of this trend. I would like to stress two of them in particular. First, it is the lack of information about the proportions of strength, the objectives and the expansive policy of the Soviet Union and thus about the so-called threat. The second is the habituation to peace after a period of more than 30 years in which no war occurred here in Europe. Peace too much is taken for granted. Many people forget that it would not have been possible without a balanced military power ratio.

Besides, the younger generation in many cases has ceased to comprehend one train of thought: The Soviet armament is not necessarily aimed at war. What we fear is not so much that the Soviets might attack us tomorrow or the day after. What we understand by threat is first of all the use of the super-powerful military machinery of the Soviets for purposes of pressure, threat and blackmail, that is to say, the transformation of military power into political advantages. All the world is talking, for instance, about the danger of a Soviet intervention in Poland. But nobody says that the present military pressure scenery build by the Soviet Union around Poland alone naturally curtails quite essentially the leeway of action of the Polish nation. This is a very striking example of the use of military power in peace.

WELT: You lament the lack of public information about defense-policy issues. One of them is the so-called counterarming. What must the Federal Government do to make it clear to a poorly informed people in general and SPD circles, so-called alternatives, greens and far leftwingers in particular that counterarming is necessary, too, quite apart from the attempt to achieve disarmament results?

Woerner: To begin with, it must enlighten the people about the fact that the Soviet Union as before, week after week, sets up at least one new missile position for the SS-20 missiles in addition to the SS-21 and SS-22 missiles deployed and also targeted on Europe. It must say that if this buildup of forces by the Soviet Union continues uninhibited, our entire deterrence and defense system will collapse.

Unless we counterarm, we will be facing the Soviet threat with the nuclear first strike some day. This means that this Soviet buildup of forces in the medium-range field smashes the core of NATO's defense strategy.

This would have direct consequences for peace and for the freedom of the European states at large and in particular of the Federal Republic of Germany. This is the first thing the Federal Government must state openly. The second thing we expect it to do is this: It must ensure clarity in its own camp at long last. The chancellor must stop being satisfied with weak retreat skirmishes but must instead advocate NATO's dual decision offensively in his own party time and again. Finally, it is necessary to enlighten the people, too, in good time and comprehensively about the character of the new weapons which we propose to deploy, lest unjustified anxieties and worries crop up.

SCHMIDT TO SCHEDULE VISIT TO SAUDI ARABIA

LD031520 Hamburg DPA in German 1045 GMT 3 Feb 81

[Excerpts] Bonn, 3 Feb (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt plans to visit Saudi Arabia. A government spokesman said in Bonn today that the invitation was made at the time of King Khalid's visit to Bonn last June. The date for the chancellor's visit has not yet been fixed, however. Schmidt was last in Riyadh in 1976.

It was learned from government circles that the chancellor will first wait to see how the discussion about the Saudis' request for supplies of German tanks goes.

It was said in Bonn that Schmidt wants during his visit to Riyadh to be able to discuss a wide variety of topics which equally interest both the Saudis and the Germans. This applies, among other things, to questions on the security and stability of the Gulf region and the Middle East, the effects of oil prices on the world economic situation, the reinvestment of petrodollars and also German-Saudi economic relations.

FOREIGN MINISTRY OFFICIAL MEETS WITH AFRICAN ENVOYS

LD021502 Hamburg DPA in German 1010 GMT 2 Feb 81

[Text] Bonn, 2 Feb (DPA)--The Federal Government continues to support the sovereignty and independent development of Africa and rejects all attempts at carrying out a policy of hegemony on this continent. Hildegard Hamm-Brucher, minister of state for foreign affairs, stated this on Monday at a meeting with African ambassadors in Gymnich near Bonn.

Frau Hamm-Brucher welcomed the decisions made last year by the Organization of African Unity for the gradual creation of an all-African economic community and the drawing up of an African human rights charter.

Regarding development policy, the minister of state promised that Bonn will adhere to the present policy which includes as one of its main points, support for the poor countries of Africa. She underlined the need for the developing countries to help themselves.

BOELLING: FRG STILL READY TO COOPERATE WITH GDR

LD041136 Hamburg DPA in German 1037 GMT 4 Feb 81

[Excerpt] Bonn, 4 Feb (DPA)--The Federal Government is adhering to its intention of cooperating with the GDR and to the aim, on the basis of the treaty agreements, of achieving further improvements and reducing existing difficulties.

Following a closed meeting yesterday between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and SPD leaders, Bonn's new permanent representative in the GDR, State Secretary Klaus Boelling, said today that the "readiness to carry on" had been reaffirmed in a statement last year by the Federal Cabinet. "We are sticking to this line," he said in a Deutschlandfunk interview. The SPD and the FDP are in full agreement on this.

Boelling, who takes up his post in East Berlin on Friday, pointed out the fact that SED Chief Erich Honecker has said on several occasions that he and the GDR are still prepared for further cooperation with the Federal Republic. Boelling said that the difficult situation is the very reason why every effort ought to be made "to further improve what has been agreed in treaties and in so doing to insist that certain matters are put in order." Boelling's last point is taken to refer to Bonn's demand for the revoking of the measure increasing the compulsory currency exchange amount.

NEWSPAPER COMMENTARY ON ACTIONS OF RIOTERS

DW031433 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 3 Feb 81

[From the press review]

[Text] FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG writes: Terrorism in the streets of Berlin and Frankfurt--reports from Zurich and Amsterdam, which were read last year with unbelieving astonishment, come today from everywhere, including such towns as Goettingen. The people rioting in the streets mainly are not those who occupy houses and are not students. The figures clad in black who leave the ranks of demonstrators to smash windows, the small groups attacking policemen, demonstrate the beginning of a new and violent proletariat.

BREMER NACHRICHTEN points out: The communities in the Federal Republic presently face a vicious circle: Young people, filled with deep mistrust and dislike vis-a-vis the state system, commit criminal acts the punishment of which in line with the valid law makes them criminals, moving them even farther away from society. The actual problem group does not consist of those chaotic people who simply want to riot. It consists of those who reject the ruling system and thus give the rioters the leeway for their activities. The simple answer to implement law and order with all the force of the state obviously does not produce the desired effect--as in Zurich. How should the problem be handled without pushing one section of the young almost out of society?
